The House of Representatives and its Speaker, Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE of Kentucky.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THE picture of the United States Senate, with its Republican President, which appeared in this journal on December 9th, is now appropriately supplemented with a picture of the House and its Democratic Speaker.

The chamber in which the Representatives hold their sessions is much more elaborately decorated than is the somewhat sombre room occupied by the Senate. Paintings adorn the walls, and the national flag graces the gallery above the Speaker's chair. One item of furniture peculiar to the House is the mace. This is a kind of sceptre surmounted by a silver eagle, which, guarded by the Sergeant-at-Arms, rests upon a marble stand to the right of the Speaker. It is the symbol of the power of the House, and rests upon its stand only when the House is in session and the Speaker is in the chair. The Democratic side of the House is on the right of the Speaker and the Republican on his left, but when one party has a large majority the members are obliged "to project themselves into the enemy's camp," as the seats on each side of the room are sufficient for about half of the whole number of Representatives.

The House at present consists of three hundred and twenty-five members, that being the number fixed after the census of 1880 as the one best adapted to effect uniform representation. Before the change there were two hundred and ninety-three members, and the first House consisted of only sixty-five members. The theory is that the unit of representation should be the same throughout the country, and at every census an effort has been made to carry out that theory. The West, however, has increased in population far more rapidly than the East, and it has therefore been necessary to reduce the number of representatives from Eastern States and increase those from Western States, in order to maintain the proportionate representation without rendering the House too unwieldy for the transaction of business. In 1789 each member of the House represented a constituency of thirty thousand, but in 1792 a member for every thirty thousand persons would have increased the House to a number which was then considered too large.

was fixed at thirty-three thousand, and that gave a House of one hundred and five members. As the population has increased it has been necessary to increase the size of the constituencies as well as to increase the number of members in the House. The number of members has from this cause fluctuated with each census In 1803 it was 141; in 1813, 181; in 1823, 213; and in 1833, 240. In 1843 the unit was raised from 47,700 to 70,680, and the number of members was consequently reduced to 223. In 1853 the unit was again raised—this time to 93,423, but even that large increase involved an increase of members to 237. The census of 1860 added more than one third to the unit and six members to the House. In 1873 the unit was 131,425, and the House consisted of 293 members. The unit is now 151,912, which, as we have said, gives a House of 325.

The ratio established is not, of course, absolutely accurate. Every State under the Constitution must have at least one Representative in the House, and therefore in Delaware and Nevada, neither of which has a population of 151,912, the member elected by each of those States represents a smaller unit than elsewhere. Again, when the population of a State is divided by the unit, there is in many cases a large remainder which it would be unfair to leave unrepresented. To the States having large remainders another member is assigned, who, if the State is not re-districted, is Congressman-at-large. The Territories have each one member, who is called a delegate. He is allowed to speak on any question, but must not vote.

The vicissitudes each State has encountered in its history under this system are interesting. Thus, Connecticut had in the first Congress five representatives. In 1803 she had seven; she is now entitled to only four. Massachusetts commenced with eight, rose to twenty, and now has twelve. New York began with six, rose to forty in 1833, and has now thirty-four. Illinois, which had but one member in 1823, is now entitled to twenty.

The terms of the Representatives begin at noon on the fourth of March of every odd-numbered year (as 1885 or 1887) and end at noon on the fourth of March of the second year following. This period of two years is termed a Congress, and each Congress is divided into two regular sessions. The first session, commencing on the first Monday in December, may continue late into the following summer, and this is called "the long session;" the second, also commencing on the first Monday of December, closes on the fourth of March following. It is, however, within the power of the President to summon an extra session, so that it sometimes happens that a Congress has three sessions.

The salaries of members of the House are five thousand dollars a year, in addition to which they are allowed twenty cents for each mile travelled to and from Washington, and one hundred and twenty-five dollars for stationery and newspapers. The Speaker's salary is eight thousand dollars.

For further particulars and many interesting reminiscences of Congress, we may refer our readers to a well-written and illustrated work recently published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, entitled, "Among the Law-Makers." Pp. 308. Price, $2.50.

HON. JOHN G. CARLISLE,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

THE present Speaker of the House is a native of Kentucky. He is in his fifty-second year, having been born in Campbell County on September 5th, 1835. The high and honorable position he holds is an illustration of what may be accomplished by earnest, steady, persistent work against the disadvantages of birth and fortune. The only education Mr. Carlisle ever received was in the common schools of his State, but that was but a small part of the education he possesses. On leaving school he set himself diligently to the task of self-education, and while companions and acquaintances were giving their evenings and holidays to pleasure and amusement John Carlisle was plodding away at his books. It is due in no slight degree to that self-denial that he now occupies the post which in some respects is one of the most honorable in the nation. To be chosen to preside over the popular branch of the Legislature in a land where the people rule is a testimony to his ability and character of no slight significance.

Like many of our most distinguished citizens, Mr. Carlisle took the first step to self-support

IN THE SCHOOL-HOUSE.

It would be a long list that would contain the names of all the Presidents, distinguished statesmen, and clergymen who so began their career. Mr. Carlisle used it to good purpose. In its duties he was fixing permanently in his mind the knowledge he had already acquired, and when school was closed for the day he was pushing on into the higher walks of knowledge.

Mr. Carlisle chose the profession of the law for his permanent occupation. He studied hard to qualify himself for the discharge of its duties, and in 1858 he hung out his modest shingle in Covington, Ky., where he has lived ever since. He was, however, not destined to pursue a quiet legal career. Only one year after commencing his law practice he was elected to the Legislature of his native State, and took his seat there at the early age of twenty-four. Five years later he was elected Senator, and was re-elected at the end of his term. Before he had completed his second term he was nominated for the lieutenant-governorship, and elected. He served in that capacity from 1871 to 1875. In the following year he was and has been re-elected in 1878, 1880, 1882, 1884, and 1886.

WI[illegible] OUR[illegible]Carlisle first appeared in Washington, [illegible]andall gave him an obscure com[illegible]on; but while thus deprived of [illegible] mar[illegible]rtunities enjoyed by his associates, he w[illegible] laborious and diligent student of im[illegible]portan[illegible] public questions and the details of legis[illegible]latio[illegible] The leading members of both parties gradu[illegible]y came to know him as a man of excep[illegible]tiona[illegible] good judgment, a clear thinker, a strong [illegible]logic[illegible], and a member who was never carried away by extreme views or party passion. In the organization of the Forty-sixth House of Representatives Mr. Carlisle was transferred from the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department to the Ways and Means Committee. He soon proved himself one of the strongest members of the committee, and his views on economic questions speedily commanded the attention of the House.

On the assembling of the Forty-eighth Congress on December 3d, 1883, Mr. Carlisle was ELECTED SPEAKER.

He was supposed to belong to the free-trade wing of the Democratic Party, and there was consequently a severe struggle in the caucus before his nomination was secured. Mr. Randall, of Pennsylvania, was his chief opponent, and Mr. S. S. Cox, of New York, was also a candidate. The first ballot, however, decided the question. It stood 107 for Carlisle, 45 for Randall, and 36 for Cox. Mr. Randall, Mr. Cox, and Governor Curtin went immediately to Mr. Carlisle's room and conducted him into the hall, where he made a short and well-timed speech, thanking the Representatives for the honor conferred upon him. Two days afterward Mr. Carlisle was seated in the Speaker's chair by the vote of the House.

A URIOUS FLORAL TRIBUTE

was sent to Mr. Carlisle on the day of his election. It has long been the custom for the friends of a candidate for the Speakership to send flowers to his desk on the day of his taking his seat. Two Kentucky ladies prepared and sent to Mr. Carlisle a beautiful and original device in flowers and satin. It consisted of a gavel, in the shape of a General Washington hatchet, resting on the mossy stump of a tree in such a way as to show both sides of the blade and handle. One side was composed of beautiful flowers and the other of hand-painted satin. Through the centre of the blade on the white satin appeared, in illuminated old English letters, the following:

> "May eye be keen as blade of hatchet
> When worthy members rise to catch it,
> And rulings true as steel to match it,
> All lawful business to dispatch it."

On the left of the inscription was the trumpet of Fame blowing two gavels, and beneath it on the left a little nude George Washington, hatchet in hand, cutting down a cherry-tree. On his right were a larger hatchet and a felled tree. In the upper left-hand corner appeared against a sky back-ground the dome of the Capitol, with a waning moon in the west and a rising sun in the east. On a white satin ribbon were the words: "To the Speaker XLVIII. Congress, Greeting."

The card of the ladies who sent the floral gift bore the following advice to the Speaker with regard to the manner in which the double-ended instrument should be wielded:

> "For noise, use hammer end as gavel,
> And blade when knots you can't unravel."

The thorough knowledge displayed by Mr. Carlisle of Parliamentary procedure, his manifest endeavor to act impartially, and his uniform courtesy to every member of the House soon won for him general confidence and respect. It is not an easy matter to maintain order in the excitement of the House debates, but Mr. Carlisle ruled with a firm hand when the debates were over and members had time to cool down, even those on whom the new Speaker had exercised his prerogative with most effect admitted that he had only done his duty. Both Republicans and Democrats were pleased, and the appointment of committees, which t st difficult and delicate of the Speak ties, there were a smaller number of co ints than usual.

No stronger testimony to Mr. Carlisle's excel-ce as a Speaker could have been given than his

RE-ELECTION TO THE CHAIR

en the Forty-ninth Congress assembled on cember 7th, 1885. Mr. Carlisle clearly ap-ciated the fact, and it was with some emotion t, on taking his seat, he said : " In assuming e duties and responsibilities of this place for a ond time, I beg to return my most profound nks for the manifestation of your continued nfidence. It is a compliment which I shall ays remember with pride and gratitude. No-ere else in the world can there be found a islative assembly representing so great a conuency as that represented by this House, d certainly no similar body consisting of an ual number of members is its superior in point ability and devotion to the interests intrusted
it. The privilege of presiding over the delib-tions of such a body is a very high and hon-ble distinction—the highest and most honor-e it can confer on any of its members—and I preciate it as such. But, gentlemen, my full preciation of your action to-day can best be own by a conscientious and impartial dis-arge of my official duty, and although it may be wise to make pledges in advance, I ven-e to promise that to the fullest extent of my lity the laws governing the proceedings of House shall be evenly administered, with a w to the preservation of order and decorum, protection of the personal and representae rights of members, and the prompt transac-n of public business."

A REPUBLICAN TESTIMONIAL,

wever, is probably a more significant evidence the impartiality with which Mr. Carlisle has formed the duties of his high office. At the nclusion of the session last year the Speaker
d the gratification of receiving this acknowl-gment from his political opponents. The an-uncement was made on August 6th, 1886, t "as a recognition of the courtesy, imrtiality, and uniform consideration shown by eaker Carlisle toward the minority of the use, a number of the prominent Republican presentatives have united in purchasing, at a t of about six hundred dollars, an elegant d tastefully decorated silver table service, would be presented to the Speaker at the f the session." It was received with leasure as an unmistakable proof that in st difficult function of a presiding officer political affiliations were clearly marked his election to the office Mr. Carlisle had ieved an unqualified success.

The testimonial was sent to the Speaker at Kentucky home, and elicited the following ceful reply : "Your favor is received, for ich you will please accept my thanks. It is y gratifying to me to know that my political ponents fully appreciate my efforts to admin-er the rules of the House in a spirit of just-s and fairness to both sides ; but if they knew w easy it is to do right and how disagreeable s for a man in a responsible public position to l that his official conduct is justly liable to ticism, they would doubtless give me less dit than they now do. The testimonial sent Covington by my Republican friends in the use has attracted much attention, and my ghbors, without regard to party associations, warm in their congratulations."

Mr. Carlisle has been re-elected to the Fiftieth ngress, but by one of those curious accidents
t the elections so often supply, he narrowly aped defeat. His only opponent was a labor ndidate, the foreman of a chair-factory. Mr. rlisle's friends treated this opposition with ntempt, and so many of them, regarding his ction as an assured fact, neglected to vote t the labor candidate was at first believed to the victor. It is now stated that Mr. Carlisle s re-elected by a small majority, but it is bable that the claim will be challenged.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Pathetic Telegram.—At a Recent Meeting a visitor said : " A lady with a child on each side of her was on a sinking wreck. They went down underneath the billows, and when they once more got above water the lady found she had lost both her children. She herself got safely landed on the French coast. She sent off a telegram to her husband in Chicago, with the words, 'Saved alone.' Ah! I think this is just like millions of telegrams that ascend to heaven daily, 'Saved alone.' The devil and all his adversaries are so busy that multitudes of people have only time to be saved alone."

The Late Thomas Carlyle Was Once at the house of a lady of rank in London, and the conversation turned to the modern rationalistic theory of evolution. For some time Carlyle remained perfectly silent and grave ; at length, during a pause in the discussion, he was unable any longer to restrain himself, and exclaimed with emphasis and solemnity : " Gentlemen, you are well pleased to trace your descent from a tadpole, or an ape, as the case may be, but I would say with David, 'Lord, Thou hast made me but a little lower than the angels.'" The effect was profound and memorable, and not without advantage to some present.

The Tears of a Learned Doctor.—Mr. Frazer remarked : " A young lady meeting at a social gathering an eminent doctor of divinity asked what was the meaning of the word 'eternal.' She quoted the text, 'Away into everlasting torment,' and wished to know what was the meaning of 'everlasting' or 'eternal.' She expected a most learned and lucid explanation, and was surprised to get no immediate answer, but when she looked up into the doctor's face, and saw his eyes beaming with pity, while the tears trickled down his cheeks, she had got all the answer she wanted. The good man had helped her to realize that everlasting punishment was something too serious to be lightly spoken of, and that if we love our neighbors as God loves us, or as we love ourselves, we could not think of their condemnation without being moved to pity and making every effort to bring them to the feet of Jesus."

Too Late to Receive the Queen.—A Christian worker said : " At the beginning of the Queen's reign, before there were many railways, she had occasion to visit Scotland ; and it was arranged that the Lord Provost of Edinburgh should meet and receive her as she disembarked at Leith. It happened that her Majesty arrived very late at night, and the provost thought that if he went down about eight or nine o'clock next morning he would be in plenty of time to receive her. He did so, but when he got there he was chagrined to find that the Queen and her party had disembarked at 7 A.M., and by that time were in Edinburgh. He and his brother magistrates hastened back, only to discover that the Queen had installed herself in Holyrood, without being officially received by the city, and without any of the ceremonies belonging to her position. How many even of the professing servants of Christ will fail to be ready to greet Him when He comes the second time?"

All Under One Banner.—A Worker, Speaking at an evangelistic meeting, told the following story : " During one of the visits of the King of Italy to Naples, the Protestant ministers of that city begged to be admitted to his presence. He granted their request, and received them with great courtesy ; but was much surprised when one was presented as a Presbyterian, another as an Episcopalian, a third as a Methodist, a fourth as a Baptist, etc., and exclaimed in astonishment, 'I thought they were all Protestants ; how can they be ministers of the same Gospel and yet have so many distinctions?' The Waldensian minister promptly replied, 'In your Majesty's army there are many regiments, wearing different uniforms and having different names, but all under the one commander-in-chief and serving the same country and flag. In like manner we Protestants are divided into denominations, but under one Chief, Jesus Christ ; and we follow but one banner, that of our crucified and risen Saviour.' The King listened attentively, and then said, 'I thank you for this clear explanation ; you mean that while there are differences in minor matters, there is unity in all that is essential.'"

A Highlander's Story.—The Rev. Mr. M'Laughlan related the following incident : " When the Rev. Dr. Wallace was on a tour round the Highlands of Scotland he met with an old Highlander who told him that he had been thirty years a Christian. 'Will you tell me all about your conversion in as few words as possible?' said the doctor. 'Willingly,' replied the old Highlander. 'For many years I was extremely anxious about my soul ; I had no one to point me to the great Saviour or tell me that He took upon Him my sins, until one day in my extreme need, I met with Jesus, and just swapped with Him' (made an exchange). 'What do you mean?' asked the minister ; 'I don't understand you.' And the man in explanation said ; 'When I met with Jesus I handed Him over my fifty years of sin, and He gave me in return the spotless robe of His righteousness, and I just swapped with Jesus, that was all ; and now "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come shall separate me from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."'"

A Heroic Doctor's Sacrifice.—A Methodist minister said : " Some of you will remember the great plague in Marseilles, when seven thousand in one short week were hurried to the grave. There were twelve doctors in constant attendance night and day, but they could not stay the plague, for they could not get at the seat of the disease. One doctor, the youngest of the twelve, said, 'I cannot see a thousand in one day die for the sake of my life. Years ago I was for three months in extreme anxiety about my soul, but the Lord delivered me ; I gave my heart to Christ, and now I am a new man in Him ; I will give myself over to this disease and carefully note, as far as I am able, the progress of it for the sake of this great city.' Oh, what a noble act! The other eleven doctors accepted his offer, and before the sun rose on the following morning he had gone to meet his Creator. Did he die in vain? No. By the knowledge gained from this man's death the plague was stayed. He had died for his country. And now a beautiful monument stands at the top of his grave with the inscription, 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.'"

Getting Jeannie into the Hospital.—Mr. John Gilbert Forbes writes : " Not long ago a man came up to my house about five o'clock in the evening and said, 'Oh, Mr. Forbes, my little daughter Jeannie is so unwell. I took her up to the Children's Hospital, and the doctor thought her so extremely ill that he would not let her come away, but had her put to bed at once ; and I promised I should get a line from a subscriber requesting her admittance by to-morrow, and I thought you might be able to give me one.' I told him I was sorry I was not a subscriber, but that I would try to get him one. Accordingly I called next day at the hospital, procured a list of subscribers, and got him the required line. But what struck me on being shown over the hospital was, that at the head of the beds there were often little tickets which read, 'In memory of ——, son ——, who died 18—.' The people who gave and supported the beds of the hospital had such a loving memory of their child, and had suffered such grief by his death, that they determined to try and save some little boy or girl for their parents. Their own sufferings made them fellow-sufferers with all afflicted parents. Similarly Christ, having passed through the trials and temptations of this life, knows how to comfort us. He sympathizes with our grief, and to the sufferer sends relief. He still remembers in the skies His tears, His agonies, and cries."

THE FLYING YEARS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Jan. 2, 1887.

"How old art thou?"—GEN. 47 : 8.

A Focus of Magnificence and Wealth—The Shepherd in the Palace—The King's Question—Right and Wrong Ways of Measuring Life—Measured by Worldly Gratification—The Experience of Lord Dundas—Enjoyments Forgotten—Measured by Sorrows and Misfortunes—The Troubles of Famous Men—Measured by Financial Success—By Moral and Spiritual Development—By Good Done—A Field for Every One—A Bright View of Death—A New Style of Measurement—Getting to the Centre of Things—The Musical Festival at Ghent.

THE Egyptian capital was the focus of the world's wealth. In ships and barges there had been brought to it from India frankincense, and cinnamon, and ivory, and diamonds; from the North, marble and iron; from Syria, purple and silk; from Greece, some of the finest horses of the world, and some of the most brilliant chariots; and from all the earth that which could best please the eye, and charm the ear, and gratify the taste. There were temples aflame with red sandstone, entered by the gateways that were guarded by pillars bewildering with hieroglyphics, and wound with brazen serpents, and adorned with winged creatures—their eyes, and beaks, and pinions glittering with precious stones. There were marble columns blooming into white flower-beds; there were stone pillars, at the top bursting into the shape of the lotus when in full bloom.

Along the avenues, lined with sphinx, and fane, and obelisk, there were princes who came in gorgeously-upholstered palanquin, carried by servants in scarlet, or elsewhere drawn by vehicles, the snow-white horses, golden-bitted, and six abreast, dashing at full run. On floors of mosaic were spelled out in letters of porphyry, and beryl, and flame. There were ornaments twisted from the wood of tamarisk, embossed with silver breaking into foam. There were footstools made out of a single precious stone. There were beds fashioned out of a crouched lion in bronze. There were chairs spotted with the sleek hides of leopards. There were sofas footed with the claws of wild beasts, and armed with the beaks of birds. As you stand on the level beach of the sea on a summer-day, and look either way, and there are miles of breakers, white with the ocean foam, dashing shoreward; so it seemed as if the sea of the world's pomp and wealth in the Egyptian capital for miles and miles flung itself up into white breakers of marble temple, mausoleum, and obelisk.

It was to this capital and the palace of Pharaoh that Jacob, came to meet his son Joseph, who had become Prime Minister, in the royal apartment. Pharaoh and Jacob met, dignity and rusticity, the gracefulness of the court and the plain manners of the field. The King, wanting to make the old countryman at ease, and seeing how white his beard is and how feeble his step, looks familiarly into his face, and says to the aged man: "How old art thou?"

THE PLAIN SHEPHERD,

Night before last the gate of Eternity opened to let in, amid the great throng of departed centuries, the soul of

THE DYING YEAR.

Under the twelfth stroke of the brazen hammer of the city clock the patriarch fell dead, and the stars of the night were the funeral torches. It is most fortunate that on this road of life there are so many milestones, on which we can read just how fast we are going toward the journey's end. I feel that it is not an inappropriate question that I ask to-day, when I look into your faces, and say, as Pharaoh did to Jacob, the patriarch: "How old art thou?"

People who are truthful on every other subject lie about their ages, so that I do not solicit from you any literal response to the question I have asked. I would put no one under temptation; but I simply want, this morning, to see by what rod it is we are measuring our earthly existence. There is a right way and a wrong way of measuring a door, or a wall, or an arch, or a tower, and so there is a right way and our earthly existence. It is with reference to this higher meaning that I confront you this morning with the stupendous question of the text, and ask: "How old art thou?"

There are many who estimate their life by mere worldly gratification. When Lord Dundas was wished a happy New Year, he said: "It will have to be a happier year than the past, for I hadn't one happy moment in all the twelve months that have gone." But that has not been the experience of most of us. We have found that though the world is blasted with sin, it is a very bright and beautiful place to reside in. We have had joys innumerable. There is no hostility between the Gospel and the merriments and the festivities of life. I do not think that we fully enough appreciate the worldly pleasures God gives us. When you you do not go far enough back. Why do you not go back to the time when you were an infant in your mother's arms, looking up into the heaven of her smile; to those days when you filled the house with the uproar of boisterous merriment; when you shouted as you pitched the ball on the playground; when, on the cold, sharp, winter night, muffled up, on skates you shot out over the resounding ice of the pond? Have you forgotten all those good days that the Lord gave you? Were you never a boy? Were you never a girl? Between those times and this, how many mercies, how many kindnesses the Lord has bestowed upon you! How many joys have breathed up to you from the flowers, and shone down to you from the stars, and chanted to you with the voice of soaring bird, and tumbling cascade, and booming sea, and thunders that with bayonets of fire charged down the mountain-side! Joy! Joy! Joy! If there is any one who has a right to the enjoyments of the world, it is the Christian, for God has given him in the promise: "All are yours." But I have to tell you that a man who estimates his life on earth by mere worldly gratification is a most unwise man. Our life is not to be a game of chess. It is not a dance in lighted hall, to quick music. It is not the froth of an ale pitcher. It is not the settlings of a wine cup. It is not a banquet with intoxication and roystering. It is the first step on a ladder that mounts into the skies, or the first step on a road that plunges into a horrible abyss. So that in this world we are only keying up the harp of a rapture or forging the chain of a bondage. And standing before you to-day, with life on the one side and death on the other; song on the one side and groaning on the other; mansions on the one side and dungeons on the other; heaven on the one side and hell on the other—I put to you the question of the text: "How old art thou?" Toward what destiny are you tending, and how fast are you getting on toward it?

Again, I remark that there are many who estimate their life on earth by their

SORROWS AND MISFORTUNES.

Through a great many of your lives the ploughshare hath gone very deep, turning up a terrible furrow. You have been betrayed, and misrepresented, and set upon, and slapped of impertinence, and pounded of misfortune. The brightest life must have its shadows, and the smoothest path its thorns. On the happiest brood the hawk pounces. No escape from trouble of some kind. While glorious John Milton was losing his eyesight, he heard that Salmasius was glad of it. While Sheridan's comedy was being enacted in Drury Lane Theatre, Cumberland, his enemy, sat growling at it in the stage-box. While Bishop Cooper was surrounded by the favor of learned men, his wife took his lexicon manuscript, the result of a long life of anxiety and toil, and threw it into the fire. Misfortune, trial,

VEXATION, FOR ALMOST EVERY ONE.

Pope, applauded of all the world, has a sto in the shoulder that annoys him so much t he has a tunnel dug, so that he may go un served from garden to grotto, and from grotto garden. Cano, the famous Spanish artist, disgusted with the crucifix that the priest ho before him, because it is such a poor specim of sculpture. And so, sometimes through tas and sometime through learned menace, a sometimes through physical distresses—aye ten thousand ways, troubles come to harass a annoy.

And yet it is unfair to measure a man's life his misfortunes, because where there is one st of nightshade, there are fifty marigolds and ha bells; where there is one cloud thunder-charg there are hundreds that stray across the heave the glory of land and sky asleep in their bosc Because death came and took your child aw did you immediately forget all the five years, the ten years, or the fifteen years in which came every night for a kiss, all the tones of y heart pealing forth at the sound of her voice the soft touch of her hand? Because in so financial Euroclydon your fortune went into breakers, did you forget all those years in wh the luxuries and extravagances of life showe on your pathway? Alas! that is an unw man, an ungrateful man, an unfair man, an philosophic man, and, most of all, an unch tian man, who measures his life on earth groans, and tears, and dyspeptic fit, and abu and scorn, and terror, and neuralgic thrust.

Again, I remark that there are many peo who estimate their life on earth they have accumulated. They say, "The y 1866, or 1876, or 1886 was wasted." W Made no money. Now, it is all cant and in cerity to talk against money as though it had value. It may represent refinement, and edu tion, and ten thousand blessed surroundings. is the spreading of the table that feeds your c dren's hunger. It is the lighting of the furn that keeps you warm. It is the making of bed on which you rest from care and anxiety. is the carrying out at last of you to decent se ture, and the putting up of the slab on whic chiselled the story of your Christian hope. simply hypocrisy, this tirade in pulpit and l ure-hall against money.

BY THE AMOUNT OF MONEY

But while all this is so, he who uses mo or thinks of money as anything but a mean an end will find out his mistake when the s tering treasures slip out of his nerveless gr and he goes out of this world without a shil of money or a certificate of stock. He m better have been the Christian porter that ope his gate or the begrimed workman who night heaved the coal into his cellar. Bo and mortgages, and leases have their use, they make a poor yardstick with which to m ure life. They that boast themselves in t wealth and trust on the multitude of t riches, none of them can, by any means, red his brother, nor give to God a ransom for that he should not see corruption.

But I remark, There are many—I wish t were more—who estimate their life by their

MORAL AND SPIRITUAL DEVELOPMENT,

It is not sinful egotism for a Christian to say, "I am purer than I used to be. more consecrated to Christ than I used t I have got over a great many of the bad h in which I used to indulge. I am a great better man than I used to be." There is no ful egotism in that. It is not base egotism a soldier to say, "I know more about mil tactics than I used to before I took a musk my hand, and learned to 'present arms,' when I was a pest to the drill-officer." It i base egotism for a sailor to say, "I know better to clew down the mizzen topsail th used to before I had ever seen a ship," there is no sinful egotism when a Christian ghting the battles of the Lord, or if you will ave it, voyaging toward a haven of eternal rest, ys, "I know more about spiritual tactics and out voyaging toward heaven than I used to." Why, there are those in this presence who ave measured lances with many a foe, and un-orsed it. There are Christian men here who ave become swarthy by hammering at the forge calamity. They stand on an entirely differ-nt plane of character from that which they once ccupied. They are measuring their life on arth by golden-gated Sabbaths, by pentecostal ayer-meetings, by communion tables, by bap-smal fonts, by hallelujahs in the temple. They ave stood on Sinai, and heard it thunder. hey have stood on Pisgah, and looked over into ne Promised Land. They have stood on Cal-ary, and seen the cross bleed. They can, like aul the Apostle, write on their heaviest troubles light," and "but for a moment." The dark-st night their soul is irradiated, as was the ight over Bethlehem, by the faces of those who ave come to proclaim glory and good-cheer. hey are only waiting for the gate to open, and he chains to fall off, and the glory to begin.

I remark again: There are many (and I wish here were more) who are estimating life

BY THE GOOD THEY CAN DO.

John Bradford said he counted that day noth-g at all in which he had not, by pen or tongue, one some good. If a man begin right, I can-ot tell how many tears he may wipe away, how any burdens he may lift, how many orphans e may comfort, how many outcasts he may re-laim. There have been men who have given heir whole life in the right direction, concen-rating all their wit and ingenuity, and mental cumen, and physical force and enthusiasm for Christ. They climbed the mountain, and delved nto the mine, and crossed the sea, and trudged he desert, and dropped, at last, into martyrs' raves, waiting for the resurrection of the just. They measured their lives by the chains they roke off, by the garments they put upon naked-ess, by the miles they travelled to alleviate very kind of suffering. They felt in the thrill f every nerve, in the motion of every muscle, n every throb of their heart, in every respiration f their lungs, the magnificent truth: "No man iveth for himself." They went through cold nd through heat, foot-blistered, cheek-smitten, ack-scourged, tempest-lashed, to do their whole luty. That is the way they measured life—by he amount of good they could do.

Do you want to know

HOW OLD LUTHER WAS;

ow old Richard Baxter was; how old Philip Doddridge was? Why, you cannot calculate he length of their lives by any human arith-metic. Add to their lives ten thousand times en thousand years, and you have not expressed t—what they have lived or will live. Oh, what a standard that is to measure a man's life by! There are those in this house who think they have only lived thirty years. They will have lived a thousand—they have lived a thousand. There are those who think they are eighty years of age. They have not even entered upon their infancy, for one must become a babe in Christ to begin at all.

Now, I do not know what your advantages or disadvantages are; I do not know what your tact or talent is; I do not know what may be the fascination of your manners or the repulsive-ness of them; but I know this: there is for you, my hearer, a field to culture,

A HARVEST TO REAP,

a tear to wipe away, a soul to save. If you have worldly means, consecrate them to Christ. If you have eloquence, use it on the side that Paul and Wilberforce used theirs. If you have learn-ing, put it all into the poor-box of the world's suffering. But if you have none of these—neither wealth, nor eloquence, nor learning—you, at any rate, have a smile with which you can encourage the disheartened; a frown with which you may blast injustice; a voice with which you may call the wanderer back to God. "Oh," you say, "that is a very sanctimonious view of life!" It is not. It is the only bright view of life, and it is the only

BRIGHT VIEW OF DEATH.

Contrast the death scene of a man who has measured life by the worldly standard with the death scene of a man who has measured life by the Christian standard. Quinn, the actor, in his last moments said, "I hope this tragic scene will soon be over, and I hope to keep my dignity to the last." Malherbe said in his last moments to the confessor, "Hold your tongue! your miserable style puts me out of conceit with heaven." Lord Chesterfield in his last mo-ments, when he ought to have been praying for his soul, bothered himself about the proprieties of the sick-room, and said, "Give Dayboles a chair." Godfrey Kneller spent his last hours on earth in drawing a diagram of his own monu-ment.

Compare the silly and horrible departure of such men with the seraphic glow on the face of Edward Payson, as he said in his last moment, "The breezes of heaven fan me. I float in a sea of glory." Or, with Paul, the apostle, who said in his last hour, "I am now ready to be offered up, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith. Henceforth, there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me." Or compare it with that you witnessed in your own household. Oh, my friends, this world is a false god! It will consume you with the blaze in which it accepts your sacrifice, while the righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance; and when the thrones have fallen, and the monuments have crumbled, and the world has perished, they shall banquet with the conquerors of earth and the hierarchs of heaven.

This is a good day in which to begin

A NEW STYLE OF MEASUREMENT.

How old art thou? You see the Christian way of measuring life and the worldly way of measuring it. I leave it to you to say which is the wisest and best way. The wheel of time has turned very swiftly, and it has hurled us on. The old year has gone. The new year has come. For what you and I have been launched upon it, God only knows.

Now, let me ask you all: Have you made any preparation for the future? You have made preparation for time, my dear brother; have you made any preparation for eternity? Do you wonder that when that man on the Hudson River, in indignation, tore up the tract which was handed to him, and just one word landed on his coat-sleeve—the rest of the tract being pitched into the river—that one word aroused his soul? It was that one word, so long, so broad, so high, so deep—"eternity!" A dying woman, in her last moments, said, "Call it back!" They said, "What do you want?" "Time," she said; "call it back!" Oh, it can-not be called back! We might lose our fortunes and call them back; we might lose our health, and, perhaps, recover it; we might lose our good name and get that back; but time gone is GONE FOREVER.

Some of you, during the past year, made prep-aration for eternity, and it makes no difference to you really, as to the matter of safety, whether you go now or go some other year—whether this year or the next year. Both your feet on the rock, the waves may dash around you. You can say, "God is our refuge and strength—a very present help." You are on the rock, and you may defy all earth and hell to overthrow you. I congratulate you. I give you great joy. It is a happy New Year to you.

I can see no sorrow at all in the fact that our years are going. You hear some people say, "I wish I could go back again to boyhood." I would not want to go back again to boyhood. I am afraid I might make a worse life out of it than I have made. You could not afford to go back to boyhood if it were possible. You might do a great deal worse than you have done. The past is gone! Look out for the future! To all Christians, it is a time of gladness. I am glad the years are going. You are coming on nearer home. Let your countenance light up with the thought. Nearer home!

Now, when one can sooner

is he not to be congratulated? Who wants to be always in the Freshman Class? We study God in this world by the Biblical photograph of Him; but we all know we can in five minutes of interview with a friend get more accurate idea of him than we can by studying him fifty years through pictures or words. The little child that died at six months of age knows more of God than all Andover, and all Princeton, and all New Brunswick.

Does not our common-sense teach us that it is better to be at the centre than to be clear out on the rim of the wheel, holding nervously fast to the tire lest we be suddenly hurled into light, and eternal felicity? Through all kinds of optical instruments trying to peer in through the cracks and the keyholes of heaven—afraid that both doors of the celestial mansion will be swung wide open before our entranced vision—rushing about among the apothecary shops of this world, wondering if this is good for rheumatism, and that is good for neuralgia, and something else is good for a bad cough, lest we be suddenly ushered into a land of everlasting health where the inhabitant never says, "I am sick."

What fools we all are to prefer the circumfer-ence to the centre. What a dreadful thing it would be if we should be suddenly ushered from this wintry world into the Maytime orchards of heaven, and if our pauperism of sin and sorrow should be suddenly broken up by a presentation of an emperor's castle surrounded by parks with springing fountains and paths, up and down which angels of God walk two and two.

We are like persons standing on the cold steps of the National Picture Gallery in London, under umbrellas in the rain, amid the Turners, and the Titians, and the Raphaels. I come to them, and say, "Why don't you go inside the gallery?" "Oh," they say, "we don't know whether we can get in!" I say, "Don't you see the door is open?" "Yes," they say, "but we have been so long on these cold steps, we are so attached to them, we don't like to leave." "But," I say, "it is so much brighter and more beautiful in the gal-lery, you had better go in." "No," they say, "we know exactly how it is out here, but we don't know how it is in there." Oh, let us be glad that we are one year nearer the scene that explains all and irradiates all!

AFRAID TO GO IN

In 1835 the French resolved that at Ghent they would have a kind of musical demonstra-tion that had never been heard of. It would be made up of the chimes of bells and the discharge of cannon. The experiment was a perfect suc-cess. What with the ringing of the bells and the report of the ordnance, the city trembled, and the hills shook with that was as strange as it was overwhelming. With a more glorious accompaniment will God's dear children go into their high residence, when the trumpets shall sound and the Last Day has come. At the signal given, the bells of the towers, and of the lighthouses, and of the cities will strike their sweetness into a last chime that shall ring into the heavens and float off upon the sea, joined by the boom of bursting mine and magazine, augmented by all the cathedral towers of heaven—the harmonies of earth and the sym-phonies of the celestial realm making up one great triumphal march, fit to celebrate the ascent of the redeemed to where they shall shine as the stars forever and forever. With such antici-pations, we can look back without a single re-gret upon the flying years, and forward with ex-ultation to the time when the archangel, with one foot on the sea and the other foot on the land, shall swear by Him that liveth forever and ever that time shall be no longer.

THE LATE SENATOR JOHN A. LOGAN.

JOHN A. LOGAN, whose death, on December 26th, is universally deplored, was born near Murphysboro, Ill., on February 9th, 1826. His father came to America from Ireland and settled in Illinois, in 1823; his mother was a Tennesseean. The ruins of the log-house in which his parents lived are still pointed out to sightseers. In his boyhood he was the best rider in Southern Illinois.

At the outbreak of the Mexican war Logan was one of the first in his native State to enroll himself in the First Regiment of Illinois. He was selected for a lieutenancy and subseqnently was promoted adjutant of the regiment. When the war ended he returned to Illinois and entered an office as a law student. In 1844 he was elected clerk of Jackson County, and retained this office for a year, when he went to the Louisville Law School, to attend a course of lectures. He received his diploma in 1851, and on being admitted to the bar, entered into a law partnership. Before he had been in practice for a year he was elected Prosecuting Attorney for the Third Judicial District of Illinois The same year he was elected to the State Legislature as the representative of Jackson and Franklin Counties. He was twice re-elected, and in 1854 was one of the Presidential electors who cast their votes for Buchanan.

In 1856 Logan was elected to the Twenty-sixth Congress as a Democrat. In the Presidential campaign of 1860 he ran again as a Democrat and was a warm supporter of Stephen A. Douglas. At the next session of Congress he was outspoken against secession. In 1861, when the clash of arms came, he left his seat in Congress and fell into the ranks of the Union troops, who were marching to meet the enemy in Virginia. He was present at the battle of Bull Run, soon after which he returned to Illinois and delivered many speeches in the southern part of the State, for the Union cause. Through his efforts thousands of volunteers rallied around the flag, and he himself enlisted in the Thirty-first Regiment of Infantry.

As colonel of the regiment he mustered into service on September 13th, and was attached to the brigade of General McClernand. At Fort Henry Colonel Logan distinguished himself, and at Fort Donelson he was the foremost in the assault, and received a wound which for a time disabled him from active service. He recovered in time to report to General Grant at Pittsburg Landing, and on March 5th, 1862, was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General of Volunteers. During the siege of Corinth General Logan with his brigade guarded the railroad landing to Jackson, Tenn., and kept open the Federal communication with that point. When, in 1862, his former constituents asked him to return to Congress he declined, preferring to remain in the field. In November, 1862, he was made major-general and placed in command of the Third Division of the Seventeenth Army Corps, under General McPherson. He participated in the battles of Fort Gibson, Raymond, and Champion Hill. At the siege of Vicksburg he held the centre of General McPherson's command, and led the first column into Vicksburg after the capitulation. He was appointed military governor of the city and was presented with a gold medal for his services. In the winter of 1864 he succeeded General Sherman as commander of the Fifteenth Army Corps.

When Sherman began his famous march to the sea General Logan led the Army of the Tennessee and participated in all the battles of that campaign. At Peach-Tree Creek, when Mc Pherson fell, Logan took command, and infusing a desperate valor into his troops, led them against the enemy. He left the army in September to take part in the Presidential campaign, and made speeches through the West for Lincoln. Rejoining his command at Savannah, he marched with Sherman through the Carolinas. In May, 1865, he succeeded General Howard as commander of the Tennessee.

President Johnson offered him the post of minister to Mexico, but this he declined, and in 1866 was elected representative at large from Illinois to Congress by a majority of over sixty thousand. He was one of the managers on the part of the House in the impeachment of President Johnson. In 1868 and 1870 he was re-elected to the House, and in 1871 was elected to the Senate. He lost his seat in 1877, but regained it in 1879. At the Republican Convention of Chicago, in June, 1884, Logan was nominated for the Vice-Presidency.

General Logan was one of the founders of the Grand Army of the Republic, of which he was the first head. His nomination for the Presidency appeared among the possibilities of his future when Death cut down the loyal soldier and patriotic statesman.

IS THE WORLD GROWING BETTER?

The Dark State of Heathendom—Necessity for Increased Missionary Effort—The Gloomy Condition of Christendom—Politics—The Jesuits—A Strange Story Current in Rome—The Rapid Growth of Godlessness—The Increase of Lawless Agitation—The Story of the Trumpeter—"The Coming of the Lord Draws Near."

THIS question is one which is often heard, and is presented in various forms. Much depends upon our range and altitude of vision as to how the question can be answered by ourselves, individually, but the only trustworthy standpoint is not to be sought for in concurrent phenomena alone, but in the prophetic Scriptures, of whose accuracy phenomena are only proofs and illustrations.

Undoubtedly the present century may fairly claim credit for extensive evangelistic effort. Both at home and abroad attention has been called to the masses lying outside the Christian Church, and missions of various kinds have earnestly sought to reach and rescue them. Nor have the results been altogether disappointing. According to statistics, apparently reliable, within the last hundred years no less than three millions have been

WON FROM HEATHENDOM.

At first sight such remarkable success seems full of promise, and it may well encourage all Christian workers to go forth to their tasks with renewed energy and inspiriting hope. But there is another side to the picture, one, too, which seems to have been generally overlooked. In a most instructive paper, which appeared in the July number of the British and Foreign Evangelical Review, the Rev. James Johnstone makes the announcement, which will take most people by surprise, "that the number of heathen and Mohammedans now in the world is vastly greater than when Protestant missions began a hundred years ago. The heathen and Mohammedan population of the world is more by two hundred millions, while the converts and their families do not amount to three millions. He thinks, nevertheless, that our gains are quite in proportion to our expenditure, and he points the lesson with due emphasis, that missions must be made much more of in the future than they have been in the past, if any satisfactory progress is to be expected. Still, it is and one for which many were not prepared, that the increase of the heathen, during a century of remarkable Christian activity, is numerically about seventy times greater than that of the converts. We have heard many schemes for converting the world in a limited period of time, but we fear historic facts are all against them. The comparative slowness of our progress is, however, no excuse for indolence or indifference. Nay, rather, it is a trumpet-call to redoubled zeal and worthier action. Mr. Johnstone admirably illustrates this, and is careful to show unto his readers a more excellent way. Still the fact remains. In spite of all our methods and men, our missions fall enormously short of keeping step with the growth of heathendom. The light does shine somewhat, yet all around the darkness deepens.

If we turn our attention to Christendom, the outlook is no less gloomy. Day by day cool-headed students of European politics threaten us with a conflagration which, beginning in the East, is likely to be stayed only by the waters of the Atlantic. The most confident assure us it must come some day, and they are only hopeful to escape it now because the German Chancellor does not desire war, and in their judgment Prince Bismarck is the only statesman in Europe who can insure peace.

At Rome also the Jesuits have triumphed. At one time it was thought that Leo XIII. had liberal tendencies, and it was prophesied that he would reverse the deeds of his predecessor. The same promise has appeared more than once in the early years of a new Pope. But the dawn never brightens into day. It is only the gloaming which deepens into the dark. In connection with the sudden change of policy which took place a few days ago, there is

A STRANGE STORY CURRENT IN ROME.

It is said there that the Jesuits do not scruple to employ poison to rid themselves of troublesome enemies. They always, it is added, hold in reserve an antidote so as to leave a place of repentance for the victim. If, after the administration of the poison, he is brought to a right mind, the antidote is forthcoming and no harm is done. It was noticed that the Pope's unexpected reconciliation with the Jesuits coincided with his quick recovery from a sudden and sharp illness, and instantly the inference was drawn that he had been the subject of a severe experiment. On the truth or falsehood of the rumor we can pronounce no opinion. But that a body of men professedly religious should be thought capable of such a crime, and that by their nearest neighbors, who know them best, is not without significance.

Another exceedingly ominous sign of the times is

THE RAPID GROWTH OF GODLESSNESS.

There has always been an appalling amount of practical atheism among us; but of recent years this has more openly and extensively allied itself with avowed unbelief. Behind this, and even within many of the churches, there has been a steady, though stealthy, loosening of the bonds of the common faith, whereby they were once united. Doctrines are now boldly challenged, and in some cases bitterly denied, to which a willing and hearty assent was given a few years ago. Not a few rejoice in this unsettlement of creeds, and hail it as a token of intelligent advance. No doubt it is an advance of some kind; but, whether intelligent or in what direction, time will show.

It is told that when an ambassador from some semi-civilized country gave not long ago, one of the dishes was badly cooked, and the barbarian, in a loud voice, gave order for the instant execution of the unfortunate cook. His guests at once remonstrated with him, and assured him that if the sentence were carried out he would be tried for murder. Turning round upon them with indignation sparkling in his eyes, he replied, "And yet you call this a free country!" Socialists also ought to be taught that freedom has its limits, and cannot be allowed to endanger the existence of the State. If they are permitted to preach war upon society without rebuke, such freedom of speech, hitherto disallowed, will surely and speedily bring its own punishment.

Under no circumstances is it either safe or right to encourage a policy of public plunder, and any attempt to embitter one class against another should be suppressed with a firm hand. It is not difficult, especially in hard times, to rouse evil passions; to allay or appease them when roused may prove a very formidable task. When it can only be met by suppression or submission. The first method may be painful to the tender-hearted; the second is a direct encouragement to brute force, and will certainly foster the growth of crime. Instead of setting men free who have been proved guilty of inciting the populace to take up arms for the spoliation of their more prosperous neighbors, they ought rather to be credited with the mischief their language was calculated to produce, and condemned accordingly. The old fable of the trumpeter has not lost its point. When taken prisoner he pleaded for his life as a non-combatant. He was neither girt with sword nor spear. His captors refused his prayer, reminding him that, although he did not actually fight with his own hands, yet by his trumpeting he encouraged and directed those who did.

Thus in whatever direction we turn our eyes, the present outlook is gloomy enough. To students of Scripture this occasions no surprise, for they have been led to expect it. But we may look up. A mightier Hand than that of kings and politicians is at work. Though the predicted "time of trouble" is rapidly approaching, "now is our salvation nearer than when we believed." Co-existent with a marked decline of faith in evangelical religion, and of zeal in advocating the interests of Christ's kingdom, there is still "a remnant" who retain their faith in God and their loyalty to His Word unimpaired. The lines of truth and error are becoming more clearly defined as "the coming of the Lord draws near."

CAIN AND ABEL.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 16, Gen. 4 : 3-16. Golden Text, ver. 9.

The Fruit of the Knowledge of Evil—The Discord in Human and Physical Relations—Mercifully Kept from Immortality—Expelled from Eden—The First Child Born—The Disappointed Hopes of Parents—Why Abel Kept Sheep—The Institution of Sacrifice—The Defect in Cain's Offering—Self-Centred Religions—What Cain Forgot—The First Death—The Curse on Cain.

THE coveted knowledge of evil, which a loving Father would have withheld from His new created children, began speedily to bear its fruit. Hitherto everything that God had made was "very good." God "hath made everything beautiful in His time" (Eccl. 3 : 11); the touch of the great Master-workman was perceptible in all His creation. Hitherto everything that was created served its true purpose. Man was made for God, "This people have I formed for Myself" (Isa. 43 : 21), and as His image and reflection in the universe. The green herb was made for the use of man, and there was nothing in the animal or vegetable world which was hurtful, poisonous, or dangerous. God had given every green herb "for meat" (Gen. 1 : 29), therefore nothing was poisonous, nothing purely medicinal. God had created Eve to be the helpmeet for Adam; and thus God and man, man and woman, man and beast, man and the green herb—all held normal and blessed relations to each other. In all God's fair creation there had not been a discord.

But with the knowledge of evil came discord between God and man, and then through mutual accusation between man and woman; and there began to grow evil plants, thorns and thistles, which no doubt comprise poisonous plants; and then there came also, as subsequent history and the experience of our own times shows us, noisome beasts (Exodus 8 : 2, 3, 21; 10 : 12–14; Lev. 26 : 22; Ezek. 14 : 21), which God declares to be one of His "four sore judgments." Thus the knowledge of evil was far from theoretical; sin had disorganized all which God had created in such beauty and harmony and peace; sin had "entered into the world, and death by sin" (Rom. 5 : 12).

God's tenderness led Him to preserve Adam and Eve from eating, in their fallen condition, of the tree of life, and so perpetuating their misery eternally. He sent them forth from the Garden of Eden which He had planted, to prove whether, with the knowledge which they had sought, they could improve upon His work. They must rule in a creation in which they had of misrule, and in which the products of that coveted knowledge should be sorrow, shame, fear, and bitter disappointment.

Into such a world the first child was born. It may be that when Eve said, "I have gotten a man from the Lord," or (R. V.), "with the Lord," she believed that the time was come for the fulfilment of God's promise that the Seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent. But the knowledge of evil was yet to bear fruit. Our first parents, as yet, knew little of the evil of sin, and in order to understand and value the salvation of that Seed of the woman, they must know from what they were to be saved. It is natural for parents to hope and expect that their children shall be an improvement upon themselves—they desire and expect from their children a life which shall be the result of their own lengthened experience. But how often are parents disappointed and humbled in their children! How often are children an exaggeration of their parents in their faults! We know nothing of Cain's education, nor yet of that of Abel. All we know is that, when they were old enough, each had his avocation: Cain became a tiller of the ground, Abel a keeper of sheep. As animal food was then unknown, we can only infer that God had taught fallen man to offer sacrifice (probably immediately on the curse being pronounced and the promise of the Seed of the woman being given, when beasts must have been slain for Adam and Eve to be clothed with their skins), and that it was for this purpose that Abel kept his sheep. Of the height, appearance, talents, etc., of these young men nothing is revealed. God wrote their history, and He records that which endures in each man's life—viz.: that which concerns his relation to God; nothing else is worth recording. Both of the brothers had a consciousness that both saw that something was due to Him; neither was an atheist. But in their way of approaching God there was a marked distinction between them. Cain "brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord." This was the beginning and the end of his relations to God; it was all on one side; it was all Cain, nothing of God. Cain reminds us of the many who say, "I pray as well as I know how; I do the best I can; I give all I can afford." Theirs is a religion which consists in what man tries to be or to do in order to recommend himself to God; but from beginning to end there is nothing of God in it. You hear of plenty of good deeds, but nothing as to whether these are desired by God, or whether they are forced on Him without any knowledge of His will. He would have men to be "not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is" (Eph. 5 : 17). Alas! this their own righteousness which they seek to establish (Rom. 10 : 3) is but "as filthy rags" (Isa. 64 : 6) in the eyes of a holy God; there is no faith in it, and "whatsoever is not of faith is sin" (Rom. 14 : 23).

Abel "brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof." There was nothing of Abel to be seen in the bleeding sacrifice; the life poured out spoke of a coming Saviour. Faith sees God, and Abel saw God's redemption in that sinless lamb, the offering for his sin. There was nothing in Abel's sacrifice to recommend him to God; it spoke of what God was to him. "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts" (Heb. 11 : 4). All religions but that of the Scriptures—Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Roman Catholicism, the Greek Church, Ritualism—are systems which to his piety, his fasting, his prayer, his self-restraint, his benevolence; in all these the natural man's religion consist; it is a self-centred religion, and the God who is worshipped is not, in point of fact, so much regarded as is the worship offered to Him. But the man who has faith in God gives Him credit, sees Him in everything, cannot be satisfied without answers from Him and communion with Him. To the man of faith the prayer is the lesser thing, the answer the greater; the devotion which actuates him is nothing in his eyes in comparison of the worthiness of Him to whom he devotes himself. He sees God, deals with God, yields before God's thoughts.

A man's own righteousness may be very gratifying to himself, but it can never put away his past sins nor keep him from temptation in the future; it leaves him still in himself, "having no hope, and without God in the world" (Eph. 2 : 12). Cain was in this condition; he did all he could, he offered his sacrifice, and trusted in his good intentions; but no response came from the side of God; an ominous silence reigned between Him and Cain, while Abel "obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts" (Heb. 11 : 4). Cain was indignant—"Abel was no better than he; could any one have done better?" But Cain had forgotten he approached without sacrifice, without recognition of sin; he approached God as an equal. Abel came with sacrifice; in the bleeding lamb he confessed his sin and the mercy of God who should give His Son to die for sinners. Abel came as the sinner, and was received; Cain came as the righteous, and was rejected. So "Cain was very wroth, and his countenance fell."

Although Cain had not taken God's way to draw near to Him, yet God drew near to Cain. "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord" (Isa. 1 : 18). With the truest love of a Father, He appeals, "Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted (or lifted up)? and if thou doest not well, sin (or the sin offering) lieth at the door." There was one right way—it was the way of faith, the way of Abel; but this the proud heart of Cain would not be brought to accept, although the Lord showed him it was the only way to retain what he desired—the ascendency, as the elder, over Abel. "Unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt reign over him." Cain had inherited from his parents that desire for independence of God which led to the fall. Bitter with his supposed wrongs, "Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him." Death was a part of the knowledge of evil which man had not yet experienced. Cain only knew by the work of his own murderous hand how life became extinct. Death is not natural, but abnormal; it was the first instalment of the curse; and no wonder that the first death was by violence! Alas! how the terrible knowledge of evil was on the increase. Again God speaks to Cain, "Where is Abel thy brother?" Oh, the fearful enmity against God manifested in the sarcastic answer, "I know not: Am I my brother's keeper?" as though to imply, "If Thou hadst kept him this could not have happened." How truly is

"THE CARNAL MIND ENMITY AGAINST GOD" (Rom. 8 : 7)! "What hast thou done? the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto Me from the ground." And Cain, who would not come near to God for blessing, was forced, whether he would or no, to hear the curse of the God he rejected, the curse which made the very earth to be at war with him; his tilling of the ground should be unsuccessful; he should never find a resting-place, "a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth." Poor, lost Cain! despairing, but still unhumbled, he cries, "My punishment is greater than I can bear. Behold, Thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from Thy face shall I be hid; . . . and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me." Oh, the love of God! Cain did not ask pardon, therefore He could not give it; but He "set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him. And Cain went out from the presence of the Lord."

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

AN unprecedented number of new subscriptions and renewals are coming to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD just now. Each of these is promptly entered to the credit of the person by whom it is sent, and the paper will be duly mailed; but it is impossible to keep pace in correcting the list with the rate at which the amounts come in. It happens, therefore, that in a few cases the date on the wrapper is not changed immediately, and even a postal card notifying a subscriber that his subscription has expired may be received by him after he has sent his renewal. He will please understand that this is an inadvertence occasioned by the unusual pressure of business and accept an apology in advance.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Happy New Year, in the Highest and best sense of the words, is the cordial and sincere wish of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for all its readers. To many of them the greeting is that of an old and valued friend, whose regular weekly visits have been a source of pleasure and profit for over eight years. There is no egotism in the statement, for it is made on the authority of thousands of subscribers who are kind enough to say that they love and prize the paper more every year, and declare that it grows better as it grows older. Modesty is not a common characteristic of the press, and it would not be a characteristic of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, if it appropriated the praise so lavishly bestowed upon it by its readers. The kind words are very welcome, very cheering and encouraging, but they do not minister to conceit; they simply mean that in answer to the prayers of the proprietors of the paper, of those who work upon it, and of a host of Christian friends in this and other lands, God is using it for His glory and the public good. Recognizing this, the only logical attitude is one of humility and thankfulness. There is no higher honor than to be used in the Master's service, and that honor is the only one to which the paper aspires. The testimonies which have been sent during the past few weeks by subscribers renewing for another year are very precious; some of them will be published shortly. Many of the subscribers have been praying that its circulation may increase. It is gratifying to be able to tell them that their prayers are being answered. Never in its history has THE CHRISTIAN HERALD visited so many homes as it does to-day, and, judging by the number of renewals already made, and the number of new subscribers already entered, it would appear that this year's list will be as largely in excess of that of last year as last year's was in excess of that of 1885. It is thus with renewed hope and gratitude that the journal enters on the new year. Personally, the editor thanks subscribers whose grateful words are addressed directly to him. It is impossible to reply to so large a number individually, but he is no less grateful for the encouragement they give. While excusing himself from satisfying curiosity, and desiring still to sink his personality in the journal, he is happy to assure those who have made inquiry that no change has occurred in the editorial department, and that the hand which writes these words wrote the words which in 1878 first introduced the journal to the American public. He trusts that he may still have an interest in the prayers of his readers.

Improved Business Prospects are Announced by Bradstreet's, the great authority in commercial affairs. It states that "the times are better" than they have been on any recent New Year's day. The number of failures was less last year than usual, and they were not so disastrous. From 1881 to 1884 they steadily increased in number and in the amount of deficiency. Since 1884 they have steadily decreased in both characteristics. The iron and steel industry, which is accepted as the best index of the condition of trade, is now solidly prosperous, and throughout last year maintained its activity. The prospects for this year may, therefore, be considered hopeful.

The Secretary of the Treasury Issued Last week the one hundred and forty-fifth call for bonds. It is for ten millions of the three per cents, and matures on the first of next month. The call has been expected, so it will not have a material effect on the financial situation. It does, however, release ten millions from the Treasury, and gives point to the discussion now becoming each day more urgent of the utility of keeping up the heavy taxation in the face of the rapidly diminishing public debt.

An Extension of Civil Service Reform to the War Department appears to be needed. The Secretary of War last week administered what appears to be a well-merited snub to General Hazen, whose conduct has previously brought him into collision with his superiors. The trouble this time is the removal of an officer to an obscure post in Arizona. This removal was the second the same officer has experienced, and both were attended with curious coincidences. Last winter the officer gave evidence before a Congressional committee which General Hazen did not approve. Immediately afterward General Hazen assigned him to duty at San Francisco. There the young man distinguished himself, and Major-General Howard applied for permission to attach him to his staff. Instead of granting the request, General Hazen removed the officer to Arizona. It may be hoped that, if personal spite dictated these removals, measures will be promptly taken to prevent their recurrence.

General William W. Loring Died in New York on Thursday last. He had spent the summer in Chicago with two of his nieces, and was in his usual health when he came to New York for a short visit. On Wednesday of last week he was seized with pneumonia, and in twenty-four hours he was dead. The general was seventy years of age, and in his long career had passed through many strange experiences. He entered the United States Army at the age of seventeen, fought in the Seminole War, and took part as captain of mounted rifles in the Mexican War. When the Civil War broke out he resigned and entered the Confederate service, in which he became brigadier-general. He served in West Virginia in 1862, was at Vicksburg in 1863, and with General Bragg at Chattanooga and the subsequent campaign. He afterward went to Egypt and entered the army of the Khédive, serving for several years with distinction. The Khédive made him a pasha, and loaded him with gifts. In 1878 he returned to America, and since then has lived in retirement.

Europe Was Startled on Thursday by a Report published in the London Times on the authority of M. Blowitz, its Paris correspondent, that Russia and Germany signed a direct alliance a fortnight ago. "The Czar," adds the correspondent, "was decided in taking this course by the attitude manifested toward Russia by Count Kalnoky, Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs, and by the expectation that M. Floquet would be made Prime-Minister of France." "This shows," concludes the correspondent, "that the reported alliance between Russia and France was but a mere chimera." The report, though not generally credited, produces uneasiness. If true, it implies an attempt to bulldoze all Europe. It is, however, an indication of peace. The union of two such powers as Russia and Germany would be too strong to be defied by any combination of other nations. They might impose their will on the whole continent. That Austria is making gigantic preparations for war in the spring is evident in spite of the rumor. England, France, and Italy are also getting their armies into a state of efficiency, as if the statesmen who know the actual situation expect war. They speak of peace, but their acts belie their words.

M. Grevy, President of the French Republic, held his customary reception on New Year's Day. The ministers of foreign governments called upon him and tendered their congratulations. M. Grévy, replying, referred to the good relations that had existed between France and all the other powers for a period long enough to be noted in the life of our generation. He believed that peace would be prolonged by the wisdom of the several governments for the happiness of the nations. Every one hopes that M. Grévy's belief is well founded, but the general activity in the arsenals of the nations does not encourage the hope.

The Heaviest Snow Storm Reported in Many years visited London last week. For three days the city was cut off from telegraphic communication on the east and south, owing to the snapping of telegraph wires and the overturning of the poles by the gale. Communication with the Continent by the submarine cable was also interrupted, and the cable messages to this country had to be carried to the coast by rail. The severity of the storm is almost unprecedented. Americans in London describe it as a regular blizzard, such as we are familiar with, but of which the English public has had no experience.

A Solution of the Difficulty in Which the British administration has been placed by the resignation of Lord Randolph Churchill was not found up to the close of last week. Lord Hartington, who returned from Rome at the request of Lord Salisbury, declined to enter the Conservative Cabinet. He promised, however, to give the Conservatives his support in Parliament, and was informed of the character of the programme of the administration. Lord Salisbury has offered the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer vacated by Lord Randolph to Mr. Goschen, who has asked for time to consider the offer. Mr. Goschen is admitted to be an excellent financier, and though he claims to be a Liberal in politics, his support of Mr. Gladstone has been variable for some years past, and it has often happened that he has been found in the same lobby as the Conservatives. The Conservative press has urged the Premier to make such concessions to Lord Randolph as would induce him to withdraw his resignation and return to the Cabinet, but Lord Salisbury scornfully rejected the advice. On the other hand, negotiations between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Chamberlain for reunion are stated to be progressing. The crafty Birmingham man, who is competing with Lord Hartington for succession to Mr. Gladstone, urged that nobleman to enter the Conservative cabinet, apparently believing that the step would preclude him from becoming a Liberal premier.

The Trial of the Five Professors of Andover Theological Seminary on the charge of teaching doctrines inconsistent with the creed of the founders of that institution was commenced on December 28th in Boston. President Seelye, of Amherst College, presided, and Drs. Eustis and Marshall, the other members of the Board of Visitors, sat with him. The five professors are Drs. Smyth, Tucker, Harris, Hinks, and Churchill. The main charge against them is that of teaching that there is a probation after death, and also a heretical conception of the Trinity. The defence is that their divergence from the orthodox creed is not sufficient to constitute a legal warrant for their removal, inasmuch as the rules of the seminary prescribe only four causes on which a professor can be removed. They are misdemeanor, heterodoxy, incapacity, or neglect of official duty. The trial is exciting much interest throughout the Congregational Church.

An Eleven Days' Evangelistic Mission has been held at Salem, O., by Messrs Brown and Avis with much success. The quiet town has been deeply stirred, and God's blessing has attended the effort. As in other places in which Mr. Brown has spoken, the infidels have been powerfully affected. His pungent remarks have penetrated their circles and have been the subject of discussion. The meetings for men only were largely attended. On some occasions the audience numbered nine hundred. The Bible readings were also highly valued. Large audiences were present on each occasion and listened with rapt attention. The singing of Mr. Avis was an attraction, and its effect in solemnizing as well as enlivening the meetings was remarkable.

An Interesting Christmas Festival was Held at the Hebrew-Christian Church in St. Mark's Place, New York, on December 28th. The Jewish children in the Sunday-school connected with the Rev. Jacob Freshman's church assembled to the number of over two hundred. They recited portions of Scripture, among which the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah was a favorite. This was rendered with remarkable accuracy and feeling. Mr. Ralph Wells delivered an appropriate address, and Mrs. Freshman distributed prizes for proficiency and good conduct. The little ones appeared to be very intelligent. They evidently entered into the spirit of the festival, and enjoyed themselves thoroughly. This Sunday-school is becoming an important feature of Mr. Freshman's work, and the fruits of it are most encouraging.

Revival Services have been Held during the past month in Northern Vermont with remarkable results. A correspondent who is a citizen of that State describes them as affecting the whole community. The meetings have been conducted by Mr. William McGann, a young preacher of Irish parentage, who has had no special training for the work, but is full of zeal and fervor. At West Enosburgh, at Enosburgh Centre, and other small villages great good has resulted from his labors, and the work shows no signs of abatement.

An Announcement of a Series of Addresses by Mr. W. M. F. Round, Secretary of the Prison Association of New York, has been sent to us with a request for publication. With the object of arousing the attention of the Christian community of New York to the condition of prisoners and to the importance of aiding such as desire to reform, Mr. Round will speak at the following churches on the dates named: On Sunday, January 9th, at 7.30 P.M., at St. Paul's Reformed Church, One Hundred and Forty-sixth Street and Third Avenue (Rev. H. Du Bois, pastor). On January 16th, at 7.30 P.M., at St. George's Church, Stuyvesant Square (Rev. W. S. Rainsford, D.D., rector). January 23d, 10.30 A.M., Washington Heights Presbyterian Church, Tenth Avenue corner of West One Hundred and Fifty-fifth Street (Rev. John C. Bliss, pastor). January 23d, 7.30 P.M., Collegiate Reformed Church of Harlem, One Hundred and Twenty-first Street and Third Avenue (Rev. J. Elmendorf, pastor). January 30th, 7.30 P.M., Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity, 47 West Twenty-first Street (Rev. G. F. Krotel, pastor).

A Speed of Two Miles a Minute was Attained by a wild-cat train on the Rocky Mountains recently. A traveller who arrived in Toronto on December 30th by the Canadian Pacific Railway states that on his way he was a passenger in one of two cars which broke loose from the train while being hauled up the steepest grade in Kicking Horse Pass, which is one inch to the foot for nearly two miles, and commenced a mad career down the mountain side. The brakes were frozen, and could not be applied with effect. Some of the twenty occupants in the cars tried to rise, but the speed was so great that they could not stir from their seats. The cars reached a safety switch, a distance of two miles from the place they broke loose from the locomotive, in one minute. The passenger car caught the safety switch and was piled on the opposite incline a complete wreck. The baggage car, which did not contain any passengers, went on down the main line, and did not leave the track. A number of passengers were killed, and others received probably fatal injuries. Some miraculously escaped almost uninjured. In the spiritual catastrophes over which the Church mourns there are none so rapid and so deplorable as in the case of those persons who have been drawn very near the heights of the kingdom of God, but whose connection with Christ has never been fully perfected by the new birth (II Peter 2 : 20, 21).

A Boston Clergyman was Mistaken for a tramp a few days ago. Having engaged to preach at Providence, R. I., he spent the previous night with a friend who resides a few miles from that city. He rose early to set out on his walk to Providence, having conscientious scruples about riding on the Lord's day. Either he missed his way or the journey was longer than he had anticipated, for he grew weary and hungry before arriving at his destination. He accordingly stopped at a house on the wayside, rang the bell, and asked the motherly-looking woman who came to the door if he could rest awhile and have a glass of milk and a slice of bread. "Well," she answered, "I suppose you can; but it does seem as though a big, strong man like you might earn his living by work, and not beg for it." The clergyman entered into explanations which satisfied the good woman and secured him a hospitable reception; but he says that his experience will make him more considerate of tramps in future. This is not the first time that experience has led to men becoming more compassionate. So generally is this fact realized that persons needing sympathy naturally turn to one who has himself suffered. This confidence have all who come to Christ (Heb. 4 : 15).

Is the Bartholdi Statue Safe? The Question is being asked somewhat anxiously this week, for a few days ago Major David P. Heap, the Engineer-Secretary of the Lighthouse Board, advised the Government at Washington to close the uplifted right arm against visitors who now pass through it by a ladder to the gallery around the torch. The arm, the major thinks, will break in the not distant future, and perhaps carry a number of sightseers to certain death if steps are not taken to prevent adventurous persons from climbing through it to the torch. He reports that he and a brother officer undertook the journey one morning. When on the platform, the major says, his friend shook the arm so hard that he thought they would both be dropped from the torch. Major Heap therefore advises that if the statue is placed under the control of the board only the points of observation around the head be used by visitors. The fears which this report has aroused have been partially allayed by General C. P. Stone, who declares that the statue is perfectly safe, and is stronger than the statue of St. Charles Borromeo, which has stood for nearly two centuries. This question ought to be immediately set at rest by some properly qualified person, for large numbers are daily climbing to the dizzy height to gaze on the unrivalled spectacle visible from that point. There are moral and spiritual heights to which men in all ages have tried to climb. Only those have done so safely who have put their trust in the "mighty arm" and "high right hand" of God (Ps. 89 : 13, 14).

An Octogenarian Husband Applied for a divorce on December 23d at the court of Kansas City, Mo. The Kansas City Times, reporting the case, says that it was fifty years last Christmas Day since the couple were married, and they have lived amicably together during all that period until a few months ago. The trouble commenced by the wife insisting on her husband occupying a room on the first floor of their house, while she slept in the second story. The wife said that she did this as a protection from burglars, but the husband suspected that at last, after fifty years of companionship, she had grown tired of him. Finally his suspicions were substantiated. One morning the wife, who is seventy-five years of age, left the house and never returned, and now the husband wants a divorce. What the wife's defence may be is not yet known, but it may be supposed that she had some very cogent reasons for severing the connection of half a century. It is never so with the aged Christian. New disciples may desert their Lord, but those who have walked with Him for many years love Him better every year (Ps. 71 : 5, 9).

A Wedding Engagement has been Cancelled in Brooklyn, N. Y., under peculiar circumstances. The expectant bridegroom, who resides in a distant city, had been somewhat boastful of his wealth during the period of courtship, and among other promises he made was one of a magnificent set of diamonds which he would present to the bride on her wedding morning. On the night before the wedding the young lady learned that the gift would not be made, and she immediately took the young man aside and questioned him. No, he said, he had not brought the diamonds, but she would surely have them after marriage; the jeweller had not finished the setting of the gems. The bride-elect considered the matter, and her decision was, "No diamonds, no wife." There was a quarrel; the bridegroom in high dudgeon quitted the city, and the friends were informed that there would be no wedding. It would be rash to regard the young lady as mercenary. It is possible that she believed the young man's failure to keep this promise to be evidence of his general untrustworthiness. If so she was justified in rejecting him. The Bible represents Christ as a bridegroom who is often rejected, but none who reject Him do so on that ground. He is "faithful and true" (Rev. 3 : 14).

An Outcast Has Been Vindicated After Death in Maryland. A little more than two years ago in Frederick, Md., a jealous wife started a report which soon found acceptance in society, and which was magnified by gossips who repeated it. The report injuriously affected the reputation of a young lady, and finally completely destroyed it. She was exposed to contumely and scorn, and at last was driven from her native place to hide herself among strangers. The suspected husband also disappeared about the same time, and then the gossips believed that the story was confirmed, and even her own father notified her that she must never again expect a shelter under his roof. She earned a livelihood with difficulty until Christmas Day last, when she died an outcast, more from sorrow than anything else. At her own desire, expressed before death, an autopsy was performed, and her innocence was established. Her manner of life after leaving home was also blameless, as was proved by the testimony of the people with whom she lived. Her corpse has been carried to the home that was closed against her in life, and those who maligned her suffer remorse. For such as she—and there are more than is generally believed—the world has no comfort, but they may find it in the consciousness of an Omniscient God (Ps. 15 : 1–3).

"AND WE ARE:"

A JEWEL FROM THE REVISED VERSION.

"And we are."—1 JOHN 3 : 1.

Three Dropped Words—The Assertion of Sonship—I. The Wonder of Being Called Sons of God—By whom Called—Acknowledged of the Father—The Elder Brother—The Witness of the Spirit—The Witness of Men—William Penn Among the Indians—What is Involved—Love—Bestowed upon Men—II. The Wonder of Being Sons—What it Imports—Trustfulness—A Crisis at the Orphanage—Chastening as a Sign—The Vital Question.

DEAR friends, the most of my text will be found in our Old Version; but for once I shall ask you to look elsewhere for a part of it.

A genuine fragment of inspired Scripture has been dropped by our older translators, and it is too precious to be lost. Did not our Lord say, "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost"? The half lost portion of our text is restored to us in the Revised Version. Never did a translation of the New Testament fail more completely than this Revised Version has done as a book for general reading; but as an assistant to the student it deserves honorable mention, despite its faults. It exhibits here and there special beauties, and has, no doubt, in certain places brought into notice words of sacred Scripture which had fallen out; we have a notable instance in my present text. Turn to the First Epistle of John, the third chapter, at the first verse:

"Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God."

So far we keep to our Authorized Version. Now read the Revised Version, and note the words added—

"Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called children of God: and such we are."

The word "such" is not in the original. We therefore leave it out, and then we get the words—and we are. There are only two words in the Greek—"and we are." That the addition is correct I have not the slightest doubt. Those authorities upon which we depend—those manuscripts which are best worthy of notice—have these words; and they are to be found in the Vulgate, the Alexandrian, and several other versions. They ought never to have dropped out. In the judgment of the most learned, and those best to be relied on, these are veritable words of inspiration. So far as doctrine is concerned, it does not matter much whether they are or are not in the original text, because we get the same words further on. "Beloved, now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that, if He shall be manifested, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him even as He is."

The point that struck me as being most worthy of notice was that when the apostle had said, "We shall be called children of God," he then adds—We are not only to be called so, but we are so. The glory of it is that we now have this thing. We have it in possession: "and we are." This little interjected assertion, "and we are," brings most forcibly before my own mind the truth of our present sonship toward God—"That we should be called children of God: and we are."

Let me now introduce to you my text as I mean to preach from it:

"Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called children of God: and we are."

I. First, then, behold

of our being called the sons of God. Who calls us so? That is the wonder. Men take upon themselves great names without any right to them. There are degrees among men that are degrees of shame, because the persons who wear them were never justly entitled to them. It is one thing for us to call ourselves children of God, and another thing for the Father to bestow His love so that we are truly called the sons of God. Whence comes this princely title? Who calls the saints the sons of God?

The Father Himself does so. He speaks unto them as unto children. He deals with them as with sons. He is pleased in infinite love to bid them say, "Our Father;" and He answers to them by calling them children and heirs. He calls us His children; and we are. Who has called us the sons of God? Jesus Himself, the firstborn among many brethren, has called us so. Did He not speak of "My Father and your Father"? What did He mean when He was not ashamed to call us brethren? Everywhere our dear Lord and Master speaks of us as belonging to the one family of which He is the Head. By sweetly taking us into union with Himself Jesus practically calls us sons of God; and we are. The Holy Spirit also dwells in all the heirs of heaven, and thereby calls them sons of God. He bears witness with our spirit that we are the sons of God; and it is He who is given to us to be "the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." Thus Father, Son, and Holy Ghost call us the children of God; and we are.

Yes, and I trust that there are some here who can modestly say that they have even for they are called the children of God even by men who do not know much about the mysteries of the new birth. "Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God:" they shall not only be so, but they shall extort from others the confession that they are so. I am sure that when William Penn dealt so kindly and peacefully with the Indians when everybody else was false to them, the untutored man of the woods felt that the Quakers were children of the Great Spirit. Their peacefulness was a mark of their descent from the God of peace. Any man or woman who shall be well known to bear injuries with patience, and to make no return but that of doing good for evil, shall be recognized, even by scoffers and blasphemers, as a child of God.

Behold, then, how God's people are called the sons of God, called with a divine calling, to which all things bear corroborating witness, so that they believe, and are sure, and in reply to all voices attesting their sonship they cry, "and we are."

Inquire next, what is involved in this calling them to be the children of God? What is there conspicuous in it? Read the passage. "Behold, what manner of—"

WHAT IS THE WORD?

"What manner of gift the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the children of God"? It might have been so written, and have been quite correct; but it is not so written. "Behold what manner of honor the Father hath bestowed"? No, no! "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us;" as much as to say that the adopting of a man to be a son of God is an act which involves so much of love that you are bidden specially to fix your eyes on the love of it, and to notice its manner. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called children of God."

Now just think for a minute what intense love is manifested to that man who is favored to be called a child of God. It is love in the highest degree. What love you would have in your heart if you were to take a wanton and malicious enemy, and say, "You shall be my son!" If one had wronged you, and despised you, and defied your authority, and you should say to him, "You shall be my child from this time forth," what a singular deed of love would this be! Yet it might not be very much for you to do, my dear friend; for you may be, after all, nothing very great; it would, however, be the utmost your love could devise. Only think of what it must be for God—even that Infinite and Eternal Spirit—to say, "Thou shalt be My child. I will take thee, though thou art an heir of wrath, and make thee Mine." Herein, indeed, is love, love worth the beholding.

Now, while I am asking for your wonderment in answer to the questions—Who calls us sons? And what is involved in the call? I will reply to another question: "Who are the persons thus called sons?" "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called children of God." It is and women. We are poor creatures when we make the best of ourselves; and yet He calls us sons of God. And this is true, recollect, of that poor man who does not know where to-morrow's bread shall come from. You say he is not respectable, but I say that he is right honorable, for God has called him His son. I mean that man whose name was never heard of, who lives in a room in a back street, and when he dies will be buried in the corner of the cemetery, "unwept, unhonored, and unsung." Yes, God has bestowed this manner of love upon him—that he is called one of His sons. Ay, I mean that poor consumptive girl; I mean that lame, decrepit youth; I mean that blind man who begs his bread. Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on such as these. Poor cottagers, hard-working men and women, cobblers and tinkers, and chimney-sweepers, and navvies—such as these He calls the sons of God when He has renewed them by His grace. Ah! and I mean those who are lying yonder in the hospital and in the workhouse infirmary, who are nearing their last hour upon beds found for them by charity. These are God's children if they believe in Jesus.

Yet the wonder rises a stage higher when we recollect that these are not only men, but sinners. Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us sinful ones, that we should be called the children of God. You know in Ezekiel cast out in the open field, defiled in its own blood, and how He that passed by looked on it, and said, "Live," and washed it, and swaddled it, and fed it. It is just what the Lord has done for us poor sinful men and women. We were cast out under condemnation; but behold what manner of love He hath bestowed upon us guilty ones to make us children of God. Alas! even after we are made His sons we are not free from evil; we still need that abundant grace should have patience with us. Still do we grieve Him by lukewarmness and backsliding, and yet He calls us children. Behold, what manner of love He hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God.

There! I do not feel as if I wanted to preach about it. I long to sit down, and cry over it for very joy of heart. That ever God should have put me among His children shall be my everlasting wonderment. How could He love such a vain, frail, sinful, troubled creature, full of all manner of infirmities! Yet the Spirit of adoption makes me cry with boldness, "Doubtless Thou art my Father." I cannot help it. I know that I am His, and I dare not question it. But what manner of love He hath bestowed on me! Do you not say the same?

And, once more, let me just go over the ground again, and show you what is connected with being called the children of God. It is, as it were,

of His relation to us; He owns us. Sometimes we hear of clandestine marriages, which may be valid, but the man seems to be ashamed to own his wife. He pleads that he could not introduce her into the noble family to which he belongs, and so he keeps the marriage in the dark, and he does not own the children. This is after the manner of wicked men; but God is not ashamed of us when He takes us to be His children. It is written concerning our Lord Jesus, "For this cause He is not ashamed to call them brethren." I have heard of some fine gentleman in London, dressed in all his best, walking out in the park. He had a poor old father who lived in the country, and who came up dressed in his rustic raiment to see his son. As the son was not at home when the father reached the house, he went into the park to find him. Now the fine gentleman did not absolutely disown his father, but he went out of the park at a pretty sharp trot, for fear anybody should say, "Who is that country fellow you were talking with?" He did not like to own his father, because he was a laborer. That is mean as the mud in the kennel, is it not? We could not thus wonder if the glorious Lord refused to own us. There is from the loftiness of His holiness to the depth of our faultiness. But yet He has such love, such a manner of love, that He bestows upon us this honor, that we should be openly called the sons of God. He Himself tells us so in our text. His spirit makes the avowal. "There," He says, "you poor people that love me, you sick people, you unknown, obscure people, without any talent, I have published it before heaven and earth, and made the angels know it, that you are My children, and I am not ashamed of you. I glory in the fact that I have taken you for my sons and daughters."

I have taken up all this time with the first part of the verse; but we must not forget the second part of it, "and we are." I shall only introduce it to your meditation, and indeed this is all that is wanted, if you are able to repeat the words on your own account, and say, "and we are."

II. The second and greatest wonder is the wonder of our

REALLY BEING THE SONS OF GOD.

"And we are." Let us work out the question. Are we really the children of God? We must answer that question by another—Do we truly believe in the Lord Jesus Christ? I have already quoted the inspired declaration: "But as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name." We can answer that question. Are we believing in the Lord Jesus Christ with all our heart? Is He our confidence? Do we trust in His blood and righteousness? If so, if we believe in Him, He has given us the right and the power to become the sons of God.

That question alone might settle it; but let us go a little further. If we indeed can say, "and we are," then we have received some measure of the nature of God. Have you, brethren, become spiritual? God is a spirit. Do you hate sin? God is holy. Do you love that which is right? Let your conscience speak. Do you endeavor to act generously? If you are not in the least like your Father, then you make a mistake if you profess to be His child. "Ye are made partakers of the divine nature," says one of the apostles, "having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust."

Am I a child of God? Then listen: I have a love to my Father. If you are truly born from above, your heart goes out in longings after Him to whom you owe your heavenly birth. More than that—if I am a child of God, I learn to trust my Father. I do not know a more delightful act of childhood than trustfulness in a parent. And how often if we trust God we shall be rewarded! A circumstance happened to me yesterday. I cannot help telling it to you. I received to say that the running account was so low that, when the cheques were paid on Friday morning, we should have overdrawn our banking account. I did not like that state of things; but I did not fret about it. I breathed a prayer to God that He would send money to put into the bank to keep the account right. Last night, at nearly ten o'clock, I opened a letter that came from Belfast, and it had in it a cheque for £200, being the amount left as a legacy. I wrote across my acknowledgment, "Oh, magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt His name together!" That amount put the account square for the time being; and though the Orphanage has no ready money to go on with, still that does not matter, God will send more means during the week, and at all other times when the expenditure calls for it. At the moment when I opened the letter, and found the £200, I felt as if my hair stood on end, because of the conscious nearness of the Lord my God. My brother, Hugh Hannah, when he sent that cheque, and sent it on that particular day, did not know that it would come just when I was praying to God for help in a time of trouble; yet it came exactly when it was sought for.

If I were to tell my own personal experience of the way in which God hears prayer, it would seem to you as if it could not be true; it would appear too romantic. But oh, it is a blessed thing to take everything to God, little or big, and leave all with Him! I am resolved to live and die trusting in the living God, and you shall all mark for yourselves whether He forsakes me, or bears me through.

You may also know a child by his joys. If a child has joy when his father is glad, when his father's name is honored, oh, then you believe that he is his father's child! I thought to myself one day, "Well, I have preached this Gospel to vast crowds of people; but is it my own? Perhaps I have only an official hold of it; and have no personal grip of it for myself." I had and I went in to hear the word in a humble, out-of-the-way room. I sat down on a form, and heard a working-man preach the Gospel very sweetly. By the way, the sermon was originally my own, and this the preacher acknowledged most freely; but as he preached it I found myself melted down with the story of God's love. My heart was so hot within me that I was ready to shout "Hallelujah!" when I heard the preacher magnifying the name of Christ Jesus, my Lord; and I said to myself, "Oh, you are a child of God, after all! You love this food as well as the other children do; and though you generally have to stand at the table and be a waiter, and sometimes wish you could sit and have a meal yourself, yet still you do love this heavenly bread. You have a taste for the things that God provides for His people."

Then God gives him one more seal of his being His child; and that is, that

HE CHASTENS HIM.

I know an old friend who used to tell me that for sixty years he had never known a day's illness. A splendid healthy old man he was; and about three months ago the old man took typhoid fever. I went to see him, and when he got better he came to see me; and, sitting down, he said, "Well, sir, you see I am not the man I was, but I have made a great advance through this sickness. I have never known any weakness before; but now I have been brought very low, and I hope I shall take up my sonship more than I ever did before." God grant that every chastened child may gather assurance from the covenant rod!

You, dear child of God, will not be long without a touch of the rod! May you have as little of it as the Lord judges to be proper! As for myself, I owe everything to the furnace and the hammer. I have made no progress in heavenly learning except when I have been whipped by the great Schoolmaster. The best piece of furniture in my house has been the cross. The children of God under the rod can say, "And we are." Thank God for anything which emphasizes that affirmation—"And we are." It is wondrous love that we should be called the children of God; "and we are."

The text says, "And we are." I must turn it round, and say, "Are we?" And when you have worked that out, and you can say, "Yes," then I want you all to get to be very positive about this matter—"Now are we the sons of God." I pray that you may be able to say boldly, "And we are." When you are depressed, and your spirit hangs fire, say, "We are." When the devil says, "If you are the children of God," give him a slap in the face with this, "And we are." And when the world says, "What? You call yourselves sons of God?" say, "Yes, and we are," Whenever doubts and fears come in, drive these evil birds away from eating your ripe fruit, and let this be the shout you use, "And we are." "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called children of God; and we are." Called by His name, may we enjoy the full assurance of faith through believing in Jesus! Amen.

A LIFE OF SELF-SACRIFICE.

WHEN Christianity is assailed by infidels, and the unthinking multitude join in the laughter provoked by their jeers, the fact is forgotten that it is the motive power in many lives consecrated to the service of humanity, and that if there were no hereafter the world to-day could not afford to lose the blessings it derives from Christian work. An instance in point occurs in a letter from a Moravian missionary, in which he incidentally refers to one such life. He writes:

The most trying work of any allotted to our sisters is that which falls to the lot of Caroline Forenbach, who is filling the post of assistant to Brother and Sister Müller, the House Parents of our Leper Home at Jerusalem. Her peculiar trial arises not only from the repulsive nature of the disease, but chiefly from the fact that it is quite incurable.

Let her tell her own story: How gladly would my woman's heart see some healing result of my daily round of duty, but in ministering to lepers this can never be. Ah! to tend incurables in such a malady, from one year's end to another! It is not easy, and sometimes my courage is sorely tried. But, on the other hand, there is gladness in being able, in some degree, to alleviate such hopeless sufferings, and still more to speak even a few words of sympathy and point, in imperfect Arab speech, to Him "who healeth all our diseases."

When new patients come in, our work is very hard to flesh and blood, more so than I can describe, till we overcome their uncleanly condition and habits. At first they hardly know what to make of a bed, having never slept in one before. Their nights are often spent in holes of the rocks A spoon is a puzzle to them. But by and by they fall into our orderly arrangements, and then they would be sorry to return to the Lazar House at Siloam. And when they thus become attached to our and their home we are well pleased.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A SCOTTISH LAIRD AS A GOOD SAMARITAN.*

I MAY mention here an incident in the life of my grandfather, which I have often heard from my father's lips. It was more than a hundred years ago, when wheeled conveyances were rarely used in the rural districts of Scotland, and the custom was to convey grain to the mill in a sack laid over a horse's back. The good man was making such a journey once, over a rough bridle-path, and the horse stumbled so that the sack fell off. The weight of years was on his shoulders, and he could not replace the load. As he was perplexed and wondering what to do, he saw a man on horseback in the distance, and had just made up his mind to ask him for assistance, when he recognized in him the nobleman who lived in an adjoining castle; and then his heart sank again within him, for how could he request him to help him? But he did not need to ask him, for he was noble by a higher patent than any monarch could confer. And when he came up he dismounted of his own accord, saying, "Let me help you, John." So between them they put the load again upon the horse; and then John—who was a gentleman, too, though he did wear "hodden gray"—taking off his broad Kilmarnock bonnet, made obeisance, and said, "Please, your Lordship, how shall I ever thank you for your kindness?" "Very easily, John," was the reply. "Whenever you see another man as sorely needing assistance as you were just now, help him; and that will be thanking me."

So, as we contemplate the sacrifice of Christ on our behalf, we cry: "What shall I render unto Thee, O Lord, for all Thy benefits toward me?" and there comes this answer: "Whensoever thou seest a fellow-man needing thy succor as much as thou wast needing Mine when I gave My life for thee, help him, and that will be thanking Me." "Inasmuch as ye do it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye do it unto Me."

THE ELDER BROTHER.

Some nineteen years ago I preached to my congregation in Liverpool one Lord's day morning from the parable of the Prodigal Son, dwelling especially on the incident of the elder brother. As I was leaving the church for my home, I was requested to visit a dying man whom I had seen frequently before, but who was just then apparently about to pass within the veil. He had been for many years a careless and irreligious man, but as I spoke with him from time to time, I marked that a great change had come over him. I had conversed faithfully and earnestly with him of Jesus and his salvation, and he had turned in sincere penitence to his Father, and was, as I believe, accepted by Him.

When I entered his room that morning I found him in great happiness, rejoicing in the near prospect of being with his Lord, and apparently perfectly happy. I talked with him a little on the things of the kingdom, and after prayer I took my leave.

His brother-in-law followed me down-stairs, and said, "I cannot understand this at all. Here have I been serving Christ for these twenty years, and I have never experienced such joy as he expresses; and yet he has not been a Christian, for more than a few weeks."

Immediately I recognized the elder brother, and I stayed long enough to show him just how he looked in the light of the parable. I told him that I had been preaching about him that very morning. "About me?" he said. "Yes, about you;" and I then went on to explain to him the meaning of this episode, while I warned him of the danger of being angry, and refusing to go into the father's house to share the joy over the returning prodigal. The result was that he saw his error, and was delivered from his envy. Now, that incident, occurring just at that precise time, has given a new point to the parable in my view ever since, and makes me far more anxious to get the elder-brotherliness out of my own heart than to identify the elder brother with any particular class.

SENATORIAL OBSEQUIES.

THE funeral of Senator Logan took place on Friday last. The body lay in state in the rotunda of the Capitol from Thursday to Friday, and was viewed by the public. It was then carried to Rock Creek Cemetery with military honors, where it was temporarily interred pending the action of the Illinois Legislature. Chicago earnestly desires that her distinguished Senator should lie in the Lake Front Park or in some other public place, but the Park Commissioners have no power to guarantee the site in perpetuity without a special act of the Legislature. As soon as the site is definitely chosen and the Legislature grants the necessary powers, General Logan's body will be removed to Chicago and an imposing monument erected.

THE ELEPHANTINE DOCK.

(See Illustration.)

THIS is an age of huge undertakings. In bygone years, when accommodation became too strait and business overgrew the existing facilities, the old works were extended to meet the increased demand. Now, speculative enterprises of gigantic cost and labor are entered upon in anticipation of the demand.

The huge dock which the English people have now constructed, twenty-three miles from London, at a cost of ten million dollars, a picture of which we give, is a work of just that character. Hitherto passengers and freight for London voyaging up the Thames have been delayed on their way. The large steamers now used had to wait for the tide at Gravesend, wait for a river pilot, and wait for tugs to drag them to the London docks. By disembarking at Tilbury and sending freight forward by rail a delay of twelve hours and an expense of three hundred dollars for towing each way are avoided, and it was thought that if docks and facilities were provided there, merchants and shipowners would appreciate the advantages and use them instead of going on to London by water.

The docks now completed are a marvel of engineering skill and a model of convenience. The accommodation is of immense extent, the quays being three miles in length and the covered sheds for the reception of freight covering twenty acres. Every modern appliance has been put in requisition. Hydraulic power is available at every point. Rails in communication with the line for London run along every quay. Vast cranes, on stands which admit of the railway wagons being passed through below them, are themselves set on wheels on outside rails, so that they can be moved from point to point for convenience of unloading. Opposite each dock on either side is a shed covering an entire acre of ground. Close to the entrance of the docks is a magnificent hotel, fitted up with every comfort, from which passengers can step on board, or into which they can pass on arrival. Electric light, making day of night, is used throughout the whole works; all the internal arrangements show a mastery of detail, giving the whole undertaking a completeness at the first start such as is too often wanting in large public works of this and similar kinds. The work has given employment to five thousand men for four years.

THE CARTER'S MONEY-ORDER.

SPECIAL evangelistic services were being held in a Canadian town. There was a mighty outpouring of the Spirit's influence, and the whole community was aroused. Men and women of every class attended the meetings, remained for personal conversation, and went away rejoicing in the Lord.

Early in the movement a poor woman, the wife of a rough, surly coal carter, was converted, and begged the prayers of the meeting for the conversion of her husband. "He is a bad un," she said, with frankness, "but he's got good in him, and he's kind when he's sober. I'm sure by what I've seen here that God could save him, and if he was converted it would be a blessed thing for him and me."

Earnest prayers were offered for the conversion of the coal carter that night and the next. On the following night he came to the meeting with his wife, and a most unpromising subject he looked. But he was impressed, and remained behind for prayer after the meeting was over. He became anxious, and for several days he was in much distress. He could not see the way of salvation, and he was profoundly impressed with his own weakness. He tried to quit swearing and drinking, and to fit himself for becoming a Christian; but it was of no use. He sank deeper in the mire as he struggled to get out, and was inclined to abandon the attempt in despair.

Just about that time he had occasion to send some money to his old mother in the States, and went to the post-office to get a money-order. The clerk was one of the most prominent of the workers in the meetings, and as he filled up the order-form he thought he saw his way to an illustration that might be blessed to the anxious man.

"This for your mother, Joe?" he asked, in a casual way.

"Yes, sir; and I wish it was more. She's got nobody but me left to help her now."

"Well, this will help her a bit, if she gets it, and I hope she will."

"What d'ye mean?" asked Joe, sharply. "O' course she'll get it; ain't I going to send it right off?"

"Well, no. You are going to send that bit of paper"—pointing to the money-order—"but that is not worth anything. It is only an order on the United States Post-Office. If she presents it they may pay her; I am sure I hope they will."

"I don't know what you mean," said Joe. "There's nothing wrong, is there? I've sent lots of 'em, and they've always been paid afore."

"Yes; but doesn't it strike you as rather a risk to put good money in here and take nothing for it but that bit of paper, trusting to the post-office in the States to give your money to your mother when she shows it?"

The Carter Does not Understand.

"No, it don't," Joe said, flatly. "There ain't no risk at all. This Government ain't turned rogues yet; no more ain't the States Government. Don't you try to fool me. Either of 'em's good for a million times this little lot."

"You are right, and there is no risk. This little payment is a mere nothing to either, because they are rich, and, beside that, they will keep their promise because they are honest—in these matters at any rate. I don't wonder that you have confidence, but what does surprise me, Joe, is that when you are dealing with God you seem to lose confidence directly."

"I don't understand you," said Joe, again.

"Don't you? Well, when you read your Bible, or when your wife reads it to you, what do you find? Why, God's promise. He that believeth hath eternal life, and he that asks God for a new heart, gets it, and he that trusts God to keep him from sin is kept, and whosoever will may come. Seems strange, doesn't it, that, while you are ready to trust the Government with good money that you have earned by hard work, and are sure that they will keep their promise to pay it out again, you cannot trust God to keep His promise. He is able to do it—no doubt of that—and surely you don't doubt that He is honest. Why, His promise is the same as having it in your hand. I wonder at you, Joe."

"I wonder at myself, sir," Joe said. "I can't say I ever looked at it that way. It makes me feel kinder mean. I must think it over. There must be some difference somewhere. It can't be just that way."

But Joe found it was just that way. There was no difference, except that it was infinitely more secure in God's hands than in the post-office. He turned it around this way and that, and meditated on it as he went about his work, but there was no flaw anywhere.

"Say, wife," he said, when he got home, "just read to me again them words you were reading last night, 'Whosoever,' you know." The good woman gladly read them, and Joe took God's promise and was at rest.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

SUMMARY OF THE STORY.

EDITH, the daughter of Sir Godwin Spofforth, the local magnate of Aspendale, lies ill of a mysterious sickness, the result of a shock. Simon, the pious carpenter of the village is sent for to pray with her. He believes that in answer to prayer God will recover her of her sickness. Edith's brother Harold, a scapegrace, is in the metropolis with Alfred Atheling, a humble clerk, the son of a widow, who resides at Aspendale. Led by Harold Spofforth Alfred becomes dissipated, is charged with robbing his employer, and would have been arrested had not Harold succeeded in entrapping, in his dressing-room, the policeman sent to take him into custody. Alfred gets clear away and sits down in a restaurant to think and repent. From this point the story proceeds.

A Port in a Storm.

"What a fool I am!" was the first result of Alfred's cogitations. "I have made matters worse instead of better by running away. I had far better have confronted the difficulty like a man. My flight is in itself a condemnation." Then he began to wonder what it was all about, and whether it was his absence from his duties which had set Mr. Harvey against him.

"No; there must be something special," said he to himself in a dazed way, "or Mr. Harvey would certainly never have taken such a decisive step as that. Let me try to piece together the events of the last few days." At last it dawned upon him, and the truth made his face more pallid than before. Two days before Mr. Harvey had intrusted him with a bag of money to take to his usual bank. What had he done with it? Did he take it there? For the life of him he could not tell. Had he lost it? Had it gone, as his own money had too often gone, in losses by gambling? For the last few days he had been living in excitement, had been almost all the time under the influence of wine, or in that dull, dazed state that follows excess. So the answer to all his self-questionings on the subject was, simply and literally, that he could not tell.

His knife and fork dropped from his fingers; he was making a poor pretence at a make-believe meal. He sat with wide-open eyes and equally wide-open mouth, staring across the table. So far as he was concerned, he was staring into vacancy; but a decent-looking workman, who was discussing a frugal meal directly opposite, came to the not unnatural conclusion that the stare was meant for him.

"I say, mate," said the man familiarly, but not rudely, "if you're opening your mouth for your food you'd better take up your knife and fork again. It'll never jump in of itself; an' if you are openin' your eyes so wide to look at me, why then, beggin' your pardon, I'm a bit narvous."

"I beg your pardon—indeed I do," said Alfred. "I really did not know what I was doing."

"Oh, it's all right," said the man, "there's no harm done. But you seem to be a good deal put out about something. I hope it's nowt serious."

"Nowt." The familiar word, Yorkshire for nothing, caught Alfred's attention, and sent his disturbed and over-active mind spinning away at lightning speed right off to peaceful Aspendale. He conjured up the silver-haired widow sitting in the ingle-nook at Aspen Garth. He thought of the father, the noble, manly, tender-hearted father now lying beneath the yew-trees in Thorpe Aspen churchyard. He was overcome by the rush of feeling acting on his strained nerve and excited mind; he flung his arms upon the table, buried his face upon them, and sobbed aloud; sobbed as only strong men can sob when their hearts are sad and sore within them.

"I say, mate," said the honest Yorkshireman, rising to his feet and putting his hand upon the young man's shoulder, "I'm—I'm awfully sorry. I didn't mean to—to—confoond it all, ah can't stand this, yo' knoa! It isn't i' human natur'. If a poor chap like me can sarve yo' a good turn, give us the tip, an' you're as welcome as wages on a Setteda' neet. Hev I said owt wrong?"

"No, indeed," said Alfred, trying to raise a smile which was loath to come at call. "The fact is," he continued, looking frankly in the workman's face, "I'm under a cloud, and I need a quiet shelter until the storm blows over. I am not without means, however, and can afford to pay moderately for what I want. Can you direct me to any quiet corner of that kind?"

"'Scuse me, sir," persisted he, most respectfully, "an' don't be offended, 'cause no offence is intended. I've a wife an' three bairns to think on—ha' you gone an' been an' put yourself in the wrong box wi' the law? I mean so far as committin' a—a—you know what I mean?"

"Not that I know of," answered Alfred, truthfully enough. "Not that I know of, so help—"

"Nay, nay, don't put it i' that way," interrupted his companion, firmly and quickly. "'Cordin' to my notions, words like them as you was a-going to say doesn't as a rule help to make things truer or straighter—t'other way, I think. Well, it's just here. I've a room to spare, bedroom an' sittin'-room all i' one. Will you come an' see it?"

Alfred assented. As they went along his companion said with a smile, "I won't ask you to tell me your name, as you're 'under a cloud,' an' you might think it inconvenient to hear it."

Alfred winced under the whip, and half wondered if the speaker knew how keenly it cut.

"I dare say," continued the man, "you'll prefer to pay for your room in advance. You won't think onything o' my mentionin' that. It's only fair it should be so, 'cause then it can do no harm for you to hev your own way aboot that. I don't mind tellin' you mine. It's Ned Saltmer, but I'm generally called 'Yorkie' by my mates. You see, that's the shire I hail from; an', accordin' to my opinion, it's about the best quarter there is to hail from. Them that hails from some other county may differ from me about that, an' of coorse I lets 'em. It wouldn't be kind to do otherwise, 'cause, don't you see, that's their misfortune an' not their fault."

"I'm Yorkshire too," said Alfred, who thought he might safely make that admission, quite sure that it would tell in his favor with Ned Saltmer.

"Well, noo, I'd come to that conclusion already," said Ned, with a knowing smile, "an' I don't mind ownin' that it sort o' paved the way. My wife's Lancashire, bred an' born. Of coorse it isn't so good as bein' Yorkshire, but as I tell her, it's next best thing to it, an' being married to a Yorkshireman mak's her Yorkshire as near as owt. Sometimes when she's i' the humor for a joke she calls me 'Yorkie,' as my mates do, and so then I calls her 'Lankie.' I can't say as it suits her exactly, for the lass isn't much higher than a plumb-line, an' she's almost as plump and jolly as the bob at the end on it."

By this time they had entered a street consisting altogether of workmen's dwellings, which were evidently inhabited by a thrifty and respectable class of artisans. Ned Saltmer stopped at the door of a tidy cottage at the lower end of the street. He let himself and his companion in with a latch-key. Alfred was shown into a small but remarkably clean room, a combination of sitting and bedroom, and was relieved and comforted to find so clean and homely a port from the storm which had driven him into those remote quarters. He paid the first week's rent, for which Ned wrote him out a receipt in a big round hand. He was able to feel a little amused as he discovered that it was made out to Mr. Abel Anderson, and said to himself that his initials were left to him intact. He was then left to ponder on the blind alley into which his fortunes had been brought by his own folly and sin.

But what did Ned Saltmer mean by saying to his plump and cheerful spouse in a half whisper when he went into the kitchen, "Madge, owd gell, if ever that youngster should be inquired for, put 'em off the scent till I can see 'em myself. He don't know me, but I know he, an' what'll come on't we shall see. That's poetry, Madge, both rhyme and reason. Give me a kiss; an' get a bit o' supper ready for him an' us. Here's the brass." So saying Ned laid down the silver he had received by way of rent, and sitting in the chimney-corner proceeded to enjoy his pipe.

He was far more at ease than was his lodger. Alfred had that hunted sensation which comes upon the man who for the first time in his life is in danger of arrest. He did not know but that his escape might not have been watched, and that the policeman might not be even now coming to his hiding-place. These, however, were groundless fears. Policeman Tugwell was not likely to follow him. A more disgusted man than he did not live when he realized the trick played upon him, and found himself shut up in the dressing-room like a rat in a trap. He had entered it on the strength of his search-warrant, but that was by no means strong enough to secure his exit. It certainly would not be profitable to reproduce the expressions, far more strong than elegant, which fell from his lips as he endeavored to open the door, that he might give chase to the fugitive, who, like Reynard with the hounds behind him, had "gone away."

The truth is that Constable Tugwell was in a towering passion. There was that in his eye which warned his fellow-prisoner that the old proverb, "Least said, soonest mended," applied with remarkable aptness to the present occasion. So Harold Spofforth contented himself with looking the surprise which he certainly did not feel, and with expressing his opinion that the disordered lock was likely to give them a good deal of trouble before they passed out of bondage into freedom.

"It's my opinion that it is a put-up job," said the policeman, gruffly. "I believe that you know a good deal more about this than you're willing to let hout. What an idiot I was to give you such a chance!"

"I wish you would let me out," said Harold, with a sarcastic smile. "I will not dispute your judgment concerning yourself." This was a great deal more than the mortified policeman could endure. He sprung to his feet.

"I shall take you into custody as a confederate!" said he. "I'll make you suffer for it as sure as my name's Tugwell." Again he tugged at the door with a vigor that gave him double right to wear his name.

"All right. We'll see about that," said Harold, coolly. "But let me render you some assistance now, at any rate."

Adding his own muscular strength to that of the policeman, the one holding the brass knob, and the other grasping the old-fashioned handle often found on doors in ancient houses, they gave a violent wrench at the door. The socket into which the bolt was shot suddenly gave way, the door opened upon them, and both of them tumbled pell-mell upon the floor. Harold sprang to his feet instantly, but the policeman lay still. He had struck the back of his head violently against the wall, and was stunned. Leaving him to recover consciousness as he might, Harold gave a quick glance around the room. A few valuables he hastily snatched up as his eye fell upon them, and then he hurried to the street, and hailing a hack was driven to the docks. On all accounts it would be better, he thought, to be out of the country for a time. Alfred Atheling would doubtless pull through somehow, and if not—why, it could not be helped. Such men as Harold make their own comfort and pleasure their first consideration, and if fidelity to friends involves sacrifice, then the friends must be deserted.

Harold resolved on going to Spain, where, as there was no extradition treaty between that country and England, the English police could not follow him, and where, as he was well supplied with money, he could live a jolly life until the storm blew over. At the docks he was so fortunate as to find a ship just about to sail for a Spanish port, and before morning he was clear beyond the clutches of English law.

It was not the first or second time that Harold had visited Madrid. That renowned city of gay cavaliers and fair ladies had special charms for him—much to his disadvantage alike in money and morals. Of money he had the run of a great deal more than was good for him; of morals, he had not, at this period of his career, very much to boast of, and the course he was pursuing was likely enough to bring them to a vanishing point.

Every day he scanned the English newspapers expecting to read of the arrest of Alfred Atheling, but seeing no tidings of him, he concluded that he, too, had succeeded in making his escape from English soil.

But Atheling was still in London. He clung to the refuge his Yorkshire friend had provided. He was afraid to move, for he had seen his flight recorded in a daily paper, which, however, had misspelt his name, and in which his personal description was very inexact. There was small comfort in that. He knew to whom it referred; and, as his eye fell on the heading—"Absconded!" he felt how frail was the tenure on which he held his liberty; and, which must be said in his favor, how foully and wickedly he had treated his widowed mother, and the hitherto spotless name he bore.

For many an hour he sat thinking, thinking. He remembered being intrusted by his employer with a large sum of money. He remembered also that it was on the morning of a day when he and Harold were in company; a day on which he was set free to attend some special revel; a day, alas! one of the many days on which the reins of reason were dropped on the neck of the steed of passion, which galloped headlong with its reckless rider into shameful intemperance and collapse. He remembered all this, but what had become of the money he could not remember, rack and search his memory as he might.

Of one thing he was sure, he had not stolen the money, and had never any intention of so doing. But there were three hard, awkward, damning facts. He had given his employer repeated and serious cause of complaint; the money now missing had been in his charge; and he had "absconded" as soon as the deficit was discovered. More and more the truth came home to him that he had been a fool in so doing.

"Well, I cannot help it now!" he said to himself. "It is my fate, I suppose. Whom the gods intend to destroy, et cetera, and as destruction seems likely enough to be the ultimate issue, dementia has set in accordingly."

It is curious, very, how many people there are who bear hardly upon fate, and condemn its cruelty, who ought to read "folly" for "fate," and condemn themselves. If he had acted wisely and well, he would even then have gone to his injured and grieved employer, who had been anything but unkind, and have frankly confessed his fault. But Shame and Fear, those twin demons that haunt a guilty conscience, those twin tyrants who act the despot on wrong-doers, prevented him, and all his thoughts were centred on the question, how to secure a safe and speedy flight.

Mother! Home! Brothers! Sisters! Alfred Atheling sat in the little room he had taken in Ned Saltmer's cottage, and gave himself up to thoughts of these. The twilight fell; twilight darkened into night; the night wore on; but still that young man sat, looking with an inner eye at the panorama of Thorpe Aspen and the Garth, listening with an inner ear to the music of voices to which he had been strangely deaf, but which just now were sweeter and mellower than ever, as they smote upon his memory and vividly reminded him of what had been in the past, and of what might have been in the present—into the future he dared not look! It was night without and night within, a deep, dark night that had never a star to relieve its gloom.

The young prodigal was fairly under the fascination of the home-spell. It worked so strongly that he felt he must go down to Thorpe Aspen at all hazards. He had fully made up his mind to leave England. He felt that there there was no safety, and what was much more to his credit, he felt that there was little chance of his reformation; and with these home influences so strong upon him, these godly spells woven by pious love long before, he did desire to lead a better and a nobler life.

"I must have a look at the dear old homestead, come what will," said he, as he came out of the land of visions and heaved a deep sigh to think it was a dream. "How is it, I wonder, that it comes so strong upon me? I've cared precious little for Thorpe Aspen or aught belonging to it while, while—I've been selling myself to the devil." At this point the young fellow could have joined the sect of the Flagellants, and have given himself a castigation with whips which would have scarred both skin and memory too.

WATCHWORDS FOR THE YEAR.

Christ for Us. We for Him.

Thou wilt, dear, loving Saviour, to those who trust this year,
Be all they need at all times, a Helper ever near.
So, Master, looking now to Thee,
We forward go, triumphantly.

Thou wilt, for Thou hast promised, be Guard and Guide each day,
If only we will hearken, and loyally obey.
Then, Jesus, by Thy gentle might,
Incline our hearts to hear aright.

Thou wilt be sweetest Shelter in sorrow's sternest hour,
Thou wilt be strongest Fortress from fierce temptation's power.
O Saviour, may we, by Thy grace,
Each find in Thee a hiding-place!

Thou wilt, when we are weary, restore our souls again,
And ofttimes, in Thy mercy, remove the throb of pain;
If not, may we accept Thy will,
And trust Thy wise and patient skill.

Thou wilt too, by Thy Spirit, increase our growth in grace,
Till we reflect the beauty, the brightness of Thy face.
Lord, may this year the holiest prove!
And may we give Thee love for love!

Thou wilt be, blessed Saviour (nay, more, thou art to-day),
Our All-in-All for ever, then help us now to say:
"We each, dear Lord, will gladly be Surrendered wholly unto Thee."

Thou wilt, we know, Lord Jesus, be coming soon again,
To take us to our Father, and over all to reign;
And then, oh, then, with higher powers,
How we will serve through joyous hours!

MR. J. T. BARBER BEAUMONT,

The Peter Cooper of London.

ON the first page is a picture of a sculptured bust representing the philanthropist whose bequest formed the nucleus of the gigantic benevolent enterprise known as the People's Palace, which is being erected in London for the benefit of the uneducated poor. Mr. Beaumont was born on December 21st, 1774, and died on May 15th, 1841, at the age of sixty-seven. He commenced his career in life as a miniature painter, and in this comparatively humble condition he became the architect of his own fortune, and died in the possession of a very large freehold, and extensive personal property. His various talents, combined with his singularly energetic temperament, were well calculated to raise him to eminence in any profession in which he engaged, or in any undertaking in which he desired to excel.

Mr. Beaumont had also some reputation as an author. In 1802 he produced an interesting work describing a tour in South Wales, to which he added many appropriate and elegant embellishments. In the spring of 1806 he was successful in establishing a "Provident Institution, or Bank for Savings." This was the first institution of the kind in England, and it has given rise to numerous similar establishments, by which, perhaps, more than by any other means, habits of industry have been fostered, a spirit of frugality excited, and the virtue and happiness of the English working classes enlarged.

Mr. Beaumont was deeply interested in the moral and mental elevation of the laboring population, and so founded in East London what is called

THE BEAUMONT INSTITUTE.

This included class-rooms, reading-rooms, library, a museum of objects of scientific interest, a large hall, capable of holding fifteen hundred people, etc. A religious service was also held on Sundays in the large hall. Property was left to the value of $95,000 to support the plans which he had formed, but which his death precluded him from executing. The institute has not prospered, and the trustees with other gentlemen planned the new enterprise, which we hope will succeed, and which will in every way fulfil the aim of the late Mr. Beaumont, excepting that of a religious service.

The deplorable condition of the London poor weighed continually upon his mind, and the one desire of his heart was to do something to alleviate it. The common disposition of the wealthy and aristocratic classes in Great Britain, as in this and other countries, is one of indifference to the poor. Like Cain, they ask, "Am I my brother's keeper?" It is consciousness of this fact that has made the poor hate the rich, and has produced that class enmity which has grown so rapidly, and now threatens to overturn the foundations of society. Mr. Beaumont was one of the few who sympathized with the poor—the few who are the salt which has hitherto preserved the world of the rich.

MR. GEORGE H. BARBER BEAUMONT.

THIS gentleman, whose portrait also appears on the first page, is the eldest grandson of Mr. J. T. Barber Beaumont, and consequently the head of the family. He was employed by the British War Office during the last Zulu War, and for his services holds some most satisfactory documents from the authorities at Durban. He is now interested in ostrich farming, having been the first to take ostriches from Africa in any numbers, and was founder of the first ostrich farm in South America, or, in fact, anywhere out of Africa. The Buenos Ayres Standard of May 2d, 1880, gives an account of his arrival there with ostriches from the Cape of Good Hope. He started an ostrich farm in the province in that year. At the Continental Exhibition in Buenos Ayres, in 1882, the judges for rural produce awarded the grand premium (1st class gold medal) to Mr. George Beaumont for ostrich feathers as being a new industry established in the country.

THE PEOPLE'S PALACE

In the East End of London.

The Departments—The Donors—The Objects of the Institution—The Character of the Building—The Plot of the Liquor Dealers—Their Aristocratic Allies—The Lord Mayor's Meeting—Mr. Charrington's Protest—Expelled by a Policeman—His Letter to the Press—Mr. Beaumont's Protest.

THE magnificent building, a picture of which appears on the first page, is now in course of erection at the East End of London. It is intended to be a place of recreation and education for the toiling millions—that is, there are to be under its roof a library and reading-room, schools for technical education, a summer and winter garden, a concert hall, swimming baths, and gymnasia for both sexes. The institution is the outgrowth of a bequest of $62,000, which the late Mr. J. T. Barber Beaumont left to be applied to the moral and intellectual benefit of the poor in the Eastern District of London. Rather than expend this sum by itself, the trustees suggested that philanthropists should join in the work and found an institution of permanent benefit.

The chief benefactors as yet are the Drapers' Company, the owners of the site—which has long been occupied by the buildings of Bancroft's School and Hospital—the Duke of Westminster, Lord Rosebery, who gives a swimming bath, Mr. Dyer Edwardes, and Mr. Wilberforce Bryant. These contribute among them something like half the $375,000 which has been already raised; the rest has been provided by the contributions of small and great. Not a little has come from the subscriptions of those who have found themselves able, on the invitation of the trustees, to promise £1 a year for three years. Before the building can be finished, and its aims realized, a large additional sum must be raised. Still, it is gratifying to find how widespread has been the feeling among the fairly well-to-do, and even among those who have little more than they absolutely need, that in a complicated society it is the duty of the better provided to do what they can to soften the lot of the worst provided.

Nothing can really turn the Eastern District of London into a garden, can take away the dismal monotony of its streets, or can destroy the squalid type of life which the vast majority of its inhabitants are doomed to live. Utopia is not to be realized yet in this world; and a population like that of Stepney and Poplar must accept the main conditions of the life of Stepney and Poplar. But while this is perfectly true, it is also true that a little brightness, a little enjoyment, and such chances of learning as are to be given by this People's Palace count for far more in the case of these people than they would in the case of people more richly furnished with good things. To a dweller in the slums of Whitechapel the opportunity of hearing good music, of sitting through the summer or the winter evening among flowers and shrubs, of amusing himself rationally with his friends in the gymnasium or the swimming bath, is an advantage that he will appreciate all the more keenly because till now such an opportunity has been far beyond his reach.

The contribution of the Drapers' Company toward the enterprise is one hundred thousand dollars, which is to be spent in the establishment of technical schools and ranges of workshops, where all the principal trades carried on at the East End will be taught by practical artisans, so that no lad in future need begin life without the knowledge of some trade. These buildings are designed for to the number of twenty thousand. Indeed, the trustees wish to see the whole institution so framed that, whether in science, art, or literature, any student may be able to follow up his education to the highest point—in fact, that the palace may become the University of East London. At the same time the palace will afford ample means for recreation and social enjoyment. There will be, beside the winter garden and concert hall, library and reading-rooms, gymnasia and swimming bath, an extensive recreation ground, where on summer evenings efficient bands are to be provided, so that workmen, with their wives and children, may find a pleasant resort for social intercourse after the day's work is done. The magnificent main building, of which we give an illustration, is to be constructed from the plans of Mr. Robson.

The architectural features are Oriental. The structure is to be of red brick and white stone, and facing the main thoroughfare will be a semi-circular portico, supported upon columns, and surmounted by a large and handsome dome, right and left of which will tower a lofty ornamental minaret, capped by a gilded cupola. Under the dome will be the large entrance hall, intended during the daytime to serve as a covered playground for children, and in the evening as a species of common room in which the workmen may sit and chat. Opening out from this will be "The Queen's Hall," where the concerts will be held, and of this the Prince of Wales laid the foundation-stone on Monday, June 28th. Beyond will be the library, reading-rooms, schools, etc.

SECULAR OR RELIGIOUS

philanthropy is the alternative now under consideration by the trustees and the men who have contributed to the fund. The amazing proposal to sell intoxicating liquor in the institution was the first attempt made to nullify the good it was hoped to effect. To the American public such a proposal would have seemed too ridiculous to be entertained for a moment. The idea of trying to help a man with one hand and offering him temptation with the other is absurd, especially when we consider that the temptation which it was proposed to place in his way was the identical one to which his class is most prone, and which has caused much of the degradation which has made this institution almost a necessity. But in London the idea that a workingman must have his beer is deeply implanted in the minds of the upper classes, and they were disposed to think that the People's Palace would not be attractive unless it afforded facilities for getting intoxicated. Then came the question of having the palace open on Sundays, and on that a further division was produced.

A great meeting was therefore held to take the two questions into consideration. It was called by the Lord Mayor of London, and was held in the Mansion House, his official residence, on November 5th, 1886. The Lord Mayor, in explaining the object of the meeting, said: "The design of the founders of the institution is to provide technical and industrial training in conjunction with amusements which will make the dull and monotonous life of the East End a little more lively. The question of Sunday opening and the sale of alcoholic beverages will have to be worked out by the governing body. No conclusion has been arrived at either way."

An exciting discussion, as may be supposed, followed this curious opening. The Lord Mayor appealed for contributions to the fund for building and operating the institution while proposing to leave open the questions of Sunday opening and liquor selling to be settled afterward by the Board of Trustees, the chairman of which happens to be in the liquor trade. It was not wonderful that wealthy Christian men intending to contribute should desire to have those questions settled before they gave their money. Otherwise it might turn out that they were aiding to establish an institution that would be a curse rather than a blessing to the East End. Several such men were present, and among them Mr. F. N. Charrington, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on August 5th, 1886. He respectfully pointed out the necessity of the temperance and Sunday questions being settled at the outset and before subscriptions were collected. The Lord Mayor, however, thrust the subject aside with some rudeness, and finally, on Mr. Charrington pressing the matter, ordered him to be silent or leave the meeting. The Christian philanthropist, whose work has been done in the East End of London, has seen too much of the misery produced by the liquor traffic to consider the sale or prohibition of intoxicating liquor in the People's Palace the mere unimportant matter of detail which the Lord Mayor represented it, and he continued to urge the managers to pledge themselves never to permit the sale of liquor within the walls. But the managers would give no such pledge, whereupon, as the discussion was hindering the main business of getting in money, the Lord Mayor ordered a policeman to turn Mr. Charrington out. This was done, and the man whose interest in the people of the East End is no new thing, and whose work among them God has blessed, was roughly expelled because he protested against a philanthropic enterprise being turned into a gigantic rum-hole.

MR. CHARRINGTON'S PROTEST,

however, was not suppressed, in spite of the Lord Mayor's summary proceeding It has reached the ears of a wider public than the small one in the Mansion House. Writing to the press, Mr. Charrington says: "Now, here is a fact which has been apparently kept in the dark—the chairman of the Beaumont trustees is a gin distiller, and is supposed to carry on the largest business of this infernal sort in the world. I cannot imagine why this man, who, humanly speaking, must have done more harn by his horrible business than any man—at any rate in the East End, if not in the world—should be chosen to be chairman of a scheme for raising the masses of East London (though, as far as I can see, it is more likely to lower them). As to the opening of the palace on Sundays, of course that will only intensify the evil if it is carried out, as we fear, with a license for intoxicating drink, and add the sin and physical harm of Sabbath-breaking to other and worse sins, which must necessarily come in the train of the indulgence in strong drink."

was made at a meeting held on November 10th. As he is the grandson of the philanthropist whose bequest forms the nucleus of the institution, it deserves—and, we may hope, it will receive -the attention of the trustees. He moved a resolution "that this meeting of inhabitants of East London, realizing the terrible harm already caused by strong drink in their midst, protests against the sale of intoxicating liquors in the proposed People's Palace." He began by reading an extract from the will of his grandfather, who left nearly $100,000 to found "an institution for the purpose of affording persons in the neighborhood means of meeting together for mental and moral improvement, free from the baneful excitement of intoxicating liquors." The testator entreated his trustees to construe his general intention in a liberal and philosophical spirit. Mr. Beaumont further read extracts from books by his grandfather strongly condemnatory of the use of strong drink. This, he contended, showed that his grandfather never intended that a penny of his money should be used for any place or institution where intoxicating liquors were intended to be sold.

The Christian philanthropists who are making this noble fight to prevent the impudent outrage of the liquor dealers are entitled to the sympathy and prayers of the American public.

A Census of London Churches was Taken on October 31st. It showed that on that day about one eighth of the population of the city attended church. An aggregate of 400,000 persons attended the services in the morning and 410,000 at night. The largest Established church—St. Paul's—had an evening attendance of 3403. Mr. Spurgeon's church was at the head of the dissenting churches, having a morning attendance of 4519 and an evening attendance of 6070.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Gallant Well Rebuked.—Mr. Marshall Related at a recent meeting that "a young lady going alone along a dark country road one night was spoken to with some gallantry by a young man who was going in the same direction, who inquired, 'Are you alone, miss?' 'No, sir,' she replied, 'I am not.' 'I beg your pardon, but I don't see any one with you,' the young fellow rejoined. The young lady turned toward him, and replied with gravity, 'The Lord Jesus is with me.' Confused and nonplussed, the young man stood still for a moment or two, then recovering himself, said, as he profoundly but mockingly bowed, 'Excuse me, but I did not know that you kept such good company.' And he troubled her no more."

A Simple Woman's Wisdom.—Mr. Marsh said: "It is a solemn question, 'What are you going to do with the Lord Jesus?' but it is one which must be answered by every living being. Are you going to answer it as a poor woman in Worcester did recently? She was very old, and was said not to have much sense; but to me she seems to have had more than many people who think themselves highly intelligent. When I asked her what she was going to do with the Lord Jesus, she looked up into my face and said, 'If you please, sir, I'll just take Him home with me.' And that is the right place to take Him; into your home, and ask Him in His loving-kindness to stay there in complete possession, actuating every thought, word, and deed."

A Prayer in a Wood.—"When I was a Little boy, I went to a party of young people, and after we had played numerous games, one of the little girls proposed that we should have a little meeting. I did not know what that was, though my people were Christians and always went to church; but I, along with the others, agreed. The little girl took a Bible, and read a portion of Scripture, then sang a hymn, and knelt down and prayed. Then I felt that I was wrong; that I needed something more than going to church; and I was so unhappy, so miserable, I left that house as quickly as possible, and set off home through a wood; but when I was half way through I could stand the agony of my mind no longer; so I threw myself down on the ground, and prayed God to save me and take me to Himself; and He did. When I got up from the ground I was praising God. Old things had passed away, and all things had become new. I hastened home, and though they were all asleep I could not wait till to-morrow to tell them the good news. So I ran up to my mother's bedroom, and though I had to cry 'Mother' two or three times, I wakened her. She, with some surprise, said, 'Well, what is it?' and all I could say was, 'Oh, mother, I'm converted, and I am so happy!'"

A Missionary in a Drinking Saloon.—A worker observed: "A missionary who labored for Christ among the liquor saloons in East London once entered the large public room of one of these houses. He was soon recognized by some of those seated round the table, and immediately, before he had time to speak, they began to sing, 'For he's a jolly good fellow.' The clergyman saw at once that their purpose was to sing him out, and he knew that if they succeeded in going so there, he would have to face the same thing in all his other visits. So, without seeming in the least to notice the noise and uproar, he drew a chair to the table, and lifting a newspaper began to read. Soon the singers began to tire, and one by one drop off as they sung themselves hoarse; then seizing the first opportunity when there was silence, the missionary jumped up and said, 'Yes, they were jolly good fellows, yet for all that the judges took them, and bound them, and when they had beaten them with many stripes, they cast them into prison with their backs raw and bleeding.' This at once appealed to their sympathy, for there were few in that room who had not seen the inside of a prison, and cries of 'What a shame! Who was it? and where did it happen?' were heard on all sides. Then the missionary told them the story of Paul and Barnabas at Philippi, and how they had been unjustly imprisoned, and of the conversion of the jailor. The touching story had a softening effect on the hard features of all around him, and operated mightily on the hearts of many."

Stepping into the Boat.—A Scotch Evangelist remarked: "The other night, when I was going over to Govan to address a meeting there, I crossed the river by the ferry. At the close of the meeting I found two anxious souls there, and I had some difficulty in getting them simply to trust Christ as their Saviour. I said to them, 'I came across to this place by the ferry, and at the wharf the boat came close to my feet; what had I to do in order to cross the river?' 'Ah,' said one, 'you had to pay.' 'But that was not all,' I rejoined. 'You had to believe in the boat,' answered the other. 'But I knew all about the boat; I had crossed with it often before. Believing in the boat would not take me over. I could believe in the boat standing on the wharf.' No; I had to step in. And will you just step into the boat of Christ's salvation?' Happily they did, and left the meeting rejoicing in a new-found Saviour."

Preparing for an Expected Guest.—"A Certain family had for some time been talking about the Second Coming of Christ, and of the necessity of being always watching for it, and they had taken pains to impress this upon the minds of their little children. One evening both the father and mother were from home, and as the little folks were having tea by themselves, one of them said, 'I think we had better put down another cup and saucer.' 'Why?' asked the others. 'Because, if Jesus comes while we are at tea, I should like to be prepared for Him,' was the reply. So they made preparations at their table for another guest, that the Lord might find them ready and waiting for Him if He came. Just as they were about to sit down to the table, a rap came to the door. They were all startled, and seemed afraid that Jesus had actually come. At length one of them summoned courage to open the door; and when the door was opened they saw, not Jesus, but a poor beggar. At the sight of him they were about to slam the door in his face, when they remembered those words of Jesus, when He said, 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these My disciples ye did it unto Me.' And this beggar, though he was poor, was a Christian, and therefore a disciple of Christ. So they asked him in, and gave him Jesus' place."

Dead Four Years Before Burial.—Mr. Frazer related: "I knew a woman who was dead nearly four years before she was buried. A Christian lady had gone up to see her as she lay sick in bed; she had prayed with her and spoken to her about her soul, but she refused to listen. The lady was astonished and grieved. She went to a friend, and together they again visited the sick woman. But although she knew she was on her death-bed she would not listen to the Gospel, and turned her face to the wall that she might not see her visitors; but they still kindly persisted in talking to her of Christ, and at last she told them her sad story. She said: 'A few years ago I went to a Gospel meeting, and there the Spirit of God strove mightily with me; but I would not have anything to do with Him, because I was keeping company with a young man at the time, and he would not come to the meetings, nor have anything to do with Christ, and as I could not give him up, I chose him rather than God; and six months afterward he died. Now, though I was free so far to accept salvation, I could not. All desire had gone away; and though the missionary and others have come and prayed and spoken with me, I cannot accept Christ.' On the last night of her life, when Christ was once more presented to her, she turned from those who were pleading with her, saying, 'Four years ago I refused Christ, and on that night I died.' And when they turned her face toward them her spirit had fled."

DISTRIBUTION OF REWARDS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Jan. 9, 1887.*

"He shall divide the spoil with the strong."—ISA. 53 : 12.

The Cross in the Coliseum—Symbol of Suffering and Victory—Calculation as to the Conversion of the World—The Uninviting Portions—The Arctic Circle once Tropical—The First Inhabited—The Birth-Land of the Flowers—Deserts to be Irrigated—Marshes to be Drained—A New Apportionment of Wealth—Purification of Morals—Violet Cameron's Failure—China and Africa to be Developed and Evangelized—Estates in the Celestial World—Surprises in Store—The Champion of the Ages.

MY family, who saw it with their own eyes year before last, tell me that in the Coliseum at Rome, where persecutors used to let out the half-starved lions to eat up Christians, there is now planted the figure of a cross. And I rejoice to know that the upright piece of wood nailed to a transverse piece has become the symbol, not more of suffering than of victory. It is of Christ the Conqueror that my text speaks. As having subdued an empire, might divide the palaces, and mansions, and cities, and valleys, and mountains among his officers, so Christ is going to divide up all the earth and all the heavens among His people, and you and I will have to take our share if we are strong in faith and strong in our Christian loyalty; for my text declares it, "He shall divide the spoil with the strong."

The capture of this round planet for Christ is not so much of a job as you might imagine, when the Church takes off its coat and rolls up its sleeves for the work, as it will. There are sixteen hundred millions of people now in the world, and and there are four hundred and fifty million Christians. Subtract the four hundred and fifty millions who are Christians from the sixteen hundred millions, and there are eleven hundred and fifty millions left to be Christianized. Now divide the eleven hundred and fifty millions by the four hundred and fifty millions already Christianized, and it makes less than three people for each Christian to bring to Christ. Surely when the Church gets wide awake no Christian will be content to take to heaven less than three. Why, I hope to take with me at least ten thousand. I know evangelists that have already gathered fifty thousand each for the kingdom. There are at least two hundred thousand men in Christendom whose one business it is to save souls. So that when I tell you all that we need to average is three souls reaped for God in a lifetime, all idea of from this omnipotent crusade I know of a Sabbath-school teacher who has spent her lifetime in teaching the young, and she has had five different classes during all these years, and she tells me they averaged about seven in a class, and they were all converted; and five times seven are thirty-five, as near as I can calculate. She brought her three and had thirty-two to spare. My grandmother brought her whole family into the kingdom, and her grandchildren, and, I hope, all her great-grandchildren, for God remembers a prayer seventy-five years old as well as though it were a minute old; and she took her three into the kingdom and had at least a hundred to spare.

Do I really mean all the earth will surrender to Christ? Yes. How about the uninviting portions? Will Greenland be evangelized? The possibility is that after a few more hundred brave lives are dashed out among the icebergs, that great refrigerator, will be given up to the walrus and the bear, and that the inhabitants will come down by invitation into tolerable climates, or those climates may soften; and as it has been positively demonstrated that the Arctic region was once a blooming garden and a fruitful field, those regions may change climate and again be a blooming garden and a fruitful field.

Professor Heer, of Zurich, says the remains of flowers have been found in the Arctic, showing it was like Mexico for climate; and it is found that the Arctic was the mother-region from which all the flowers descended. Professor Wallace says the remains of all styles of animal life are found in the Arctic, including those animals that can live only in warm climates. Now, that Arctic region which has been demonstrated by flora, and fauna, and geological argument to have been as full of vegetation and life as our Florida, may be turned back to its original bloom and glory, or it will be shut up as a museum of crystals for curiosity seekers once in a while to visit. But Arctic and Antarctic in some shape will belong to the Redeemer's realm.

What about other unproductive or repulsive regions? All the

the waters will be forced up to the great American desert between here and the Pacific by machinery now known or yet to be invented, and, as Great Salt Lake City has no rain and could not raise an apple or a bushel of wheat in a hundred years without artificial help, but is now through such means one great garden, so all the unproductive parts of all the continents will be turned into harvest fields and orchards. A half dozen De Lesseps will furnish the world with all the canals needed, and will change the course of rivers and open new lakes, and great Sahara Desert will be cut up into farms with an astounding yield of bushels to the acre.

The marsh will be drained of its waters and cured of its malaria. I saw the other day what was for many years called of Ohio, its chief crop chills and fevers, but now, by the tiles put into the ground to carry off the surplus moisture, transformed into the richest and healthiest of regions. The God who wastes nothing, I think, means that this world, from pole to pole, has to come to perfection of foliage and fruitage. For that reason He keeps us running through space, though so many fires are blazing down in its timbers, and so many mock terrors have threatened to dash it to pieces.

As soon as the earth is completed Christ will divide it up among the good. The reason He does not divide it now is because it is not done. A kind father will not divide the apple among his children until the apple is ripe. In fulfilment of the New Testament promise, "The meek shall inherit the earth," and the promise of the Old Testament, "He shall divide the spoil with the strong," the world will be apportioned to those worthy to possess it.

It is not so now. In this country, capable of holding, feeding, clothing, and sheltering twelve hundred million people, and where we have only sixty million inhabitants, we have two millions who cannot get honest work, and with their families an aggregation of five millions that are on the verge of starvation. Something wrong, most certainly. In some way there will be

A NEW APPORTIONMENT.

Many of the millionaire estates will crack to pieces on the dissipations of grandchildren, and then dissolve into the possession of the masses, who now have an insufficiency.

What, you say, will become of the expensive and elaborate buildings now devoted to debasing amusements? They will become schools, art galleries, museums, gymnasiums, and churches. The world is already getting disgusted with many of these amusements, and no wonder. What an importation of unclean theatrical stuff we have within the last few years had brought to our shores! And professors of religion patronizing such things! Having sold out to the devil, why don't you deliver the goods and go over to him publicly, body, mind, and soul, and withdraw your name from Christian churches, and say, "Know all the world by these presents, that I am a patron of uncleanness and a child of hell." Sworn to be the Lord's, you are perjurers.

But at last the tide has turned, and the despisers of purity overdid the matter.

A FOREIGN ACTRESS

of base morals arrived intending to make the tour of the States, but the remaining decency of our cities rose up and cancelled the contracts, and drove her back from our American stage, a woman fit for neither continent. In the name of Almighty God I take these abominations by the throat. If you think these offences are to go on forever, you do not know who the Lord is. God will not wait for the Day of Judgment. All these palaces of sin will become palaces of righteousness. They will come into the possession of those strong for virtue and strong for God. "He shall divide the spoil with the strong."

CHINA AND AFRICA,

the two richest portions of the earth by reason of metals and rare woods and inexhaustible productiveness, are not yet divided up among the good because they are not ready to be divided. Wait until all the doors that Livingstone opened in Africa shall be entered, and Bishop Taylor, with his band of self-supporting missionaries, have done their work, and the Ashantees and Senegambians shall know Christ as well as you know Him, and there shall be on the banks of the Nile and the Niger a higher civilization than is now to be found on the banks of the Hudson, then Christ will divide up that continent among His friends.

Wait until China, which is half as large as all Europe, shall have developed her capacities for rice, and tea, and sugar, among edibles; and her amethyst, and sapphire, and topaz, and opal, and jasper, and porphyry, among precious stones; and her rosewood, and ebony, and camphor, and varnish trees among precious woods; and turned up from her depths a half dozen Pennsylvanias of coal and iron, and twenty Nevadas of silver, and fifty Californias of gold, and her five hundred million of people shall be evangelized; then the Lord will divide it up among the good.

I do not underrate the enemy. Julius Cæsar got his greatest victories by fully estimating the vastness of his foes, and prepared his men for their greatest triumph by saying, "To-morrow King Juba will be here with thirty thousand horses, one hundred thousand skirmishers, and three hundred elephants." I do not underrate and Death, but do you know who commands us? Jehovah-Jireh. And the reserve corps behind us are all the armies of heaven and earth, with hurricane and thunderbolt. The good work of the world's redemption is going on every minute. Never so many splendid men and glorious women on the side of right as to-day. Never so many good people as now. Diogenes has been spoken of as a wise man because he went with a lantern at noonday, saying he was looking for an honest man. If he had turned his lantern toward himself he might have discovered a crank. Honest men by the ten thousand!

Through the International Series of Sunday-school Lessons the next generation all through Christendom are going to be wiser than any generation since the world stood.

THE KINGDOM IS COMING.

God can do it. No housewife with a chamois cloth ever polished a silver teaspoon with more ease than Christ will rub off from this world the tarnish, and brighten it up till it glows like heaven, and then the glorious apportionment, for my text is re-enforced by a score of other texts, when it says of Christ, "He shall divide the spoil with the strong."

"But," you say, "that is pleasant to think of for others, but before that time I shall have passed up into another existence, and I shall get no advantage from that new apportionment." Ah! you have only driven me to the other more

* We publish this sermon because we have given a pledge to our subscribers to publish every week the sermon Dr. Talmage preached the previous Sunday morning. We are, however, in this case unable to agree with Dr. Talmage in the views he expresses. Prophecy, as we read it, does not encourage the hope that the world will be converted by means of evangelistic efforts.

exciting and transporting consideration, and that is that Christ is going to divide up heaven in the same way. There are old that have been in the possession of its inhabitants for thousands of years, and they shall remain as they are. There are old family mansions in heaven filled with whole generations of kindred, and they shall never be driven out. Many of the victors from earth have already got their palaces, and they are pointed out to those newly arrived. Soon after our getting there we will ask to be shown the Apostolic residences, and ask where does Paul live, and John, and ask to be shown the patriarchal residences, and shall say, "Where does Abraham live, or Jacob?" and shown the martyr residences, and say, "Where does John Huss live, and Ridley?" We will want to see the boulevards where the chariots of conquerors roll. I will want to see the gardens where the princes walk. We will want to see where Handel, and Haydn, and Mozart, and Charles Wesley, and Thomas Hastings, and Bradbury have their homes, out of their windows, ever and anon, rolling some sonnet of an earthly oratorio or hymn transported with the composer. We will want to see Revival Terrace, where Whitefield, and Nettleton, and Payson, and Rowland Hill, and Charles Finney, and other giants of soul-reaping are resting from their almost supernatural labors, their doors thronged with converts just arrived, coming to report themselves.

But brilliant as the sunset, and like the leaves for number, are the celestial

HOMES YET TO BE AWARDED,

when Christ to you, and millions of others, shall divide the spoil. What do you want there? You shall have it. An orchard? There it is; twelve manner of fruit, and fruit every month. Do you want river scenery? Take your choice on the banks of the river, in longer, wider, deeper roll than Danube, or Amazon, or Mississippi if mingled in one, and emptying into the sea of glass, mingled with fire. Do you want your kindred back again? Go out and meet your father and mother without the staff or the stoop, and your children in a dance of immortal glee. Do you want a throne? Select it from the million burnished elevations. Do you want a crown? Pick it out of that mountain of diamonded coronets. Do you want your old church friends of earth around you? Begin to hum an old revival tune and they will flock from all quarters to revel with you in sacred reminiscence. All the earth for those who are here on earth at the time of continental and planetary distribution and all the heavens for those who are there.

That heavenly distribution of spoils will be

A SURPRISE TO MANY.

Here enters heaven the soul of a man who took up a great deal of room in the church on earth, but sacrificed little, and among his good works selfishness was evident. He just crowds through the shining gate, but it is a very tight sqeeze, so that the door-keeper has to pull hard to get him in; and this man expects half of heaven for his share of trophies, and he would like a monopoly of all its splendor, and to purchase lots in the suburbs, so that he could get advantage from the growth of the city. Well, he had a little grace of heart, just enough to get him through, and to him is given a second-hand crown, which one of the saints wore at the start, but exchanged for a brighter one as he went on from glory to glory. And he is put in an old house once occupied by an angel who was hurled out of heaven at the time of Satan's rebellion.

Right after him comes a soul that makes a great and the angels rush to the scene, each bringing to her a dazzling coronet. Who is she? Over what realm on earth was she queen? In what great Düsseldorf festival was she the cantatrice? Neither. She was an invalid who never left her room for twenty years; but she was strong in prayer, and she prayed down revival after revival, and pentecost after pentecost, upon the churches, and with her pale hands she knit many a mitten or tippet for the poor, and with her contrivances she added joy to many a holiday festival, and now, with those thin hands so strong for kindness, and with those white lips so strong for supplication, she has won coronation and enthronement and jubilee. And Christ says to the angels who have brought each a crown for the glorified invalid, "No, not these; they are not good enough. But in the jewelled vase at the right-hand side of my throne there is one that I have been preparing for her many a year, and for her every pang I have set an amethyst, and for her every good deed I have set a pearl. Fetch it now and fulfil the promise I gave her long ago in the sick-room, Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown."

But notice that there is only one being in the universe who can and will distribute the trophies of earth and heaven. It is the Divine Warrior, the Commander-in-Chief of the centuries, the universal Conqueror, the Son of God, Jesus. You will take the spoils from His hand, or never take them at all. Have His friendship and you may defy all time and all eternity, but without it you were a pauper, though you had a universe at your command. We are told in Revelation that Jacob's twelve sons were so honored as to have the twelve gates of heaven named after them—over one gate of heaven Naphtali, over another gate of heaven Issachar, over another Dan, over another Gad, over another Zebulon, over another Judah, and so on. But Christ's name is written over all the gates, and on every panel of the gates, and have His help, His pardon, His intercession, His atonement, I must, or be a forlorn wretch forever. My Lord and my God! make me and all who hear me this day, and all to whom these words shall come, Thy repentant, believing, sworn, consecrated, and ransomed followers forever.

THE CHAMPION OF THE AGES,

WHAT A DAY IT WILL BE!

This entire assemblage would rise to your feet if you could realize it, the day in which Christ shall, in fulfilment of my text, divide the spoil. It was a great day when Queen Victoria, in the midst of the Crimean War, distributed medals to the soldiers who had come home sick and wounded. At the Horse Guards, in presence of the royal family, the injured men were carried in or came on crutches—Colonel Trowbridge, who lost both feet at Inkerman; and Captain Sayer, who had the ankle joint of his right leg shot off at Alma; and Captain Curre, his disabled limb supported by a soldier, and others maimed, and disfigured, and exhausted—and with her own hand the Queen gave each the Crimean medal. And what triumphant days for those soldiers when, further on, they received the French medal with the imperial eagle, and the Turkish medal with its representation of four flags—France, Turkey, England, and Sardinia—and beneath it a map of the Crimea! And to all readers of history by the mere mention of the Waterloo medal, and the Cape medal, and the Gold Cross medal, and the medal struck for bravery in our American wars! But how insignificant all these compared with the day when the good soldiers of Jesus Christ shall come in out of the battles of this world, and in the presence of all the piled-up galleries of the redeemed and the unfallen, Jesus, our King, shall divide the spoil! The more wounds, the greater the inheritance. The longer the forced march, the brighter the trophy. The more terrific the exhaustion, the more glorious the transport. Not the gift of a brilliant ribbon, or a medal of brass, or silver, or gold, but a kingdom in which we are to reign forever and ever. Mansions on the eternal hills. Dominions of unfading power. Empires of unending love. Continents of everlasting light. Atlantic and Pacific Oceans of billowing joy.

It was a great day when Aurelian, the Roman Emperor, came back from his victories. In the front of the procession were wild beasts from all lands; among the captives Syrians, Egyptians, Goths, Vandals, Sarmatians, Franks. And Zenobia, the beautiful captive queen, on foot, in chains of gold that a slave had to help her carry, and jewels under the weight of which she almost fainted. And then came the chariot of Aurelian, followed by the Roman Senate and the Roman army; and from dawn till dark the procession was passing. Rome in all her history never saw anything more magnificent. But how when our Conqueror, Jesus, shall ride under the triumphal arches of heaven. His captives in thousands, not on foot but in chariots, all the kingdoms of earth and heaven in procession; the armies celestial on white horses. Rumbling artillery of thunderbolts never again to be unlimbered. Kingdoms in line, centuries in line, saintly, cherubic, seraphic, archangelic splendors in line, and Christ seated on one great rolling Hosanna, made out of all Hallelujahs of all worlds, shall cry Halt! to the procession. And not forgetting even the humblest in all the reach of His omnipresence, He shall rise, and then and there, His work done and His glory consummated, proceed, amid an ecstasy such as neither mortal nor immortal ever imagined, to divide the spoil.

A THOUSAND-MILE WALK.

THE present severe distress among workingmen in Great Britain has led to many anxious thoughts and ingenious devices on the part of the sufferers. When a man is surrounded by children who are hungry and has neither food nor money, any honest scheme that promises a return is welcome. James Gordon, a canny Scotchman of Dundee, found himself in that situation recently. He was originally an engineer, but, one of his hands being crippled in an accident, he was unable to pursue that vocation. Then he obtained work in a bakery, but that failed, and he tried the painting trade. He did not succeed at that either, and ultimately drifted down until he was glad to earn a living as a porter. At the best the income so gained is precarious, and latterly the number of his competitors having been increased from the ranks of unemployed artisans, there has been a scarcity of "jobs"—that is, jobs which he could attend to; unhappily, there is never any scarcity of jobs of another kind.

As Gordon was unable to obtain productive employment, he conceived the idea of occupying himself in unproductive labor. He set out on November 2d on a journey on foot to London, which is five hundred and seven miles from Dundee. With a light truck carrying a change of clothing and a board on which was inscribed the nature of his undertaking, he set out to walk the thousand miles. The man's sense and knowledge of human nature was justified by the result. Numbers of persons who would have refused to give him work or to help him in earning an honest living were interested in his ridiculous adventure, and gave him money as he went along. On the first day he received a sum equivalent to five dollars, whereas, when he was doing honest work, it had taken him more than ten weeks to earn that sum. He continued his journey, resting only on Sundays, and completed the first half on November 25th, when he entered London. After remaining there four days he started back again to Dundee.

The trip has supplied him with funds to save him and his family from starvation, which was his object in making it. The wealthy classes—landowners, members of Parliament, and philosophers—may attend to the moral lesson of it, which does not concern him. It is worth considering, however, for society must be in a very unsatisfactory condition when a man cannot get a living by doing a man's work, but thrives when he makes an ass of himself.

CURIOUS WEDDING CUSTOMS IN CHINA.

A YOUNG Chinaman who has been very useful to the missionaries in China in teaching them the language has recently married. He and his bride were both Christians, so the ceremony was Christian; but after that the customs of the country were observed. Miss Bennett, who with Miss McKechnie and Dr. Reifsnyder attended the wedding, writes the following description, which appears in the Missionary Link:

"Directly after the ceremony the newly-married couple were carried in sedan chairs to the home of the husband's parents, which was hereafter to be that of the bride, and which stands on the opposite side of the canal from our Bridgman Memorial Home. As we drew near the house we heard the music made by a band of youthful musicians, who were doing their best. The chair in which the bride was carried to her new home was very pretty, being beautifully decorated in a variety of colors, the principal one being bright red, always used on such occasions. The chair is borne on the shoulders of coolies, and is entirely closed so as to conceal the bride from the gaze of passers-by. The groom follows behind in a plain sedan chair without any decorations.

"On arriving at the entrance door the chairs are placed on the ground, the groom comes forth, afterward the bride, who is assisted to alight by the mother of the husband and some other relative of the family. According to the Chinese custom, none of the immediate friends of the bride are present at such times, not even the mother, which seems very strange to us. On this occasion the bride is not permitted to help herself in any way; hence the mother of the groom, with her assistant, stand one on either side of the bride holding her hands, assisting her to walk and bow at certain intervals.

"The young couple were led to the main room, where two tables were spread with a great variety of food, one for the bride and one for the groom. They do not even taste of the bountiful repast, but only go through a form of eating, one dish after another being held to their lips; but they taste not, and are shortly led away to their own room. After eating, in the eyes of the Chinese, they are man and wife. Tables were spread for the guests, and the doctor, Miss McKechnie, and myself were invited to take our places at the first table. We did so, considering ourselves highly honored, and ate of a variety of Chinese mixtures, using the chop-sticks quite successfully. The Chinese, who were all the while crowding around us, seemed to enjoy watching us very much."

SANTHAL SUPERSTITION.

THE Rev. A. Haergert, the young German missionary who has consecrated his life to work among the benighted tribe of Santhals in India, relates the following incident as a specimen of their superstition:

"One Saturday Barriar Manjhi, from Khairaboni, rushed into our Veranda greatly excited, and saying that the villagers were seeking to kill him. Seeing that he was very ill I gave him some medicine, and then walked over with him to his village chief, who also was very ill and dying. The villagers had held a meeting, and decided that Barriar's wife was a witch, and that it was she who was destroying the chief. They, therefore, sent messengers to bring her. Fortunately for the poor woman, she was not at home, but her sick husband was pulled out of bed, and brought before the assembly. He was asked why he had not beaten his wife as she was a witch, and as he did not reply satisfactorily, two enraged men got up and struck him, and then beat his head on the rocky ground. The man escaped from their hands and fled to our mission-house. I had a long talk with the people and calmed them, and attended the chief medically, and, although the witch was declared to have eaten his heart, he is now quite well again. Had they caught the poor woman they would, as is their custom, have beaten her severely, and forced filth down her throat.

"During the year I have opened eight new dispensaries, in charge of my own trained men. Sufferers have been attended from ninety-five different villages, relieving much suffering and saving several lives. Pray for them, that our Saviour's kingdom may be greatly promoted by such labor. Just now we are busy building eight new chapels; three, six, ten, and twenty miles from each other, in the midst of heathendom."

FRUIT FROM A VOICE-TEST.

A FRIEND of Mr. C. H. Spurgeon recently mentioned a remarkable conversion, resulting from an experiment Mr. C. H. Spurgeon made upon the acoustic character of a building in which he was to preach: "Some years ago Mr. Spurgeon, intending to preach in the Crystal Palace on a certain date, himself went to the palace for the purpose of giving orders as to where the partitions were to be put up, that his voice might be heard over as wide an area as possible. He tried his voice from various parts, reciting aloud the text, 'Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world.' Years passed by, and last year, when Mr. Spurgeon was laid aside by sickness, a message came to him requesting that he would visit a man who was dying, and was desirous to speak with Mr. Spurgeon. He, being unable to go, sent his brother, and the dying man said, 'Tell Mr. Spurgeon that twenty years ago I was working in the Crystal Palace, making some alterations previous to a sermon which he was going to give. He came to the palace to see the partitions raised, and called out several times, "Behold the Lamb of God." It was that text, sounded out in a strange manner, that was the arrow which God used to pierce my heart, and made me see my Saviour.'"

MR. RUSKIN'S FIRST PRAYER.

IN his autobiography, recently published, the great critic and popular writer writes in a tone of profound regret of an experience so blissful that his inability to retain it he counts the gravest of his losses. It was the joy of answered prayer. He was returning to his home from Switzerland when it came to him. "Nearing Paris," he says, "I opened my English letters, which told me that my eldest Croydon cousin, John, in whose prosperity and upward rounding of fortune's wheel all of us had been confident, was dead in Australia. So much stronger than I, and so much more dutiful, working for his people in the little valley of Wandel, out in the great opposite desolate country; and now the dust of it lay on him, as on his brother the beach-sand on this side the sea. There was no grief for me in his loss, so little had I known, and less remembered, him; but much awe, and wonder, when all the best and kindest of us were thus struck down, what my own selfish life was to end in.

"With these thoughts and fears fastening on me, as I lost sight first of Mont Blanc, and then on the lines of Jura, and saw the level road with its aisle of poplars in perspective vista of the five days between Dijon and Calais, the fever returned slightly with a curious tingling, and yet partly, it seemed to me, deadness of sensation in the throat, which would not move, for better nor worse, through the long days, and mostly wakeful nights. I do not know if diphtheria had been in those epochs, known or talked of, but I extremely disliked this feeling in the throat, and passed from dislike into sorrowful alarm, and wondered if I should ever get home to Denmark Hill again. Although the poetical states of religious feeling taught me by George Herbert's rhymes, and the reading of formal petition, whether in psalter or litany, at morning and evening and on Sunday forenoon, were sincere enough in their ways, no occasion of life had yet put me to any serious trial of direct prayer.

"I never knew of Jessie's or my aunt's sicknesses, or now of my cousin John's, until too late for prayer; in our own household there had been no instantly dangerous illness since my own in 1835, and during the long threatening of 1841 I was throughout more sullen and rebellious than frightened. But now between the Campo Santo and Santa Maria Novella, I had been brought into some knowledge of the relation that might truly exist between God and His creatures, and thinking what my father and mother would feel if I did not get home to them through those poplar avenues, I fell gradually into the temper, and more or less tacit offering, of very real prayer, which lasted patiently through two long days, and what I knew of the nights, on the road home.

"On the third day, as I was about coming in sight of Paris, what people who are in the habit of praying know as the consciousness of answer came to me, and a certainty that the illness, which had all this while increased, if anything, would be taken away. Certainty in mind, which remained unshaken, through unabated discomfort of body, for another night and day, and then the evil symptoms vanished in an hour or two on the road beyond Paris, and I found myself in the inn at Beauvais entirely well, with a thrill of conscious happiness altogether new to me, which if I had been able to keep! Another 'had been' this, the gravest of all I lost; the last with which I shall trouble the reader."

THE TIMES OF THE GENTILES.

By Rev. George S. Bishop, D.D., of Orange, N. J.

The Period they Comprise—Their March in Decadence—Their Outline—The Present Period Roman—Society Roman—The Laws Roman—Progressive Deterioration—Gradation of the Metals—Of the Beasts—Effect of Thinking Mud.

"THE times of the Gentiles" is a comprehensive expression, and can only be understood when taken in contrast—vis-a-vis—with the counter-expression, the times of the Jews. They include the whole interregnum, or period of Gentile supremacy—i.e., from Nebuchadnezzar to the re-transfer and reversion of royalty to the last living prince and lineal successor of the House of David—i.e., to Christ at the coming of Christ.

The times of the Gentiles include the Church dispensation, but the phrase does not include the thought of the Church, which, looked upon as heavenly, is outside of the scene altogether, and, incognito, waits for her rapture.

Focalize the Scriptures, and they teach that all the lines of God's eternal purposes as to the future blessing of the world meet their fulfilment—not mystically in Christianity and figuratively through the Church, but literally after the Church has been caught away into heaven—in the restoration of the Jews, God's chosen earthly people, to their original and promised land—and in the reign and glory of Messiah as the second Adam. Meanwhile the times of the Gentiles are being fulfilled—they ripen to Antichrist. In those times of the Gentiles it has pleased God that we should have our life and life-work. We wish, therefore, to understand them. We wish to take in our surroundings, to have before us the projection and the framing of the ages, and to know the ruin that is impending, that we may not be deceived, nor flattered, nor cajoled by any false appearances; but resolutely stand against the tide and flow of vast ungodliness, and in the midst of it save principle, and from it rescue souls.

An outline of this decadence, this development, the real evolution—they called it "evolution" at Harvard University the other day; and so it is, but only down, not up—the real evolution of our human nature is presented in the book of Daniel, supplemented by St. John's Revelation, the one book being the flower and consummation of the Old Testament as the other is of the New.

The outline or sketch of the times of the Gentiles is given us twice by Daniel:

* From his address at the Chicago Conference. A full report, with reports of all the addresses at the Conference, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Price, 50 cts.

1. In the successive parts and members of a statue-like world-man.

2. In the succession of four beasts which represent those parts or periods again, but from another point of view, the first is man, the race, as seen by Nebuchadnezzar—i.e., within nature's horizons. The second is the race seen by Daniel, and, from the heavenly view-point, by God. Let us begin, then, with

THE GREAT IMAGE.

There have been four, and only four, universal world empires—Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome. The world-man and the beasts set forth those four.

The head of the image represents Babylon (Dan. 2 : 38). "Thou art this head of gold." The arms and breast of silver represent the double kingdom of the Medes and Persians (Dan. 5 : 28). "Peres, thy kingdom is divided, and is given to the Medes and Persians." The belly and thighs of brass represent the "brazen-clad" Greeks (Dan. 8 : 20). "The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia, and the rough goat which 'smote the ram' and 'broke his horns' and 'stamped upon him,' is the King of Grecia." The legs of iron, with feet and toes of iron and of miry clay, are the great Roman Empire, split into the East and West (Luke 2 : 1). "There went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be taxed;" that decree is not repealed to this day.

THE WORLD OF THE PRESENT

is Roman. Its social fabric is Roman. Rex, regal; princeps, prince; dux, duke; martius, marquis; comes, count; vice-comes, viscount; eques, esquire—this whole social fabric is Roman. The laws of the world are all Roman. Their character is that of iron mixed with miry clay; of will, now arbitrary, and now shifting; Justinian in the state; tradition in the Church; the opposite of pure theocracy; the rule of Scripture and Christ. Iron is the character of Rome. The crown of Charlemagne was iron. The crown of Charles V. was iron. Napoleon was crowned with iron. The crown of Germany is iron. The crown of Italy, worn by Humbert and handed down from the year 590, is iron.

The same sketch of the kingdoms comes to light again in the successive symbolism of the beasts.

THE BEASTS OF DANIEL, the winged lion seen to-day on Babylonian tablets; the bear of Caucasus, the rapacious appetite of Persia; the spotted, four-headed leopard representing the rapidity of march, and the mottled heterogeneous elements of Alexander's great army—breaking up as it did in four heads—under Cassander, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy. And, finally, the nameless, terrible beast that sat upon the seven hills—Rome, the creation, counterpart, and incarnation of the dragon.

This outline or sketch of the times of the Gentiles thus drawn out before us let us study their character. It is decadence—

PROGRESSIVE DETERIORATION.

The tableaux themselves—the image and the beasts suggest this. The Scripture confirms and declares it.

The metallic values of the image are found to decline. Silver is worth less than gold, brass than silver, iron than brass, and clay than iron.

The ponderousness or the weight of the image declines. The specific gravity of gold is 19.5; of silver, 10.47; of brass, 8; of cast-iron, 5; of clay, 1.930 So top-heavy, so unstable is this image, running down from 19 to 1, that the slightest touch upon the toes must bring it over in fragments.

So, too, with the beasts. They begin with the lion, the king of the animal tribes, and with him winged as celestial, and they run down to a monster emerging from mud—half hippopotamus, ending in serpent.

The Scriptures declare that the world, the natural around us, moves on a descending scale, grows worse and worse. Two awful facts, starting, volcano-like, up from the surface of Scripture, prove this; one of them judgment to come; the other, Antichrist. Judgment to come! If the world is hastening to judgment, if judgment be the next thing to expect, then the world is not growing better and better, but worse.

I do not stop now to show, as a matter of fact, how government ran down from the autocracy of Nebuchadnezzar—through the Parliament of Persia and the oligarchies of Greece—to that mingling of the communistic "clay and clamor" which created imperators and dethroned them, and at last upheaved them all in the vast hordes of those barbaric tribes which, like a restless sea, flowed over and submerged old Rome.

The descent through the ages is from God's will to man's will. This is not affected by civilization. An American citizen boldly blaspheming under the light of the Gospel is no advance upon the devout Abimelech of the days of Isaac and Job. The mere fact that he lives in a house with modern improvements and reads his paper by an electric light helps nothing. God says that nature and the natural man grow worse and worse. That as the ages roll on they are becoming more reckless and wilful.

In earlier days—in Nebuchadnezzar's days—men, our race at large, believed Jehovah, received communications from Jehovah. Their eyes were upward, they studied the stars. Now, men, our race at large, are infidel—deny inspiration, and study slime instead of stars. A man is what he thinks. If he thinks mud

HE WILL BE MUD.

That is why, under the reign of Huxley, Darwin, and the purient biologic school, reverence is dying away; the sacredness of womanhood dying away; dignities, titles, self-respect, dying away; and London becomes like to Sodom and Paris like to Gomorrah.

This ruin we confront. Its tides are rolling on. The presence of the Church, soon to be caught away, holds it in check for a moment, but this removed, the coming of the Antichrist, the lawless one, is certain. His avant-couriers are with us now. Self-will, the vice of human nature, ripened to one revolt, will flower in one who comes in his own name, and doing his own will shall deify material force and show himself as God; and all inventions and improvements binding more and more to the material serve to help on that day.

THE AFRICAN MASSACRES.

THREE letters from Mr. Ashe, giving details of the deplorable events which have taken place in Africa, as already mentioned in these columns, have been published in the London Times. The following are a few extracts from them:

The first letter was dated May 26th, 1886. Mr. Ashe says: "It is with deepest sorrow that I write to say that the storm of persecution has again broken out. The King has sent and apprehended most of the leading Christians, both those who read with the Frenchmen and ourselves. We hear that eleven victims have already sealed their testimony with their blood. Several members of the Native Church Council have been arrested. We hear that as many as seventy people have been seized, and we hear that they are going to burn them, which may the good Lord forbid." . . .

In June Mr. Ashe wrote: "I had only time when I last wrote to give a hasty account of the beginning of the terrible storm of persecution which has burst upon our little church. . . . Picture the tyrant playing the first act in

THE AWFUL TRAGEDY.

One of the elder storekeepers, a Christian lad, is called into the royal presence. 'Can you read?' asks his Majesty. 'Yes,' boldly answers the page. Then something of this sort occurs: 'I'll teach you to read,' cries his Majesty, catching up a spear and laying it about the poor lad's shoulders. The spear was broken in two, and Mwanga, catching up the blade, gashed and hacked at the head of this his most faithful servant, interspersing the gashing with plentiful kicks. When the exertion had exhausted him, he bade a chief, apparently nearly as vile as himself, continue the lesson. Then he sent and had as many as fifty of his pages seized and made prisoners, and the principal Christians, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, were also apprehended.

"Then came ghastly stories of shocking and shameful mutilations. Two young chiefs were thus treated, one of whom, a Protestant, died from the effects of it; the other has recovered. . . . At this moment I recall vividly the voice and face of a man who came here almost daily. Several voyages he made with me in the boat to and from Msalala. He was, further, a member of our Native Church Council. The executioners suddenly appeared before his house to arrest him, but were afraid to enter. At the time he was engaged in holding prayers with several lads. These bolted through the thin reed-wall of the house and escaped. One alone remained with him. 'Do not be afraid that I will shoot you,' cried the Christian; 'come in and take me.' They bound him and took him, as also the friend with him, before the King. 'Do you read?' 'Yes.'

was the summary sentence. . . . After the massacre the head executioner reported to the King that he had never killed men who showed such fortitude and endurance, and that they had prayed aloud to God in the fire. This caused merriment in the court, the King remarking that God did not rescue them from his power."

The third letter is dated July 12th, and Mr. Ashe says: "We are in much the same position as when we last wrote, at the end of June. A few words of the Lord's work in our midst. Most of our work is now carried on in secret and under the cover of darkness. At first, when the storm broke upon us, all was darkness and fear. We knew the slaughter had been terrible, but who the slain were we knew not. After a while, at dead of night, one well-known face was joyfully welcomed, and then another. Soon many came, and with thankful hearts we found that, though many had fallen, many, many more had escaped and are now hiding. On June 30th, Bekweyamha, the young chief whom I mentioned, of the royal family of Unyoro, came, as also an old reader named Lukia, and were baptized; also a boy named Mudembya, who is a very earnest little reader, and would have been baptized some months ago, but was hindered from coming on the day fixed."

"Subsequent to these massacres not less than twenty persons had applied for baptism and had received the ordinance. They did this, of course, in the clear view of the fact that by this act they might seal

THEIR DEATH-WARRANTS.

Among the notes of individual cases among the martyrs we give the following: "Kidza Musali Fredi Wigram. Baptized Sunday, September 21st, 1884. An earnest Christian and very regular attendant; has caused us deep thankfulness; most zealous in teaching others; one of those last baptized was one of his winning. When our dear children were murdered he was standing by. The cruel chief who was his over-lord (he himself having a small post called Musali), and who was carrying out Mwanga's fearful command, threatened to burn him and all his household. Fredi replied: 'Very well; do so. I am a Christian and I am not afraid.' This was merely a threat. When the chief heard that his Musali was to be seized this month (June, 1886) he warned him to fly, but Fredi refused, and was taken and unmercifully clubbed to death before being flung into the flames. When I found heart to visit the scene of our children's murder it was he who led me to the place. When we reached it he knelt with me and poured out his heart to God that He would bring His salvation to those in darkness. In no long time he was to be a partaker in that blessed death: 'Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord.' Fredi was a member of the Native Church Council, was married, and a regular communicant."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The House Committee on Rivers and Harbors completed the appropriation for that purpose and presented the bill to the House on January 5th. Its total is $7,217,750. The estimates amounted to $30,261,749. What the total will be when the bill finally reaches the President, and how much of the amount will be legitimately expended, are problems which those patriots who value their peace of mind will not meditate upon.

The Nicaragua Canal Scheme was again before Congress last week. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on Thursday reported a bill to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, and in doing so intimated that unless the construction of a canal on the Nicaragua route shall soon be undertaken by this Government or by citizens of the United States, Nicaragua will seek aid from European nations. The proposed company probably intends to use the latest survey and plans of Engineer Menocal, whose estimate of cost was $51,234,000. This is not much more than one sixth of the amount the Panama Canal will cost, and its construction is declared by eminent engineers to be quite practicable. The scheme is therefore regarded with favor as promising a profitable investment, and also as discouraging Europeans from meddling with the affairs of this continent.

A Bill to Dispose of the Surplus was Presented in the House last week by Mr. Hiscock, of New York. His proposal is to remove one half the duty from imported sugar, which will reduce the surplus by twenty-five millions a year; to pay bounties of various kinds to manufacturers of domestic sugar; to abolish the internal revenue tax upon tobacco, which now yields twenty-eight millions, and to remove the internal revenue tax upon alcohol used in the arts. The bill seems to have caused less amusement in the House than it does in the country. Perhaps Mr. Hiscock has introduced it as a joke. The taxpayers have been asking for a long time past why they are required to furnish the Government with about fifty million dollars a year more than it has any legitimate use for. This bill is certainly one way of dealing with the problem.

The Prevalence of Crime in Washington, particularly among juveniles, was pressed on the attention of Congress last week by Senator Vance, who, in presenting a petition, quoted some remarkable statistics. The proportion of crime to population in the District of Columbia, when compared with that of other cities, is unfavorable to the federal capital. The number of arrests last year in Springfield, Mass., was only 44 for every 1000 of the population; in Cincinnati and Brooklyn, 48; in Providence, 58; in Columbus and Philadelphia, 60; in New York, 61; in Buffalo, 70; in Boston, 79; in Baltimore, 80; in Chicago, 81; and in the District of Columbia, 126, or more than twice as many as in New York, Brooklyn, or Philadelphia. The proportion of juvenile criminals to the population is still more remarkable. In Washington it is four times greater than in New York and five times greater than in Springfield. It must have astonished Congress to learn that this state of things is attributed to defective laws in the one city that is under its government. The most glaring defect is that there is no law prohibiting minors from buying liquor or visiting gambling resorts.

The Romantic Marriage of the Secretary of the Interior was solemnized at Macon, Ga., on January 5th. Rumor has been busy about this wedding for some time past, but by many persons it was regarded as mere gossip. Mr. Lamar, however, was married on Wednesday, and there are more than ordinary reasons for congratulation. It appears that, forty years ago, when young Lamar was a quiet, unassuming law student of poetic temperament, he fell in love with Miss Henrietta Dean, the daughter of a man of great wealth residing at Macon. His suit was not favorably regarded by the lady's father, and a more wealthy suitor won the lady and made her an excellent husband. Mr. Lamar also married, his wife being Miss Longstreet, a sister of General Longstreet. The marriage was a happy one, but after some years Mrs. Lamar died. Last year the Secretary met his youthful love, who had become a widow. The affection of forty years ago was reawakened, and now the lady will take her place among the Cabinet ladies in Washington.

The Wearing of Fashionable Hats by Ladies at theatres was a prominent topic of the daily press during the past week. Gentlemen who sit behind ladies, so adorned, complain that they cannot see what goes on upon the stage. Every journal has published letters protesting against this headgear and appealing to the ladies not to wear the large hats in the theatres. It is reported that these appeals have met with a favorable response. Several parties of fashionable ladies last week left their hats in an anteroom before entering the house. If the criticisms of the press on the performances produced on the stage in several cases were just, it would appear that the ladies would have displayed better taste if, when they and their hats parted company, they had reversed the arrangement, remaining in the anteroom themselves and sending their hats into the theatre. The gentlemen, too, might have profited morally if some broad-brimmed hat had been interposed between them and the spectacle on the stage.

A Fatal Railroad Disaster Occurred at Republic, a small town near Tiffin, Ohio, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad on January 4th. It was the result of the usual combination—a fast express train and a slow-going freight train on a sharp curve. When the engineer of the express, which was travelling at sixty miles an hour, rounded the curve he saw the freight train crawling along only one hundred yards away. The express engineer, on seeing the collision inevitable, blew the whistle for down brakes, reversed his engine, and jumped through the cab-window. The locomotives were reduced to a confused mass of iron and brass. The cars telescoped, and fire breaking out rapidly enveloped the train in flames. Many of the passengers—how many cannot be told—were killed outright or imprisoned in the wreck and burned to death in full view of the uninjured passengers, who were powerless to lend any assistance, and could only stand by and hear the pitiful shrieks of the burning victims mingling with the roar of the frightful conflagration. At the inquest the conductor of the freight train testified that he thought it safe to go ahead from the last stopping-place, as he had forty-five minutes in which to travel to the siding, only five miles off. This could have been done easily had the steam been kept up, but it sank from one hundred and forty pounds to forty on the way, and the train came almost to a standstill. The conductor looked at his watch and saw that the express was nearly due. The engineer, however, "did not seem to realize the danger." The conductor added that he had seen the engineer have four drinks of whiskey on the way. This statement indicates that the catastrophe was not an accident.

The Reconstruction of the British Cabinet makes but slow progress. Mr. Goschen has accepted the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer (Secretary of the Treasury) vacated by Lord Randolph Churchill, but further changes are contemplated which were not arranged last week. Lord Iddesleigh, who is better known as Sir Stafford Northcote, is to quit the Foreign Office, where his blunders are said to have been serious. The Premier himself is expected to take that office, in which he has had some experience. Viscount Cross and Mr. W. H. Smith are also to be moved to other places, if not out of the Cabinet altogether. The Premier has invited several Liberals to enter the Cabinet, among them Lord Northbrook and the Marquis of Lansdowne, who is now Governor-General of Canada. Loud complaints are made by the Conservative Party over these good things being offered to Liberals, and deep chagrin is felt because both statesmen have refused them. The Conservatives are proud, and they feel humiliated at Lord Salisbury seeking help outside their ranks and being rebuffed. It is all the more mortifying because English journals have been ridiculing the new French Premier, who has found a difficulty in getting respectable statesmen to enter his Cabinet.

The Reunion of the Liberal Party in England is predicted in the cable dispatches. Mr. Gladstone last week wrote a letter to Sir W. Vernon Harcourt referring to the desire for reconciliation expressed in Mr. Chamberlain's recent speech, and intimated that he would approve of a free discussion of the differences between the two sections. Sir W. Vernon Harcourt accordingly wrote to Mr. Chamberlain, and a conference was arranged which is to open this day. A reconciliation is deemed probable by the politicians, and the Irish members fear that it will be effected by concessions on the part of Mr. Gladstone. That, however, is improbable, as Mr. Chamberlain is evidently anxious to return, and a few nominal concessions to save appearances will be sufficient to satisfy him. In the Unionist camp he is overshadowed by Lord Hartington, while if he can return, leaving that statesman "out in the cold," he will have a fair prospect of succeeding Mr. Gladstone as leader of the Liberal Party at no distant date.

The Reported Alliance Between Russia and Germany has been contradicted. It was announced in the London Times on the authority of its Paris correspondent. The same journal now denies it on the authority of its Vienna correspondent. The facts appear to be that the German Emperor has used his personal friendship with the Czar to urge upon him a new solution of the Bulgarian difficulty which that potentate has taken into consideration. It is that the Czar withdraw the candidacy of Prince Nicholas of Mingrelia, and that instead Prince George of Leuchtenberg be recommended to the Sobranje, which would doubtless elect him if Germany and Russia agreed in support of his candidacy. While the Czar would not accept the candidate of either England or Austria, it is believed that he will be reluctant to reject the candidate of Germany. Prince George is thirty-four years of age, and has a fair reputation. His family connections are remarkable. He is a great-grandson of Josephine, the first wife of Napoleon I., a grandson of Czar Nicholas, the grandfather of the present Czar, and a grand-nephew of the Emperor of Germany.

Mr. D. L. Moody has Commenced Union evangelistic services in the Western division of Chicago, which will be continued for several weeks. On January 2d he preached to a large audience in the Chicago Avenue Church, and in the afternoon delivered an address in the First Congregational Church to women, and in the evening preached to a great throng of both sexes. Ten years have passed away since Messrs. Moody and Sankey led the great Tabernacle meetings in Chicago, when multitudes heard from their lips the Gospel in sermon and in song, and large numbers were converted. Mr. Sankey on January 2d and 9th took part in the services held in Cooper Union, New York.

Dr. Horatio Potter, Bishop of New York, Died on Sunday, January 2d. He had been in feeble health for several years and had relinquished his episcopal duties to his nephew, Assistant Bishop Henry C. Potter, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on May 8th, 1884. The deceased bishop was in his eighty-fifth year, having been born on February 9th, 1802. He had been confined to his home for nearly four years owing to a severe attack of pneumonia, which prostrated him at the close of a period of arduous and protracted labor. It was a renewal of this disease which has now proved fatal. He was ordained priest in 1828, and consecrated to the episcopate in 1854.

The American Institute of Christian Philosophy held its monthly meeting on January 6th at 4 Winthrop Place, New York. Donations to the Endowment Fund to the amount of two hundred dollars were announced by the President, Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D. Nine new members were welcomed. An impressive paper was read by Dr. J. F. Dripps, of Philadelphia, on "The Kingdom of God." He declared that the coming of the kingdom is the one way to "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity;" to the Brotherhood of Nations; to the Final Philosophy, and the ultimate perfection of man.

A Public Avowal of Belief in the Premillennial Advent of Christ was made recently by the Rev. Henry M. Scudder, D.D., the esteemed pastor of Plymouth Congregational Church, Chicago. In commencing a sermon on "Christ's Second Coming," he said: "In answer to the question, Will it be premillennial and personal? I think that the Scriptures teach, in the most explicit manner, that Christ will come before the millennium, and that His coming will be a personal coming." Dr. Scudder has given notice that, on account of ill-health, he desires to be released from his pastoral office, and requests that steps be taken to secure his successor.

The Gang of Loafers who Surrounded the Rev. George C. Haddock, the martyred prohibitionist of Sioux City, Ia., on the fatal night on which he met his death, are now on trial for the crime. The evidence points to the man Arensdorf as the one who fired the fatal shot, but Leader, one of the prisoners, has made a statement which may save him from the noose. Leader states that the shot was fired by a man not in custody, whose name he declines to give. He describes his dress, however, and from that description the police have no difficulty in recognizing Leavitt as the man referred to. Leader admits that he was present at the time of the murder, and knows the names of all the parties. A party had gathered in Jung's saloon that evening to await the return of Mr. Haddock, who had gone to the outskirts of the city to get evidence in the injunction suits. John Arensdorf was there, and when Bismarck came in to announce that the buggy had returned the crowd at once started out and walked briskly to the corner where the crime was committed, and there awaited the preacher's coming. Leader states that he and a companion, seeing that there was to be trouble, passed through the crowd, and when about one hundred feet away heard the shot, and turning quickly around saw Haddock stagger and fall, and saw the man who fired the shot run north up Water Street. Leavitt not being in custody causes Leader's statement to be regarded with suspicion as an attempt to fix the responsibility on the man who has escaped.

Responsibility for Losses Incurred by Passengers in sleeping-cars is, so far as Massachusetts is concerned, to be borne by the companies in future. In a decision rendered on Friday last by the Supreme Court of that State, Chief-Justice Morton said: "A sleeping-car company holds itself out to protect passengers during the night, when a passenger is powerless, from the nature of things, to protect his property. When property such as a man may reasonably carry is stolen the company is liable for it. Such a rule is required by public policy and by the true interests of both the passenger and the company." This decision appears reasonable, and will probably result in the companies employing watchmen or taking some other precaution to prevent the passengers being robbed on their journey. The passengers will not now be kept awake by anxiety about the safety of their property. So many professing Christians are wrapped in spiritual slumber as they journey through life that it might be supposed that they imagined some similar law protected them; but it is not so. Constant watchfulness is required of all (Rev. 3 : 11).

A Disastrous Shipwreck on the Virginia coast occurred soon after midnight on Friday last. The life-saving patrol from Little Island, near Norfolk, was walking his beat when he saw a large ship stranded on the bar. He fired a rocket to let the crew of the ship know that assistance was coming, and then hurried to his station to notify the life-boat crew. A mortar was fired, but the line did not reach the ship, and five more efforts having been made without success, the life-savers realized that she was beyond the range of the mortars. It was then resolved to launch the life-boat, though the waves were rolling very high. A crew of the very best men at the station was selected, and they set out knowing the perilous nature of their undertaking. They reached the ship safely and received five of the crew into their boat, and assisted in lowering one of the ship's boats, in which the remaining ten men on board were placed. In returning to the shore a wave of tremendous power struck both boats, capsizing them, and hurling the twenty-two men into the water. All were drowned but two of the life-savers, and one of those two was so seriously hurt that he cannot live. The death of the gallant men has cast a gloom over the neighborhood. It is so sad to think that their lives were sacrificed fruitlessly. They neither saved themselves nor others. It is a blessed thing for our race that Christ's mission to this shipwrecked world was not such an unavailing sacrifice. It cost His life; but all who avail themselves of His work are saved (John 18 : 9).

A Convict Visited the President on Thursday last. He was a young man who, having broken a United States law, was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. Recently the President pardoned him, and the young man's first act after his release was to set out for Washington to thank Mr. Cleveland in person. On his arrival at the White House he sent in his card, and the President at once recognized the name and asked that the young man be called in. According to the Star, the President received him with a cordial shake of the hand, and listened while the young man thanked him for restoring him to liberty and to his family. The President for some moments talked to him in a fatherly manner, telling him that there was plenty of room in the world for him to become a useful citizen, and advised him to go to work and make a man of himself, and he assured him that he would watch his course with interest. It may be hoped that the advice will be followed. It would be both ungrateful and illogical if he inferred from his pardon and kindly reception that his crime was trivial and that reformation was unnecessary. Yet many people seem to reason that way when God for Christ's sake forgives them (II Peter 2 : 20).

A Confidential Clerk in Wall Street, New York, had an agreeable surprise a few days ago, according to the Times. It states that one of the large stock operators called his confidential clerk into his private room and said to him: "I have put your name in my will, and you will get ten thousand dollars when I die. Now, I am in pretty good health, and don't intend to die very soon, so I will help you out in the mean time by paying you legal interest on the amount. Here is a cheque for six hundred dollars to pay the first year's interest." And he handed the astonished clerk the slip of paper. Thus the clerk was doubly gratified. The prospect of the legacy was good news, and the interest in hand and to come rendered the prospect a reality. That is, in a far higher sense, the believer's position. He does not have to wait until he dies for his inheritance; he receives an earnest of it in the grace which comes to him daily sustaining his spiritual life (Eph. 1 : 14).

A Bank Deposit Unclaimed for Twenty-five years was called for on December 28th at a San Francisco bank. In the year 1861 a man opened an account with the bank and made various small deposits, amounting in all to $12.42. In September of that year the deposits ceased and nothing more was heard of the depositor until last month. Then he entered the bank, produced his book, had the interest reckoned, and drew the total, which was $149 07. The man was fortunate, for during his absence an effort had been made by the Attorney-General of California to have all deposits which had been left unclaimed for a certain number of years escheated to the State. If that effort had succeeded the depositor would have lost his money. It is a constant grief to clergymen and Christian workers that converts often act so after their conversion. Regarding the transaction as completed, they go their way, hoping to receive salvation at the end of life and drawing no supplies of grace to keep them in their daily work (II Peter 1 : 5–10).

The Reception of Belles in the Cloister is Described in a dispatch from Baltimore, Md. It states that three young ladies have taken the veil, and have been received into a convent in that city, who last year were leaders in the circle of fashion and pleasure. They were each remarkable for their exceeding loveliness of face and form, and had many admirers. One of them, who last Friday looked out from behind the bars of the convent in her hideous headgear and sack-like garments, is a grandniece of the ladies who were known in their day as the "Three American Graces." Her wealth, her beauty, her high pedigree, and her social graces made her the most sought-after girl in Baltimore. Suddenly she announced, a short time ago, her intention to give up the world. Everybody who knew her was astounded. Her friends expostulated; several young men who were devoted to her pleaded, and the world coldly criticised, but the young girl could not be moved from her purpose. She went through the probationary period required by the convent rules, and now takes her place behind the walls, from which she is never to issue except, perhaps, to be transferred to another convent. The melancholy view of the case is not that taken by the writer of the despatch, who seems to mourn that the belles are lost to the world, but the delusion into which they have fallen. The wretched mummery which is now to occupy their lives will prove as unsatisfying as did worldly pleasures. A terrible punishment awaits the false teachers who misdirect souls desirous of giving up pleasure and seeking after God (1 Tim. 4 : 1–3).

"WHERE ARE THE NINE?"

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God, and fell down on his face at His feet, giving Him thanks: and he was a Samaritan. And Jesus answering said, Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine? There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger. And He said unto him, Arise, go thy way: thy faith hath made thee whole."—LUKE 17: 15-19.

The Characteristics of Thankfulness—Marked by Individuality—By Promptitude—By Spirituality—By Intensity—III. Its Blessedness—The Nine Missing the Blessing—Christ Accepting Praise.

YOU have often heard the leprosy described: it was a very horrible disease, I should think the worst that flesh is heir to. We ought to be much more grateful than we are that this fell disease is scarcely known in our favored country. You have also heard what an instructive symbol it is in human flesh of what sin is in the human soul, how it pollutes, how it destroys. I need not go into that sad subject. But here was a sight for the Saviour—ten men that were lepers! A mass of sorrow indeed! What sights our Lord still sees every day in

THIS SIN-DEFILED WORLD!

Not ten men that are sinners, nor even ten millions merely, are to be found all the world over, but on this earth there are a thousand millions of men diseased in soul. It is a miracle of condescension that the Son of God should set foot in such a lazar-house as this.

Yet observe the triumphant grace of our Lord Jesus to the ten men that were lepers. It would make a man's fortune, it would crown a man with lifelong fame, to heal one leper; but our Lord

HEALED TEN LEPERS AT ONCE.

So full a fountain of grace is He, so freely doth He dispense His favor, that the ten are bidden to go and show themselves to the priests because they are healed, and on the way to the priests they find it is so. None of us can imagine the joy they felt when they perceived that they were healed. Oh, it must have been a sort of new birth to them to find their flesh made fresh as that of a little child! It would not have been wonderful if the whole ten had hurried back, and fallen at Jesus' feet, and lifted up their voices in a tenfold psalm. The sad thing about it is that nine of them, though they were healed, went on their way to the priests in the coolest possible manner; we never hear of their return; they drop out of the story altogether. They have obtained a blessing, they go their way, and there is an end of them.

ONLY ONE GRATEFUL.

Only one of them, a Samaritan, returned to express his thanks. Misery has strange bedfellows; and so the nine lepers of the seed of Israel consorted with an outcast Samaritan; and he, strange to tell it, was the only one who, seized by a sudden impulse of gratitude, made his way to his Benefactor, fell down at His feet, and began to glorify God.

If you search the world around, among all choice spices you shall scarcely meet with the frankincense of gratitude. It ought to be as common as the dew-drops that hang upon the hedges in the morning; but, alas, the world is dry of thankfulness to God! Gratitude to Christ was scarce enough in His own day. I had almost said it was ten to one that nobody would praise Him; but I must correct myself a little; it was nine to one. One day in seven is for the Lord's worship; but not one man in ten is devoted to His praise.

Our subject is thankfulness to the Lord Jesus Christ.

I. I begin with the point that I have already touched upon—namely,

THE SINGULARITY OF THANKFULNESS.

Here note: there are more who receive benefits than ever give praise for them. Nine persons healed, one person glorifying God; nine persons healed of leprosy, mark you, and only one person kneeling down at Jesus' feet, and thanking Him for it! If for this surpassing benefit, which might have made the dumb to sing, men only thank the Lord in the proportion of one to nine, what shall I say of what we call God's common mercies—only common because He is so liberal with them, for each of them is inestimably valuable? Life, health, eyesight, hearing, domestic love, the continuance of friends—I cannot attempt a catalogue of benefits that we receive every day; and yet is there one man in nine that praises God for these? A cold "Thank God!" is all that is given. Others of us do praise Him for these benefits, but what poor praises! Dr. Watts's hymn is sadly true,

> "Hosannas languish on our tongues,
> And our devotion dies."

But there is something more remarkable than this: the number of those who pray is greater than the number of those who praise. For these ten men that were lepers all prayed. Poor and feeble as their voices had become through disease, yet they lifted them up in prayer, and united in crying, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us!" They all joined in the Litany, "Lord, have mercy upon us! Christ, have mercy upon us!" But when they came to the Te Deum, magnifying and praising God, only one of them took up the note. One would have thought that all who prayed would praise, but it is not so. Cases have been where a whole ship's crew in time of storm has prayed, and yet none of that crew have sung the praise of God when the storm has become a calm. Multitudes of our fellow-citizens pray when they are sick, and near to dying; but when they grow better, their praises grow sick unto death. The angel of mercy, listening at their door, has heard no canticle of love, no song of thankfulness. Alas, it is too sadly true that

MORE PRAY THAN PRAISE!

I put it in another shape to you who are God's people—most of us pray more than we praise. You pray little enough, I fear; but praise, where is that? At our family altars we always pray, but seldom praise. In our closets we constantly pray, but do we frequently praise? Praise ought to follow naturally upon the heels of prayer, even when it does not, by divine grace, go before it. If you are afflicted, if you lose money, if you fall into poverty, if your child is ill, if chastisement visits you in any form, you begin to pray, and I do not blame you for it; but should it be all praying and no praising? Should our life have so much salt, and so little sweet in it?

On the same head, let me remark that more obey ritual than ever praise Christ. When Jesus said, "Go shew yourselves to the priests," off they went, all ten of them; not one stopped behind. Yet to behold a personal Saviour, and to praise His name. So to-day—you will go to church, you will go to chapel, you will read a book, you will perform an outward religious action; but oh, how little praising God, how little lying at His feet, and feeling that we could sing our souls away for gratitude to Him who hath done such great things for us! External religious exercises are easy enough, and common enough; but the internal matter, the drawing out of the heart in thankful love, how scarce a thing it is! Nine obey ritual where only one praises the Lord.

Once more, to come yet closer home, there are more that believe than there are that praise; for these ten men did believe, but only one praised the Lord Jesus. Their faith was about the leprosy; and according to their faith, so it was unto them. This faith, though it only concerned their leprosy, was yet a very wonderful faith. It was remarkable that they should believe the Lord Jesus though He did not even say, "Be healed," nor speak a word to them to that effect, but simply said, "Go shew yourselves to the priests." With parched skins, and death burning its way into their hearts, they went bravely off in confidence that Jesus must mean to bless them. It was admirable faith; and yet none of the nine who thus believed ever came back to praise Christ for the mercy received. I am afraid that there is much of faith, better faith than theirs, which concerns spiritual things, which has yet to flower into practical gratitude.

Faith was only real in these lepers so far as their leprosy was concerned; they did not believe in our Lord's divinity, or believe for eternal life. So also among ourselves there are men who get benefits from Christ, who even hope that they are saved, but they do not praise Him. Their lives are spent in to see whether their leprosy is gone. Their religious life reveals itself in a constant searching of themselves to see if they are really healed. This is a poor way of spending one's energies. This man knew that he was healed, he had full assurance upon that point; and the next impulse of his spirit was to hie him back to where He stood who had been his glorious Physician, to fall at His feet, and praise Him with a loud voice, glorifying God Oh, that all my timorous, doubting hearers may do the same!

II. I have a great deal to say, and little time to say it in; therefore, briefly let us note the characteristics of true thankfulness. This man's simple act may show the character of praise. It does not take the same shape in everybody. Love to Christ, like living flowers, wears many forms; only artificial flowers are all alike. Living praise is marked by individuality. This man was one of ten when he was a leper; he was all alone when he returned to praise God. You can sin in company, you can go to hell in company; but when you obtain salvation, you will come to Jesus all alone; and when you are saved, though you will delight to praise God with others if they will join with you, yet if they will not do so, you will delight to sing

A SOLO OF GRATITUDE.

This man quits the company of the other nine, and comes to Jesus. If Christ has saved you, and your heart is right, you will say, "I must praise Him; I must love Him." You will not be kept back by the chilly state of nine out of ten of your old companions, nor by the worldliness of your family, nor by the coldness of the Church. Your personal love to Jesus will make you speak even if heaven, and earth, and sea are all wrapped in silence.

The next characteristic of this man's thankfulness was promptness. He was back to Christ almost immediately; for I cannot suppose the Saviour lingered at the village-gate for hours that day. He was too busy to be long on one spot; the Master went about doing good. The man was back soon; and when you are saved, the quicker you can express your gratitude the better. Second thoughts are best, they say; but this is not the case when the heart is full of love to Christ. Carry out your first thoughts; do not stop for the second, unless indeed your heart is so on flame with heavenly devotion that second ones consume the first. Go at once, and praise the Saviour. What grand designs some of you have formed of future service for God! What small results have followed! Ah, it is better to lay one brick to-day than to propose to build a palace next year! Magnify your Lord in the present for present salvation. Why should His mercies lie in quarantine? Why should your praises be like aloes, which take a century to flower? Why should praise be kept waiting at the door even for a night?

The next quality of this man's praise was spirituality. We perceive this in the fact that to the priests. It was his duty to go to the priests; he had received a command to do so;

but there is a proportion in all things, and some duties are greater than others. He thought to himself: I was ordered to go to the priests; but I am healed, and this new circumstance affects the order of my duties; the first thing I ought to do is to go back, and bear witness to the people, glorifying God in the midst of them all, and falling down at Christ's feet. It is well to observe the holy law of proportion. Carnal minds take the ritualistic duty first; that which is external outweighs with them that which is spiritual. But love soon perceives that the substance is more precious than the shadow, and that to bow at the feet of the great High Priest must be a greater duty than to go before the lesser priests. So the healed leper

WENT FIRST TO JESUS.

In Him the spiritual law overrode the ceremonial. He felt that his main duty was in person to adore the divine person who had delivered him from his fell disease. Let us go first to Jesus.

True thankfulness also manifests itself in intensity. Intensity is perceptible in this case; he turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God. He could have praised, could he not, in a quieter way? Yes, but when you are just cured of leprosy, and your once feeble voice is restored to you, you cannot whisper out your praises. Brethren, you know it would be impossible to be coolly proper when you are newly saved! This man with a loud voice glorified God; and you, too, feel forced to cry—

"Fain would I sound it out so loud
That earth and heaven should hear."

Some of our converts are very wild at times, they grow extravagant. Do not blame them. Why not indulge them? It will not hurt you. We are all of us so very proper and orderly that we can afford to have an extravagant one among us now and then.

In true thankfulness, next, there is humility. This man fell down at Jesus' feet; he did not feel perfectly in his place until he was lying there. "I am nobody, Lord," he seemed to say, and therefore he fell on his face. But the place for his prostration was

"AT HIS FEET."

I would rather be nobody at Christ's feet than everybody anywhere else! There is no place so honorable as down at the feet of Jesus. Ah, to lie there always, and just love Him wholly, and let self die out! Oh, to have Christ standing over you as the one figure overshadowing your life henceforth and forever! True thankfulness lies low before the Lord.

One thing more about this man I want to notice as to his thankfulness, and that is, his silence as to censuring others. When the Saviour said, "Where are the nine?" I notice that this man did not reply. The Master said, "Where are the nine? There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger." But the adoring stranger did not stand up and say, "O Lord, they are all gone off to the priests; I am astonished at them that they did not return to praise Thee!" O brothers, we have enough to do to mind our own business, when we feel the grace of God in our own hearts! If I can only get through my service of praise, I shall have no mind to accuse any of you who are ungrateful. The Master says, "Where are the nine?" but the poor healed man at His feet has no word to say against those cruel nine, he is too much occupied with his personal adoration.

III. I have not half done, and yet you cannot possibly stay beyond the appointed hour of closing; therefore I must compress my third division as closely as I possibly can—let us consider the blessedness of thankfulness. This man was more blessed by far than the nine. They were healed, but they were

NOT BLESSED AS HE WAS.

There is a great blessedness in thankfulness. First, because it is right. Should not Christ be praised? This man did what he could; and there is always an ease of conscience, and a rest of spirit, when you feel that you are doing all you can in a right cause, even though you fall far short of your own desire. At this moment, my brethren, magnify the Lord.

Next, there is this blessing in thankfulness, that it is a manifestation of personal love. I love the doctrines of grace, I love the Church of God, I love the Sabbath, I love the ordinances; but I love Jesus most. My heart never rests until I can glorify God personally, and give thanks unto the Christ personally. The indulgence of personal love to Christ is one of the sweetest things out of heaven; and you cannot indulge that personal love so well as by personal thankfulness both of heart and mouth, and act and deed.

The next blessedness about praise is that it is

ACCEPTABLE TO CHRIST.

The Lord Jesus was evidently pleased; He was grieved to think the other nine should not come back, but He was charmed with this one man that he did return. The question, "Where are the nine?" bears within it a commendation of the one. Whatever pleases Christ should be carefully cultivated by us. If praise be pleasant to Him, let us continually magnify His name. Prayer is the straw of the wheat, but praise is the ear. Jesus loves to see the blade grow up, but He loves better to pluck the golden ears when the harvest of praise is ripe.

I have done when I have said three things. Let us learn from all this to put praise in a high place. Let us hold praise-meetings. Let us think it as great a sin to neglect praise as to restrain prayer. Next, let us pay our praise to Christ Himself. Whether we go to the priests or not, let us go to Him. Let us praise Him personally and vehemently. Personal praise to a personal Saviour must be

OUR LIFE'S OBJECT.

Lastly, if we work for Jesus, and we see converts, and they do not turn out as we expected, do not let us be cast down about it. If others do not praise our Lord, let us be sorrowful, but let us not be disappointed. The Saviour had to say, "Where are the nine?" Ten lepers were healed, but only one praised Him. We have many converts who do not join the Church; we have numbers of persons converted who do not come forward to baptism, or to the Lord's Supper. Numbers get a blessing, but do not feel love enough to own it. Those of us who are soul-winners are robbed of our wages by the cowardly spirits who hide their faith.

You that hold cottage-meetings, you that go round with tracts, you are doing more good than you will ever hear of. You do not know but even if you should only bless one out of ten, you will have cause to thank God. "Oh," says one, "I have had so little success; I have had only one soul saved!" That is more than you deserve. If I were to fish for a week, and only catch one fish, I should be sorry; but if that happened to be a sturgeon, a royal fish, I should feel that the quality made up for lack of quantity. When you win a soul it is a great prize. One soul brought to Christ—can you estimate its value? If one be saved, you should be grateful to your Lord, and persevere. Though you wish for more conversions yet, you will not despond so long as even a few are saved; and, above all, you will not be angry if some of them do not thank you personally, nor join in church-fellowship with you.

Ingratitude is common toward soul-winners. How often a minister has brought sinners to Christ, and fed the flock in his early days! but when the old man grows feeble they want to get rid of him, and try a new broom which will sweet cleaner. "Poor old gentleman, he is quite out of date!" they say, and so they get rid of him, as gypsies turn an old horse out on the common to feed or starve, they care not which. If anybody expects gratitude I would remind them of the benediction, "Blessed are they that expect nothing, for they will not be disappointed." Even our Master did not get praise from the nine; therefore do not wonder if you bless others, and others do not bless you. Oh, that some poor soul would come to Christ to-night, some leper to be healed of sin-sickness! If he does find healing, let him come out, and with a loud voice magnify the Lord who has dealt so graciously with him.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE FIRST PRINTING PRESS IN NEW ENGLAND.*

HARVARD COLLEGE had the first printing-press in North America. Upon the college records we read this item: "Mr. Joss Glover gave to the college a font of printing-letters, and some gentlemen of Amsterdam gave toward furnishing a printing-press." Printing had been done for the priests in Mexico a century before, but this Cambridge press was the first one set up in the English colonies.

The Rev. Josse Glover was a dissenting, or Puritan, minister in England, who seems to have set his mind on being the founder of printing in New England, for he came himself with the types and press. Efforts to trace this press have proved unavailing. After doing duty for nearly a century, it was probably broken up. The Rev. Josse, having engaged a printer named Stephen Daye, sailed with his family in 1638 for Boston. Most unfortunately, Mr. Glover died on the voyage, but the rest of the company, with the press, arrived at Cambridge in the autumn. There the "printery," as some called it, was set up, in President Dunster's house. By and by Mr. Dunster married the widow Glover, "so taking her, as well as the press, into his own house."

Daye's want of skill cost him his place of printer, to which his son Matthew succeeded, and after him (1649) Samuel Green, a better printer than either, took charge.

The "Freeman's Oath," printed by S. Daye, in 1639, on one side of a small sheet of paper, was the first thing printed with types in what are the United States. The second and third issues were almanacs for the years 1639 and 1640. The next was a much more important work.

This was the first book printed. It was entitled "The Whole Booke of Psalmes Faithfully Translated into English Meter," and is dated 1640. For brevity's sake it is usually called the Bay Psalm Book, and is so very uncommon that a copy is worth many times its weight in gold.

Before this time the Pilgrim and Puritan churches used Sternhold and Hopkins's version of the Psalms, but the want of a better one seems to have been so strongly felt that two ministers, Thomas Welde and John Eliot, were appointed to make it. One specimen of their poetic style will give an idea of the church-singing of that time, when each line was separately read by a deacon before it was sung by the congregation.

"The Lord to mee a shepheard is,
Want therefore shall not I.
Hee in the folds of tender-grasse
Doth cause mee downe to lie.
To waters calme mee gently leads Restore my soule doth Hee:
Hee doth in paths of righteousness
For His name's sake lead mee."

The celebrated translation of the Bible into the Indian tongue was also printed on the Cambridge press, but that work belongs to a later day than the one now being considered.

The Late Mrs. A. T. Stewart.

A Scotchman's Long Tramp. (See page 21.)

So we see that the colonists were for some time without other means of duplicating public documents than that of copying them by hand; and this work was done by persons called scriveners. These were writers, or scribes; they were the "copyists" of that day, when ability to write a good hand was so rare an accomplishment that "writers" were generally men above the common rank of society. Instead of leaving a copy at every householder's door, one was usually nailed to the door of the meeting-house, the doing of which gave it a lawful publication.

Widow of the Dry-Goods Millionaire.

ALTHOUGH Mrs. Stewart had attained the age of eighty-three years, she was still a remarkably active woman up to the time of her death on October 25th, 1886. Her life during the ten years which have elapsed since her husband's death has been somewhat secluded, but her intimate friends, who were admitted to her home, say that she showed but few signs of her extreme age, and would go up and down long flights of stairs without difficulty. Three days before her death she was out driving, and was confined to her bed but little over twenty-four hours.

She was the daughter of Mr. James Clinch, a well-to-do merchant of New York. She was but twenty years old when, in 1823, she gave her hand in marriage to Mr. Stewart, then a small shopkeeper struggling to establish the business which afterward grew to such gigantic proportions. Her friends at that time considered that she had married beneath her station. She cheerfully bore the hardships and privations of her early married life, keeping house for her husband, at first over his store and afterward in a small house in Bleecker Street. Mr. Stewart had implicit confidence in her judgment, and took no important step without first conferring with her. Mr. Libby, an intimate friend of the family, who was accustomed to go in and out of the Stewart household at all times, says that he never saw a more affectionate couple, and in all the years that he knew them he never saw a shadow of disagreement between them nor heard a harsh word uttered by either.

When Mr. Stewart died in 1876, there being no children living—two had died in infancy—Mrs. Stewart inherited the bulk of his fortune, amounting to about thirty million dollars. She disposed of the business to Judge Hilton at a nominal price, and from that time on lived a retired life. She took but little active interest in charitable work, though on occasion would give considerable sums to public institutions. Her gift of ten thousand dollars to the Hahnemann Hospital was one of these. The most notable expenditure, however, was in completing the Garden City cathedral commenced by her husband. This cost over a million dollars. It was presented by Mrs. Stewart to the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was consecrated in June, 1885.

Mrs. Stewart's property at the time of her death is estimated at twenty million dollars. Her will disposing of it is an intricate document, with several codicils. The bulk of the property would appear to be distributed among relatives, with a large sum to Judge Hilton. This latter is understood to be in trust, and intended for the completion of the Garden City enterprise, to which Mrs. Stewart proposed to add an institution as a seminary of learning for women, which Mr. Hilton may erect, furnish, and endow if, in his discretion, he deems it advisable. Thus the enormous fortune accumulated by the millionaire merchant is divided up. Many hopes are disappointed and many predictions falsified by the will. No such huge legacies to religious and philanthropic enterprises have been made as the public was led to expect. When the childless millionaire died ten years ago and surprise was manifested at the absence of such legacies from his will, it was intimated that Mrs. Stewart's will would supply the omission, but it is not so. She exercised her undoubted right in disposing of her property as she thought fit, and she made her choice. The name and memory of A. T. Stewart have not been redeemed, and while they might have lived on identified with some beneficent work such as that which renders Peter Cooper's name immortal, they pass into unblessed oblivion.

THE IMPLACABLE PATIENT.

IN a large city hospital there was a commotion one night, for calls had come in for ambulances to be sent to the scene of an accident. Preparations were quickly made, and when the sufferers were brought in everything was ready for their reception. Among them was a man of about sixty years of age, whose dress and appearance indicated that he was well-to-do, if not rich. He was unconscious when he was brought in, but he recovered consciousness during the surgeon's examination, and said he was prepared to pay for special attention. He had no friends in the city, he said, having only just arrived from England on business, and would prefer to remain in the hospital to going to his hotel. His left arm was broken, and there were internal injuries the extent of which could not then be ascertained. He was carried into the best ward, and a skilful trained nurse was placed in charge of his case.

On the following day the patient had no thought of the hotel as an alternative. He knew that he was in a critical condition, and that there was but little probability of his recovery. The surgeon did not conceal the fact when he made his round of visits, and advised him if he had any matters of business that he wished to arrange before his death to lose no time in attending to them.

After the surgeon was gone, the man lay still for nearly an hour, with his eyes closed. He was not asleep; the nurse could easily see that, by the working of his face and his sensitiveness to the slightest noise. He was evidently thinking intently, and that of an unpleasant subject. The lines across his forehead grew deeper and his mouth was closed with a firmness that spoke of inflexible determination. The nurse watched him thoughtfully, wondering what kind of mental struggle was going on behind that troubled brow.

Presently he opened his eyes and looked around. The nurse, thinking he wanted something, was instantly at his side.

"Can I do anything for you?" she asked. "Is there anything you want?"

"No, my girl," was the reply—"nothing. I want much, but nothing that you can give me. It is very hard to die here all alone among strangers; but it might have been worse. You are all very good to me."

"If you would like to write to your friends in England, I will do it for you. I should be glad to serve you, and in a time of sickness sometimes the best way to recovery is to get rid of worry and anxiety. I will write for you if you like."

"You are very good," said the sick man, "but I will not trouble you. I made my will before leaving home, and when I am dead you will have nothing to do but to notify my executor. His address is in my pocket-book. I should have liked—but there, never mind; it would be of no use."

"Do not hesitate to ask if you would like anything done," said the nurse, who knew by experience how injurious is mental trouble in cases of bodily injury.

"No, no," said the patient, "it is nothing; that is, nothing that you could do." He closed his eyes, and again the brows were knitted.

The nurse still stood there looking pityingly upon him, sure that he was in mental distress, and sincerely desiring to relieve him. She had seen many deaths, and had learned the lesson death-beds are adapted to teach, of the peace and rest which come only from faith in Christ. "Dear Lord," she prayed now, "if this burdened soul needs help and guidance, grant me the power to win its confidence and point it to Thee."

Suddenly the sufferer looked at her. "I will tell you my position," he said. "It will ease my mind to speak of it. I came to this place three days ago to see my daughter. She lives in this city. She is my only child, and I idolized her. A year ago she left her home, where she had everything that she could wish for, to marry a man whom I hate. She would do it in spite of my warnings, and I disinherited her. She and that man fell into poverty and emigrated to America. I have heard that they are almost starving, and I came here to offer to forgive her and receive her back if she would leave her husband and return. I have not seen her, but I caused a lawyer to visit her and give her my offer. Though she has scarcely bread to eat, she rejected it."

"Is her husband a bad man?"

"Oh, no, I suppose not; but his father did me a deadly wrong, and I swore I would never forgive him. He is dead now, but his son lives, and he has taken my daughter from me. I required her to break with him when his father injured me, and she would not. She has cast in her lot with my enemies and has deserted me. My curse be on her."

"Oh, do not curse her, sir! You are near death; curses are awful on the lips of the dying."

"They are just. The daughter who deserts her father deserves them. I will never forgive her; but it's very sad to die like this. I should like to have seen her just once."

"It is well for us that God forgives, is it not? If He said, as you do, 'I will never forgive,' it would be awful."

The nurse turned away as she said this, leaving the sick man to think of it and make the application. A short time afterward she returned and administered his medicine. He received it in silence, but he was evidently digesting the thought she had dropped. He had a troubled, restless night, suffering mentally and physically. He said nothing more about his daughter until the rising sun shed its light in the ward. Then, as the nurse bent over him, he said, "You think I ought to forgive, do you not? That was what you meant by your remark yesterday?"

"It is not for me to say that, but I think it would may you happier; and if you hope for forgiveness from God, you are bound to forgive. Jesus said so."

"Yes; I thought that was what you meant. I have been thinking of it all night. It is very hard, though."

The Implacable Patient.

"Duty often is hard, but it becomes easy when we try to do it."

"Well, I will try. You offered to write a letter for me yesterday; I will accept your kindness now. Write to my daughter; you will find her address in my pocket-book. Tell her I am dying, and ask her to come to me. Do not say anything about pardon. I cannot do it now."

The nurse lost no time in getting writing materials and producing the letter. As she finished it and was passing through the ward to send it by a messenger, she looked at the patient and, to her surprise, saw that he had fallen into a gentle sleep. Already the better state of mind was having its effect. She thanked God for that.

That night the daughter was at her father's bedside, thin and pale, but with a joyful look on her face. The nurse left them together. Such an interview should have no witnesses. At its close the daughter went away, but an hour later she returned, bringing her husband with her. The struggle was over; reconciliation was complete. The effect on the patient was marvellous. The sleep that came while the letter was being written was the precursor of other favorable symptoms, and the nurse, after a few weeks, saw the old man able to leave the hospital leaning lovingly on the arm of the man he had forgiven.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

Robert's Search Commenced.

THE sad tidings concerning Alfred Atheling soon reached the quiet valley of Aspendale. Indeed, the police authorities did not fail to search the neighborhood with a view to find the trail of the missing youths. The baronet's tall form began to stoop beneath the burden of trouble He had little to say, but his face was eloquent of grief. The news was diligently kept from the ears of Ethel, lying in her quiet chamber, but the whole village of Thorpe Aspen knew of it, and mourned.

No man liveth unto himself. Though every man bears his own burden and must give an account of himself to God, his sins bring a burden upon those who love him. The innocent suffer with the guilty. The baronet with all his wealth was bowed down with sorrow as he thought of the misdeeds of his son, and Widow Atheling and her sons and daughter were heart-broken when they learned that Alfred's evil courses had culminated into crime. It is a weary, sorrow-laden world, and sin is its heaviest burden.

By the bright log-fire which blazed and crackled in the big, open, old-fashioned hearthstone of Aspen Garth, sat Mrs. Atheling alone with God and her latest sorrow. It is a right noble and beautiful face on which the flame of the beechwood faggots is casting a mellow light. The frosts of sixty winters have whitened the hair, which in her younger days had hung in tresses of gold; but they have failed to dim the genial brightness of her eyes, which now as then are of the fairest Saxon blue.

The keen-edged graving tools of sorrow have chased expressive lines upon her cheek and brow; but the calm, attractive dignity and sympathy, blended in form and feature, and still more notable in her general bearing, have gained, not lost, by the threefold influence of piety, experience, and time. As she sits in the spacious ingle-nook with the snow-white cap of widowhood above her brow, she is a living and attractive illustration of Time's adorning skill when the religion of Jesus Christ has made the material ready to its hand. And yet, just now, her heart is heavy, her cheeks are wet with tears, and like aged David, when a kindred grief oppressed him, she murmurs again and again, as well as she can for the sobs that hinder, "Oh, Alfred, my son, my son!"

As the sorrowing mother was thus communing with her trouble, a stalwart yeoman, clad in farmer's garb, entered the room. His stout nether limbs were encased in leather leggings, and his boots were soaked with the moisture which the evening mist had deposited on the dank autumnal grass. Placing his gun, which he had brought in with him, upon a rack fastened for that purpose to one of the old oak joists overhead, he greeted Mrs. Atheling thus: "Well, mother mine, a cosey hearthstone isn't an unpleasant vision; the night is both damp and chilly out of doors. I've brought you neither hare nor pheasant, worse luck, but my welcome won't be the less warm for that."

The while he was speaking the new-comer had taken the two hands of the widow in his own and imprinted a kiss on either cheek. Then in the tone of one who was resolved on bidding dull care begone, and on hastening its exit too, he continued, "What, tears again, dear mother! And after all your promises of reformation, too! What, then, have you fairly come to the conclusion that your God and my father's God has resigned His government, and given over the reins of government to a power less loving, less forgiving, less compassionate than He?"

"Oh, no, no, Robert! Don't talk like that, dear. That would be to give up all hope indeed. What should I do? What could I do, if I could not trust in Him, my refuge in every time of trouble?"

"Very well, then, sweet mother. Can my brother Alfred go beyond His reach, or out of His ken? Can he elude the grasp of His strong hand? I'm going to turn the tables on you, and quote your own lessons to your children for your own instruction. You've been in the habit of telling us to avoid the sin of ancient Israel, and not to limit the Holy One of Israel. Who's doing the limiting now, I wonder? You remember my father's prophecy, his last words as he lay on his death-bed, and my promise to him. I dare not limit the God who inspired him, and both my promise and his prophecy have got to be fulfilled. Cheer up, mother, cheer up!"

"You are right, Robert, as you usually are," said his mother; "but this lapse of your poor misguided brother seems to shut out all hope. It is the worst as well as the last. His descent, I fear, will now be more rapid, until recovery becomes impossible."

"Nay, nay, mother. Impossible is a word we must never use when the power and grace of God come into question. His mother and his brother, as well as others who love him, have power where it is most required; and the prayers of his father, now gone to his reward, are registered on high."

Under such wise and tender treatment the mournful mother partially dried her eyes, and nursed the hope of the wanderer's recovery, and his return to the hearthstone from which he had wandered so fast and so far. Then came Clara and Edgar, both of them well pleased to note that once again their mother's grief was lifted, and that Hope, that fair angel sent by God to sustain His children in their extremity of need, had resumed its place in her sorely troubled heart.

"Well done, Robert," said Clara. "I see you've been applying your old prescription; and once again the patient rallies beneath your skilful treatment." So saying, she placed her arms around her brother's neck and kissed him with a fervor in which love and gratitude were combined.

"Yes, Clara," said he, with a gratified look. "I hope you won't fail to bring the same prescription to bear, should there be any serious recurrence after I am gone. I've been planning matters to-day with Edgar. He will take my place upon the farm. He is thoroughly well able to manage it, and there is no great pressure of responsibility at this season of the year Things will go on pretty much of themselves, and under his guiding hand will go right. I can be spared now better than after, and I mean to take a trip to London. If brother Alfred can be found, I'll find him. If he can be induced to come back, I'll bring him. The time has come for me to fulfil my promise, the promise that soothed my father's dying pillow."

"Go, my son," said the widow, laying her hand lovingly on his shoulder, and trying her best to catch and hold fast the hope kindled by his words and tone. "May God bring you back in peace, and if my poor wandering lad comes too, I will say, like Simeon, 'Now, Lord, lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation.'"

"Don't say 'if,' mother," said Edgar, stoutly. "Robert doesn't go on his mission at his own charges, and we who stay at home will not hinder him, even by a doubt."

By and by the conversation turned on the necessary preparations for Robert's speedy departure, and, as the evening hours passed by, the family at Aspen Garth seemed one and all to be able to regard the impending change with cheerfulness, though, ever and anon, the old cloud would gather for a little on the mother's placid brow. Just as the tall, old-fashioned clock, which stood upright in the corner of the room, was striking, and the flicker of the beech logs showed the hour hand on the figure nine, a rap was heard at the door, and one of the servants announced that Simon Holmes had called, and that, if convenient, he would like to see Mrs. Atheling.

"Convenient?" said the widow, brightening at the mention of his name, to be sure it is. Tell him to come in." Then turning to her children, she continued, "It would be hard to find a time that wasn't convenient to receive such a welcome guest."

"Good-evenin', ma'am," said Simon, as he entered the room with a courteous bow, "I hev' to apologize for comin' at an awk'ard hoor. But I didn't seem as though I could sleep i' comfort, or wi' ony degree o' soondness, unless I'd gi'en yo' a neighborly call."

"Nay, nay, Simon," said Robert Atheling, stepping forward to hand him a chair. "Mother's glad and fain to see you, and for that matter, so are we all."

"Draw your chair to the fire, Simon," said the widow. "The night is rather chill, I think, and you and I are not so young as we once were."

"Ay, marry, you're right anuff," replied Simon. "But then, thenk God, there's another way o' puttin' it—an' a better way, because i' your case an' mahne it's true. Old age is creepin' off. The inward man's bein' renewed day by day, an' the ootward man's crackin' and loosnin' like a husk; an' when it shells off some o' these days, old age'll be gone, and then it'll nivver, nivver come back ony mair. Then we > 'Shall flourish in endurin' bloom,

> Safe from diseases an' decline.'

That's the way to look at old age from a Christian's standpoint. There's both reason an' religion in it for iverybody that beleeaves in Him that says, 'He that liveth an' beleeaveth in Me shall nivver die.'"

The cheering words fell like a benediction from heaven upon the heart of the disconsolate widow, and her reply to Simon was, "You are right; that was seen clearly enough when my dear husband exchanged mortality for life. It seemed to us who watched him pass from earth to heaven, that the tokens of the weight of years died away before he passed, and that immortal youth was on him as he went away."

"I'm going to leave Aspendale for awhile," said Robert Atheling, taking advantage of the pause that followed. "I should like Simon to join us at the family altar and ask God's blessing on my errand. You know what it is, Simon?"

"Ay, laddie, I knoa," said the carpenter, with strong feeling, and taking Robert's hand in his own rugged palm. "Mr. Edgar gav' me a notion that yo' were on the point o' startin'. I ha' no fear o' yo', knowin' what I knoa, both o' your promise an' the way yo'll set aboot it. It was mainly that that browt me here so late. You'll be led and guided, and we'll just ask God to give you success. It's all in His hands, and He's watching over the wanderer, too. He can bring you together and bring you both home in peace. We'll plead the promise and get the blessing."

There was no wonder that, as the old carpenter conducted family worship, the whole household felt that the place was holy ground. There was no wonder that Simon Holmes retired to his cottage, as he had retired many a time before in the course of his beneficent life, followed by the thanks and blessings of those from whose pathway he had plucked the thorns and had planted sweet flowers in their stead. Hie thee home, old man, and know, as thou layest thy head upon the pillow, that the All-observant Master hath said of thee, "Well done!"

The next morning, after taking an affectionate farewell of his household, Robert took the crutch-handled stick which had been his father's prop in his declining years—his portmanteau had been sent on before him—and whistling to keep his courage up, he passed through the gates of Aspen Garth. Then he turned his face to the great city, amid whose teeming multitudes he hoped to light upon the beloved lost sheep who had wandered so far astray from virtue, home, and God.

He might have driven to the Chilworth station in his own well-appointed dog-cart drawn by his favorite black mare; but the morning was fine and frosty and the roads good, so he preferred to walk. As he passed along the village street he was joined by Simon Holmes. The carpenter explained that he had business down the valley, and that if Robert had no objection he would walk along with him. I fancy, however, that the old man had improvised the "business" that he might transact a little business of another and a higher kind.

"Good-mornin', Mr. Robert," said Simon. "Then yo're off. I've gotten a little matter o' business to see to down at Farmer Green's. Shall I bother yo' if I go along wi' yo'?"

"Scarcely that, old friend," said Robert Atheling. "I was glad to get away alone from my own folks. It would only have made the parting harder and longer if any of them had come with me. But with you it's different. You will not do other than give me a helping hand and a word of cheer."

"Nay, marry," said Simon. "I've been prayin' to God to speed yo' iver since I woke, an' it's scarcely likely that I should go agin my own petitions. Not that I've ony manner o' doot aboot the upshot. Them that's gotten a errand sitch as yours, an' sitch a startin'-point as yours, can't varry weel fail o' their purpose. When the good providence o' God begins a thing, He's pratty sartain to be in at the finish. Man's purposes are often brokken off, but His hev a way o' gettin' theirselves roonded off intiv a completeness that leeaves nowt to be desired. If iver a man in this wide world had a certificate for action an' a passport for travel that's not to be easily interfered with, it's yo'."

"Well, yes, Simon," responded Robert, "it does seem as though duty is pretty clearly marked out for me in this instance; and I will not doubt that, though the path of duty may be hard to travel, it will lead to the right end at last."

"Ay, that it will, yo' may depend on't; an' Him that bids yo' walk on it'll see that your wallet isn't short o' refreshment, an' He'll put yo' a few wayside inns for rest an' comfort as yo' go. Yo' knoa who it is that says, 'I wi' guide thee with mine eye.' He nivver mak's a mistak'; an' if His eye leads on to labor, it mak's all pleasant because it's breet wi' the leet of His love."

"I know it, Simon," replied Robert, straightway walking with a bolder step. "I can honestly say, 'I go in the strength of the Lord God.'"

"That's the wind that wafts to harbor, Mr. Robert. I was at Hull t'other day, standin' on t' South End pier. I saw a ship come sailin' up the Hummer, sailin' fair i' t' sunleet wi' all her sails bellied out i' t' breeze, an' she just glided into harbor an' dropped her anchor, an' the crew gav' a great shoot as if they were sayin', 'We've weathered the storm an' we're seeafe i' port!' That's how it will be wi' yo' an' your mission. The prayers of a honored fayther an' a godly mother, let alone your oan, 'll fill your sails, and all Thorpe Aspen 'll shoot a welcome when you drop anchor at Aspen Garth with Alfred in tow. Besides, yo' won't forget that there's them left behind that'll nivver forget yo' at the throne of grace, nivver! Yo' won't forget that, will yo', Mr. Robert?"

"No fear of that, dear friend," said the young man, with a full heart. "And nobody can value such help more than I. Thank you for the courage with which your words have inspired me. I shall not forget them, I assure you."

The carpenter had now reached the homestead of Farmer Green whither his "business" had led him.

"Well, good-by, Mr. Robert, an' God bless yo'," said he, "an' if your courage should iver seeam inclined to droop a bit, an' it may, for yo' aren't meeade o' iron, an' t' rooad may be a goodish bit rough, remember that 'thy shoes shall be iron an' brass, an' as thy day is thy strength shall be.'"

The young man grasped the carpenter's hand in silence, and, holding it a minute, permitted the tearful sparkle in his own eyes to intimate his affectionate farewell.

Arrived at the station, Robert found that he was only just in time to catch the train, which moved slowly into the station just as he was taking his ticket. There was not a moment to lose; he grasped his portmanteau, which was handed to him by the porter, who knew him well, and ran through the office, jumped aboard the train, and was soon speeding on his way to London.

He had not travelled a mile before a slight motion near his heels startled him. Looking under the seat for an explanation, he saw to his surprise that he had a companion whom he had believed to be safe at home. It was his faithful, intelligent collie dog, Joss. When leaving home Joss had intimated in his own way a desire to accompany his master, but Robert shook his stick at him, and Joss sneaked away to the barn. But the dog must have followed him to the station, keeping carefully out of sight all the way, for here he was curled comfortably under the seat, apparently congratulating himself on having outwitted his master. Nothing could be done now, and, much to his annoyance, Robert had to take him with him to London.

At the London terminus Robert inquired for a cheap boarding-house, and finding one near King's Cross station, put up for the night, intending to commence his search next morning by a visit to Hudson Harvey, Esq., his brother's late employer.

NOAH'S FAITH.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 23, Gen. 6 : 9-22. Golden Text, 7 : 5.

The Third Generation—Divided into Two Races—The Spiritual and Material—The Wicked Intermarriages—God's Repeated Warnings—His Patience—The One Solitary Witness—Walking with God—What it Implies—Noah Warned—The Faith of the Man—His Unhesitating Obedience—Noah Shut In—The World Shut Out—The New Life—Sin Reappearing—The Only Perfect Fulfilment of the Law.

AFTER the death of Abel two generations of men inhabited the world—the posterity of Cain, who developed the resources of the earth, and the posterity of Seth, who conserved the knowledge of God. At the birth of Seth Eve said: "God hath appointed me another seed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew." When a son was born to Seth, "then a beginning was made of preaching in the name of Jehovah" (Gen. 4 : 26, Young's trans.). Thus came a division—"the sons of God" and the sons of men. In the one line, we hear of agriculturists, musicians, mechanics, and engineers; in the other, we hear of men who "walked ["habitually," Young's trans.] with God." The tempter, whose constant aim is to frustrate God, soon found means to introduce confusion. Both in the natural and in the spiritual world God has and He repeatedly warns His people against mingling with the ungodly. He says, "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers" (II Cor. 6 : 14). By the mouth of Jehu He rebuked His servant Jehoshaphat for joining affinity with Ahab, saying, "Shouldest thou help the ungodly, and love them which hate the Lord?" (II Chron. 19 : 2.) And of the Ephesian converts it was said, "Ye were sometime darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord" (Eph. 5 : 8). There is no uncertain sound about the utterances of God. When the sons of God in their wilfulness chose unconverted wives of the daughters of men, He said, "My Spirit shall not strive with man forever; in their going astray they are flesh" (R. V.). Yes, truly, it was the flesh, the self in fallen man which asserted itself. They chose for themselves, chose independently of God. The carnal mind was "enmity against God" and enmity against their own best interests. Had man written the history of these times, much would, no doubt, have been said about progress and advance; "there were giants [Young says "fallen ones"] in the earth in those days." Man's great ones do not pass current with God; it is man's little ones who are great with Him. Thus, although there were "mighty men which were of old, men of renown," yet God took no pleasure in them. Theirs was the greatness of the flesh, the greatness which could do without God; and in His eyes, "all flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof as the flower of the field" (Isa. 40 : 6).

His faithful portraiture of man at this time was far from flattering. Seeing, as He did, right into the very secrets of the heart, "God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. And it repented God that He had made man on the earth, and it grieved Him at His heart." God repenting! God grieved! How can the creature ever for an instant understand this! And yet He forbore to execute vengeance during one hundred and twenty years! Oh, the depth of the mercy of God! Justice demanded, the welfare of future generations demanded, that the guilty earth, now corrupt before God and full of violence, should be cleansed from its defilement; but lest one of His rebellious creatures should be cut off unawares God provided a day of salvation which should precede the day of vengeance, and He sent to them a message and a messenger. "The longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah" (I Pet. 3 : 20). He had already determined to destroy man, and even the animal creation, from the face of the earth; but there was one man who walked with God, "Noah is a righteous man, perfect he hath been among his generations, and Noah walked habitually with God" (Young's trans.).

WHAT IS IT TO WALK WITH GOD?

When we walk with a friend we are given up to go his way, to go where he wills, and to go at his pace, just letting him direct. And just so is it to walk with God—it is to be yielded up to Him, to have no will but His will, no choice apart from His choice as He reveals it in His Word, which He promises to make clear to us. "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine" (John 7 : 17). To walk with God is not to rush on before God, jumping at the conclusion that this or that must be His will; it is to take time to pray over a matter, and to obtain a clear indication of His will, through His light on His Word, on circumstances, or on our judgment. Noah thus walked with God. In the midst of a world which received not the things of the Spirit of God, for they were foolishness to them; neither could they of themselves know them, because they are spiritually discerned (I Cor. 2 : 14), Noah was both a witness to and a preacher of righteousness. We have no evidence that a single human being outside his family had any sympathy with him; but Noah found God enough.

While the whole population of the world, the sons of Cain and the degenerate sons of Seth, were alike occupied with their own concerns—eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage—just as though there were no God to fear or love, God was conversing with Noah. Death had come into the world, but wholesale death was unknown. God said to Noah, "The end of all flesh is come before Me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth." Then, before our loving God tells out in detail the terrible destruction which He purposes, He tells of a way of safety. "Make thee an ark of gopher wood. . . . And, behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; and everything that is in the earth shall die." Noah had but God's word for it. Not one man with whom he came in contact in business or social life believed this message of destruction; it was contrary to natural law, they thought, and therefore could not be. Noah alone, in all the world,

COUNTED GOD TRUE.

To him faith in God was "the evidence of things not seen" (Heb. 11 : 1). "Hath He said, and shall He not do it? or hath He spoken, and shall He not make it good?" (Num. 23 : 19). "By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with godly fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; through which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith" (Heb. 11 : 7, R. V.). The man of faith endures, "as seeing Him who is invisible" (Heb. 11 : 27), and looks, "not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen" (II Cor. 4 : 18). This did Noah, and he built his ark according to the command of God, and thus did he condemn the world. Words of condemnation are forbidden us: Christ came "not to condemn the world; but that the world through Him might be saved (John 3 : 17). But a life which is true to God, the life of one who takes God's view of things and in spite of everything which seems contrary counts Him faithful, silently, but surely condemns the world. Men think science cannot fail, but that God can. After the terrible visitation of cholera in Spain physicians had settled that an infallible cure had been discovered; but the very next year that terrible scourge marched into Italy, and, yielding to no remedy, slew its thousands. Science may know much, but it is not omniscient; science may do much, but it is not omnipotent. Noah and he, and his family, and representatives of all living creatures on the face of the earth were saved in the time of destruction. While the seasons succeeded each other, and no change took place in the outward aspect of things, Noah went quietly on with his preparations. While his neighbors were improving their houses and estates on the doomed earth, he built the ark, provisioned it, made it water-tight, and then he and his family forsook the condemned world and took up their abode in it. He had preached his last sermon, and now his contemporaries could see that he believed what he had said. Then a sight which must have struck them as remarkable began to manifest itself. The beasts of earth, two of a kind—in some cases seven of a kind—went, without demur, unto Noah into the ark. Yet, strange to say, this generation which had seen all and heard all Noah's testimony "knew not till the flood came and took them all away" (Matt. 24 : 39)! Noah had done his part, and now God was true to him: "The Lord shut him in," yes, and

SHUT THE UNBELIEVING WORLD OUT.

The testimony was finished, the door of the ark of safety was no longer open, and then, to suit His purpose, the laws of nature were reversed by their Maker: the sea beneath burst her bounds, the windows of heaven were opened, and the mighty wilderness of waters met upon the shrieking multitudes who had refused the day of grace. And Noah lived on through death and destruction to be, as it were, a new Adam, the founder of a new race who should know God. He was a man alive out of death. We have here the very figure of baptism, which buries with Christ and raises into newness of life as we by faith enter into it. And yet how soon sin reappeared in the renewed earth! No new beginning of man could fully carry out the mind of God; Jesus alone fulfilled His law; of Him alone could it be said that He was "without sin," of Him alone, that no guile was "found in His mouth." But Noah has his place in God's registry of men of faith in Hebrews 11. How are such men needed to-day! Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that He will send forth such laborers into His harvest.

JESUS CHRIST THE SAME YESTERDAY, TO-DAY AND FOREVER.

NOTHING but Christ as on we tread,
The gift unpriced God's living bread;
With staff in hand and feet well shod,
Nothing but Christ, the Christ of God.

Everything loss, for Him below,
Taking the cross where'er we go;
Showing to all where once he trod,
Nothing but Christ, the Christ of God.

Nothing save him in all our ways,
Giving the theme for ceaseless praise;
Our whole resource along the road,
Nothing but Christ, the Christ of God.

Nothing but Christ for darkest hours,
In him our trust 'mid satin's powers;
Though tempests rage, and troubles flood,
Nothing but Christ, the Christ of God.

Nothing but Christ for brightest morn,
As well sufficed with Canaan's corn;
We then shall know in his abode,
Nothing but Christ, the Christ of God.

To-day His Christ unchangeable,
To-morrow Christ the blesser still;
Then lost in God our journey o'er,
Only his Christ for evermore.

TWO years ago the portrait and life of the Rev. Griffith John, the devoted and successful missionary in China, was published in this journal, with a sketch of the marvellous work God has used him to accomplish among the opium-smokers and gamblers during the thirty-two years of his residence in that country. During a portion of that time he was aided in his arduous labors by his wife, a lady of singular devotion and eminent piety, who not only ministered to his comfort in domestic affairs, but worked with him as a fellow-laborer in the mission-field. This excellent Christian lady has now been called to her reward. Now, for the first time, the Church at large hears of her indefatigable labors. So quiet, so unostentatious was her life that until her death only her fellow-laborers and her most intimate friends were aware of the zeal and energy and unwearied devotion with which this consecrated lady entered into the work of Chinese evangelization. Our readers will be interested in the portrait of her which appears on the first page of this number, with pictures of the scenes amid which her days were passed, and in a brief sketch of her life and work.

Mrs. Griffith John gave over thirty years of her life to Christian labor in China. She was and one of whom her country may be justly proud. She was born in 1834, and was therefore fifty-one years of age when she died, on December 29th, 1885. In her youth she had the inestimable blessing of a Christian mother, who was herself remarkable for the closeness of her walk with God and her consecrated life. It was to her mother's prayers and excellent training that Mrs. John was indebted, under God, for the early development of Christian character which afterward made her a blessing to that Asiatic land of darkness.

It was in the year 1854, when she was only twenty years of age, that she first set foot in China. She was then the wife of the Rev. Dr. Jenkins, of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. The Rev. William Muirhead, in a brief obituary notice, published in the Chinese Recorder, mentions the pleasure with which he welcomed her on her arrival. "She was," he says, "in the heyday of youth, and full of life and spirit in relation to the work for which she had come out. It was pleasing to become acquainted with her, and to observe the flow of soul and natural intelligence that marked her conversation and demeanor. She appeared to be a remarkable woman in this respect, and conjoined with her educational accomplishments, especially in the line of vocal and instrumental music, the well-ordered course of things in her own home and the interest she took in what was expected to be the work of her life; all gave promise of eminent usefulness in the future.

"But even this was intensified in a high degree by what soon became evident in the matter of her not only her faith in Christ, and love to Him, as her Divine Lord and Saviour, but her sense of union and fellowship with Him, as the animating principle of her life and character. She seems to have been imbued with this in early days from her association with Christian friends in America, who professed and inculcated it in a most earnest manner; and as she thoroughly sympathized with it, so she urged it in the circle in which she was called to move. There are those still living who remember her early consecration, and the earnestness of her appeals which have left a deep and lasting impression on their whole moral being."

With such a character it is not surprising that a decision arrived at by her husband caused her some regret. The force of circumstances, ill health and concern for his wife, who, in those early days of residence in China, was severely tried by the climate, combined to induce Dr. Jenkins to accept a position offered to him in the Consular Service of the United States. Abundant opportunities remained for Christian usefulness, but the sense of complete and absolute consecration to the Lord's work was lost. That, however, she bore as became a wife, exerting herself to the utmost of her time and power to render increased service to the Master. This life continued until 1871, when Dr. Jenkins died. Her soon after her husband's death was rendered necessary by the shock of bereavement, and still more by a season of spiritual darkness, which came upon her in her early days of widowhood. Then she yearned for the association and communion with the friends of her girlhood and for the sisterly sympathy and encouragement which would carry her back in spirit to the light now temporarily clouded. Her stay in America, however, was short; she felt she must return to China, in obedience to the will of God. Her visit home, however, was not in vain. During her short stay she came in contact once more with those Christian friends who had been so helpful to her in her earlier days, and the old longings for the perfect life in Christ broke forth anew. Once more there came a season of earnest heart-searching, followed by deep sorrow for past failures and an honest surrender of self. She waited for the Comforter. As the heart panteth after the water brooks, so her soul panted for God. Erelong the Heavenly Dove descended upon her as a Spirit of purity, peace, and power. Thus baptized anew, she returned to China. She sought God's guidance, and asked Him to give her a work which would fill her heart. This prayer was granted her. God gave her a work to do for Him which not only filled her heart then, but continued to fill it to the last. This was

WORK AMONG SAILORS.

One day, as she was going to Union Chapel, at Shanghai, she met about half a dozen sailors, walking in the other direction, and each one carrying under his arm a bottle of whiskey or "Old Tom." For the first time in her life she began to feel a special interest in the sailor, and she asked herself prayerfully, "Is not this the work that God has given me to do?" She spoke to them, undeterred by any fear of ridicule or insult, and eventually induced them—incredible as it may appear to those who are familiar with the sailor's traditional character as a lover of grog—to fling their bottles into the ditch hard by. The men accompanied her to the chapel, and after the service she took them to her home. She gave them tea, and there and then commenced her Sunday evening services for sailors. At those meetings from forty to eighty sailors, and others, would gather in her drawing-room every Sunday evening. It was in some respects the most interesting and certainly the most fruitful in results. The prayers were short and fervent, the addresses earnest and to the point, and the singing always bright and full of spirit. The devoted worker expected conversions, and made a direct aim at this end. There was nothing vague about her teachings or her appeals. Certain days and hours in the week were appointed for private conversation, and all were invited to come and see her at those times. These were her opportunities of dealing personally with her Sunday hearers. She also conducted a very extensive correspondence with her children (as she delighted to call the blue-jackets) after they had left Shanghai for other parts of the world.

The results connected with these efforts were simply astonishing. Conversions were numerous, and the change in the general conduct of the men-of-war's-men who visited the port was marked by the residents generally.

A SPIRITUAL SON

thus wrote to the lady whom he styled "his mother," thus accepting the relationship which had to him apparently been more of a life-giving power than even that of a natural mother, "Dearest mother," wrote the grateful and conscientious sailor, "is there anything wrong in smoking? There is a young chap on board the Frolic who told me last night, when he saw me smoking, that I had not given up all for Jesus; so I thought I would ask you if you think it is wrong, and I will give it up. I will do nothing that my Saviour does not love; and anything you do not like I will not do. I would not displease you, if I knew it, you who have promised to be my mother. You do not know how I love you as a mother, more now than when I was with you. You were kinder to me than any one else has ever been. If I had not known you, I should not have known Jesus."

A REMARKABLE GIFT

was in the possession of this Christian worker, which aided her very greatly in her efforts to win the love and confidence of the sailors. This was her marvellous memory for faces and names. A sailor once seen was never forgotten, nor was any detail about him forgotten. "I suppose you don't know me, ma'am," a bluff sailor would say, meeting her in Shanghai, after an absence sometimes of a year or two. To his surprise, he would find that the lady not only knew him, but knew his name and the name of the ship on which he had visited China before, and the circumstances under which the lady had formed his acquaintance. It was more than a surprise—it was a delight to a man who is apt to feel that no one takes enough interest in him to remember him individually. It cemented the bonds of friendship, and exercised an influence which did not become extinct when he quitted the port.

In October, 1874, Mr. Griffith John had the happiness of uniting her lot with his, and securing for himself a devoted helpmate at home and in the field. To the sorrow of her friends, she then quitted Shanghai for her husband's sphere of labor at Hankow. Her lay less among European sailors, and more among Chinese women and girls. Nevertheless, she carried into her new sphere the same spirit of consecration and earnest purpose. Her love to the sailor remained the same to the end; and whenever a gun-boat or a tea ship visited the port, she threw her whole soul into the work of ministering to the spiritual needs of the men.

Neither did she labor in vain at Hankow. As at Shanghai, so here, her ministry was abundantly blessed; and there are to-day many seafaring men who bless God that they were led to Hankow, because it was there, through Mrs. John's instrumentality, they were brought to know God in Christ.

Her interest, too, was of a thoroughly practical character. During a brief visit which she made to England, in 1881, she raised a considerable sum of money among her husband's friends for the purpose of erecting a Sailors' Rest and Reading-room at Hankow. With this money a suitable and beautiful little building has been erected on the premises of the London Mission. At Hankow Mrs. John threw herself into the Chinese work with great enthusiasm, and her influence among the Chinese was great. She took a special interest in the hospital, and devoted much of her time to the instruction of the female patients. Day by day, through rain and sunshine, was she to be seen on her way to or from that institution. She knew how dark and sad their souls were, and she felt she must go and give them light and comfort. And her labors in this direction were not in vain. Some of the most satisfactory female converts were brought to Christ through her efforts in connection with the hospital work.

During the few years preceding HER DEATH, Mrs. John suffered constant pain. Disease had laid firm hold upon her vital powers before her husband and friends suspected its presence The patience, the self-forgetfulness, and self-sacrifice which animated her in her work sealed her lips from complaint. She suffered silently, and none could detect any flagging in her energy nor any diminution in her labor. Even when her distressing complaint could no longer be concealed, she spoke of it with so much lightness and so little concern, that no alarm was produced. To her the time of her departure was of little moment. She had left that with all else in the hands of her Lord, and had no occasion for the concern which the approach of death begets in the minds of those who are living for the world.

She was not altogether laid aside from her beloved work until Christmas Day, 1885. Then the appearance of acute symptoms rendered medical assistance indispensable. Dr. Gillison was summoned, and pronounced the case to be one of peritonitis. All that love and medical skill could do was done for the patient, but she gradually grew worse, and died about noon on December 29th. The event was felt to be very sudden, because it was very unexpected. The physician hoped almost to the last, and those who stood around her were only too glad to share in his hope. Till within two hours of the end, her husband had no idea that it was so nigh.

About half an hour before her departure she said, "Griffith," first indistinctly, then quite clearly. Her husband spoke to her, and asked her if she was happy. In an instant a strange light shone upon or from her face; she opened her eyes, and gazing upon some vision of the unseen, she said,

"BEAUTIFUL! BEAUTIFUL! JESUS the Lord! Beautiful!" She must have repeated the word beautiful fifty times at least during the last half hour, and she heaved the last sigh with the word upon her lips. "Those who were present," writes a mourner, "can never forget what we saw and heard during that half hour." They felt that heaven was in their midst, and they were standing in the very presence of the King. What was that light? Was it not the reflection of another face which was just then looking on her? "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever."

To her bereaved husband, stricken down with grief, it has been a melancholy joy to read letters from all lands, telling of the love which his beloved wife had inspired. Rough sailors, refined ladies, Christians of every degree, have written to express their sorrow, and if not to offer consolation, to give him that companionship in affliction which has its comforting influence. "I cannot tell you how I loved her," writes one, "or what she has been to me. Only the Lord who gave her to me knows. She it was who led me to find that perfect peace which she herself so enjoyed, and I can truly say that my whole life was changed through her influence," and she adds with truth, "and I expect very many can tell the same tale."

Chinese Converts Set an Example that Christians at home would do well to follow. Dr. Corbett, a returned missionary from China, says that "the heathen never go to their temples to worship without carrying an offering of some kind as a proof of their sincerity. When they become Christians this conviction is not rooted out, but rather it is heightened in proportion as Christianity is regarded as superior to heathenism. I have seen them give to such an extent that I felt it a duty to remonstrate, and remind them that they owed duties to their homes which must not be forgotten." American clergymen are not often required to undertake the duty of remonstrating with their members on that account.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Delivered from the Drink Demon.—At a testimony meeting in Cowcaddens Free Church the following testimony was given: "It is six and a half years since I gave myself to Christ, and for the previous five years I was a confirmed drunkard. But I had a praying mother, and through her pleadings God's Holy Spirit strove with me. For a long time I got no rest by night or by day: I saw nothing before me but an undone eternity. Oh, what a miserable sinner I felt! My heart was sick and sore, and I at length turned to God's Word to seek relief, and this is what I found, 'He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and with His stripes we are healed.' I fled to Christ the Blessed One as my only Refuge, and put myself into His hands, and now I thank God because I stand on redemption ground."

Good Advice at a Wedding.—The Rev. Mr. Ross observed: "About a year ago I married a couple, and after the ceremony was over I advised them to give their hearts to Jesus then and there. I heard no more of them until very recently. I was told that a woman wished to see me. I had forgotten all about the woman, but she had not forgotten what I had said to her and her husband on the morning of their marriage. She said, 'You married me about a year ago, and then you said to us, "If you have not given your hearts already to Christ, do it now."' 'And did you do so?' I asked. 'No,' she said, 'since that time I have been troubled much about what you said, and often I have urged my husband to come to the church and have a conversation about this matter, but he would not, so I resolved to come alone, and get salvation to-night.' She got what she wanted, and went away rejoicing in the love of Christ."

On a Sandy Foundation.—Mr. Clarke Said: "I was a few days ago at the death-bed of a man who had been a Christian worker, and I said to him, 'My friend, now that you are about to enter eternity, and have to spend it in heaven or hell, do you rest assured that your sins are forgiven through Christ, and that you are going straight to Him in glory?' 'Oh, yes,' said he, 'I am going to heaven.' But when I came to ask on what grounds he was resting, I found he hoped to get there because he had been a 'blue-ribbon man' for years, and had rescued many drunkards. He had been as the boat bringing many people over the river, but never landing himself, or as I once saw at Rothesay, a young man standing on the pier assisting a picnic party one by one on board, and after helping the last as he turned to follow, found the boat moving away. He had helped so many into Christ's kingdom that he thought he must be there himself."

The Only Escape from the Wreck.—Mr. Thompson said: "There was an emigrant ship going down, but fortunately there were enough boats to save the most of the people on board. The passengers were lowered over the ship's side by a rope, and when the waves had brought the boat directly beneath them they were told to let go, and those on the boat would catch them. Many had performed that perilous journey in safety, when it came to the turn of a lady; she got the same instructions as the others, but when told to let go she held firmly on. The captain scolded her, and told her to be sure and let go the next time. They waited until another wave brought the boat directly underneath, and again she was told to let go; but she was afraid, and only held the tighter, and again the boat drifted away. Then as time was precious she was pulled up and put aside. Then they took her little girl, and after directing her, let her over the side. She had faith in the captain and in those who were trying to save her, and at the right time let go the rope, and found herself safe in the arms of those in the boat. For the third time they tried the mother, and for the third time she refused to be guided by faith to safety; she remained on the ship until it sunk, and with it was lost. So when Christ tells us to let go all and trust in Him, we often refuse and hold on something of or in ourselves, which keeps God's Spirit from working in us, and we go down clinging to some delusive hope."

A Company of Angry Jews.—Mr. Byran, a Polish missionary, said: "When I was travelling in Germany I took every opportunity to speak to the poor Jews about the Gospel of Jesus Christ, concerning which they are wofully ignorant; and, on one occasion, when travelling in a train, I found myself in the same compartment as four Jews. According to my usual custom, I took out my New Testament and began to talk to them. They listened for some time quietly enough while I talked of the love of God the Father; but when I went on to speak of Jesus of Nazareth, as being the Son of God, the promised Messiah, and told them of His being crucified for their sins, they could no longer contain themselves, but burst forth into angry denunciations upon me, who, being a Jew, dared to preach to them on a crucified, a degraded malefactor. Such is the opinion of Jesus among those Jews who know anything at all about Christianity, but the great part are entirely ignorant of the nature of Christianity, believing it to be an idolatrous religion, akin to those held by the inhabitants of Canaan who were driven out by the conquering hosts of Israelites under Joshua."

A Kiss for a Blow.—A Friend Remarked: "Once I was at the examination of a school containing about six hundred children. They were all seated in a large hall and were under the charge of the principal, a Christian old lady. While they were all sitting there, a little boy and girl, brother and sister, in the middle of the hall, had a dispute, and when his sister was speaking to him, he raised his hand and struck her on the face. The girl was just about to return the blow when she caught the eye of her teacher gazing steadily at her. She went right up to the pair, the boy looking guilty and quite ashamed of himself, and said to the girl, 'Now, Martha, instead of returning that blow, put your arms round your brother's neck and give him a kiss.' This, being so angry, she was disinclined to do, but at length she entwined her arms round his neck and kissed him. Then the little fellow was completely broken down, and began to cry, saying he had rather she had struck him. But little Martha comforted him, saying he had not hurt her much, and that he would not hit her again; and at the end of the examination they went home quite happy. Such is God's commandment to us—to return good for evil, and in so doing we heap coals of fire on our enemy's head."

A Foolish Excuse Exposed.—An Evangelist related: "I was at a meeting lately where there were over six hundred people present, and of that number there were only about twenty young men. Nor was this an isolated case; there is seldom a greater percentage of young men at any of our evangelistic meetings. At the close of the address a Baptist minister and I spoke particularly to the young men about deciding for Christ, and nearly all of them gave the same excuse, which was, 'Look at the samples of Christianity we have in this city; we hear them preach, but we also see how they live, and their behavior gives the lie to their preaching. No, there are too many hypocrites among you for us to wish to be among them also!' My friend, the minister, then put his hand into his pocket, and taking a silver coin, said, 'Will you take this?' 'Yes,' replied a young man. 'But,' continued the minister, 'there is base coin about; this may be bad. Will you risk the accepting of it?' 'Yes,' was the reply, 'for while there may be a few counterfeits there are many good.' 'And that is exactly the case with Christians,' replied the minister; 'while there are many true Christians there is a sprinkling of hypocrites, and the world seeing them, remembers them, forgetting that they are but few in comparison with the true Christians.'"

BROKEN PIECES OF THE SHIP.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Jan. 16, 1887.

"Some on broken pieces of the ship."—ACTS 27 : 44.

The Storm-beaten Ship—A Missionary in Command—The Wreck—Men Floating on the Wreckage—The Ship of the Church—Broken Theological Timbers—The Plank to Cling to—Safety for Men Not on the Ship—Overboard at Andover—Castaway by Election—Stumbling at Eternal Punishment—Herod and the Massacred Children—No Time to Reconstruct the Ship—Garibaldi's Garden—How Theological Systems go to Pieces—The Wreck of the Knickerbocker—Perilous Discussions—Wrecked Lives—One Hour Left.

NEVER off Goodwin Sands, or the Skerries, or Cape Hatteras was a ship in worse predicament than in the Mediterranean hurricane, was the grain ship, on which two hundred and seventy-six passengers were driven on the coast of Malta, five miles from the metropolis of that island called Civita Vecchia. After a two weeks' tempest when the ship was entirely disabled and captain and crew had become completely demoralized, an old missionary took command of the vessel. He was small, crooked-backed and sore-eyed, according to tradition. It was Paul, aboard. He was no more afraid of a Euroclydon tossing the Mediterranean Sea, now up to the gates of heaven and now sinking it to the gates of hell, than he was afraid of a kitten playing with a string. He ordered them all down to take their rations, first asking for them a blessing. Then he insured all their lives, telling them they would be rescued, and, so far from losing their heads, they would not lose so much of their hair as you could cut off with one click of the scissors; ay, not a thread of it, whether it were gray with age or golden with youth. "There shall not a hair fall from the head of any of you."

Knowing that they can never get to the desired port, they make the sea on the fourteenth night black with overthrown cargo, so that when the ship strikes it will not strike so heavily. At daybreak they saw a creek, and in their exigency resolved to make for it. And so they cut the cables, took in the two paddles that they had on these old boats, and hoisted the main sail so that they might come with such force as to be driven high up on the beach by some fortunate billow. There she goes—tumbling toward the rocks, now prow foremost, now stern foremost, now rolling over to starboard, now a wave dashes clear over the deck and it seems as if the old craft has gone forever. But up she comes again. Paul's arm around a mast, he cries: "All is well. God has given me all those that sail with me." Crash! went the prow with such force that it broke off the mast.

CRASH! WENT THE TIMBERS

till the seas rushed through from side to side of the vessel. She parts amidships, and into a thousand fragments the vessel goes, and into the waves two hundred and seventy-six immortals are precipitated. Some of them had been brought up on the seashore and had learned to swim, and with their chin just above the waves and by stroke of both arms and propulsion of both feet, they put out for the beach and reach it. But, alas, for those others! they have never learned to swim, or they were wounded by the falling of the mast, or the nervous shock was too great for them. And others had been weakened by long sea-sickness.

Oh, what will become of them? "Take that piece of a rudder," says Paul to one. "Take that fragment of a spar," says Paul to another. "Take that table." "Take that image of Castor and Pollux." "Take that plank from the lifeboat." "Take anything and head for the beach." What a struggle for life in the breakers! Oh, the merciless waters, how they sweep over the heads of men, women and children! Hold on there! Almost ashore, keep up your courage! Remember what Paul told you. There, the receding wave on the beach leaves in the sand a whole family. There crawls up out of the surf the centurion. There another plank comes in with a life clinging fast to it. There another piece of the shattered vessel with its freightage of an immortal soul. They must by this time be

ALL SAVED.

Yes; there comes in last of all, for he had been overseeing the rest, the old missionary, who wrings the water from his gray beard and cries out, "Thank God, all are here!"

Gather them around a fire and call the roll. Paul builds a fire, and when the bundles of sticks begin to crackle, and, standing and sitting around the blaze, the passengers begin to recover from their chill, and their wet clothes begin to dry, and warmth begins to come into all the shivering passengers, let the purser of the vessel go round and see if any of the poor creatures are missing. Not one of the crowd that were plunged into the sea. How it relieves our anxiety as we read: "Some on broken pieces of the ship, and so it came to pass they all escaped safe to land."

Having on previous occasions looked at the other passengers, I confine myself to-day to an examination of

on broken pieces of the ship. There is something about them that excites in me an intense interest. I am not so much interested in those that could swim. They got ashore as I expected. A mile of water is not a very great undertaking for a strong swimmer, or even two miles is not. But I cannot stop thinking about those on broken pieces of the ship. The great Gospel ship is the finest vessel of the universe and can carry more passengers than any craft ever constructed, and you could no more wreck it than you could wreck the throne of God Almighty. I wish all the people would come aboard of her. I could not promise a smooth voyage, for oftimes it will be tempestuous, and a chopped sea, but I could promise safe arrival for all who took passage on that Great Eastern, so called by me because its commander came out of the East, the star of the East a badge of His authority and their life broken in pieces, and their habits broken in pieces, and their worldly and spiritual prospects broken in pieces, and yet I believe they are going to reach the shining shore, and I am encouraged by the experience of those people who are spoken of in the text: "Some on broken pieces of the ship."

But a vast multitude do not take regular passage. Their

One object in this sermon is to encourage all those who cannot take the whole system of religion as we believe it, but who really believe something, to come ashore on

THAT ONE PLANK.

I do not underrate the value of a great theological system, but where in all the Bible is there anything that says: Believe in John Calvin and thou shalt be saved; or, believe in Arminius and thou shalt be saved; or, believe in the Synod of Dort and thou shalt be saved; or, believe in the Thirty-nine Articles and thou shalt be saved? A man may be orthodox and go to hell, or heterodox and go to heaven. The man who in the deep affection of his heart accepts Christ is saved, and the man who does not accept Him is lost.

I believe in both the Heidelberg and Westminster catechisms, and I wish you all did, but you may believe in nothing they contain except the one idea that Christ came to save sinners, and that you are one of them, and you are instantly rescued. If you can come in on the grand old ship, I would rather have you get aboard, but if you can find only a piece of wood as long as the human body, or a piece as wide as the outspread human arms, and either of them is a piece of the cross, come in on that piece. Tens of thousands of people are to-day kept out of the kingdom of God because they cannot believe everything.

I am talking with a man thoughtful about his soul, who has lately travelled through New England and passed the night

AT ANDOVER.

He says to me: "I cannot believe that in this life the destiny is irrevocably fixed; I think there will be another opportunity of repentance after death." I say to him: "My brother, what has that to do with you? Don't you realize that the man who waits for another chance after death when he has a good chance before death is a stark fool? Had not you better take the plank that is thrown to you now and head for shore rather than wait for a plank that may by invisible hands be thrown to you after you are dead? Do as you please, but as for myself, with pardon for all my sins offered me now and all the joys of time and eternity offered me now, I instantly take them rather than run the risk of such other chance as wise men think they can peel off or twist out of a Scripture passage that has for all the Christian centuries been interpreted another way. You say:

"I DO NOT LIKE PRINCETON

theology, or New Haven theology, or Andover theology." I do not ask you on board either of these great men-of-war, their portholes filled with the great siege-guns of ecclesiastical battle. But I do ask you to take the one plank of the Gospel that you do believe in and strike out for the pearl-strung beach of heaven.

Says some other man: "I would attend to religion if I was quite sure about the

and free agency, but that mixes me all up." Those things used to bother me, but I have no more perplexity about them, for I say to myself: "If I love Christ, and live a good, honest, useful life, I am elected to be saved; and if I do not love Christ, and live a bad life, I will be damned, and all the theological seminaries of the universe cannot make it any different." I floundered a long while in the sea of sin and doubt, and it was as rough as the Mediterranean on the fourteenth night when they threw the grain overboard, but I saw there was mercy for a sinner, and that plank I took, and I have been warming myself by the bright fire on the shore for three decades.

ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.

While I am talking to another man about his soul he tells me: "I do not become a Christian because I do not believe there is any hell at all."

Ah! don't you? Do all the people, of all beliefs and no belief at all, of good morals and bad morals, go straight to a happy heaven? Do the holy and the debauched have the same destination? At midnight, in a hallway, the owner of a house and a burglar meet each other, and they both fire, and both are wounded, but the burglar died in five minutes and the owner of the house lives a week after. Will the burglar be at the gate of heaven waiting when the house-owner comes in? Will the debauchee and the libertine go right in among the families of heaven? I wonder if Herod is playing on the banks of the River of Life with the children he massacred. I wonder if Charles Guiteau and John Wilkes Booth are up there shooting at a mark. I do not now controvert it, although I must say that for such a miserable heaven I have no admiration. But the Bible does not say, "Believe in perdition and be saved." Because all are saved, according to your theory, that ought not to keep you from loving and serving Christ. Do not refuse to come ashore because all the others, according to your theory, are going to get ashore.

You may have a different theory about chemistry, about astronomy, about the atmosphere, from that which others adopt, but you are not therefore hindered from action. Because your theory of light is different from others, do not refuse to open your eyes. Because your theory of air is different you do not refuse to breathe. Because your theory about the stellar system is different, you do not refuse to acknowledge the North Star. Why should the fact that your theological theories are different, hinder you from acting upon what you know? If you have not a whole ship fashioned in the theological dry docks to bring you to wharfage, you have at least a plank: "Some on broken pieces of the ship."

"But I don't believe in revivals! Then go to your room, and all alone with your door locked give your heart to God and join some church where the thermometer never gets higher than fifty in the shade. "But I do not believe in baptism!" Come in without it, and settle that matter afterward. "But there are so many inconsistent Christians!" Then come in and show them by a good example how professors ought to act. "But I don't believe in the Old Testament!" Then come in on the New. "But I don't like the Book of Romans!" Then or Luke. Refusing to come to Christ, whom you admit to be the Saviour of the lost, because you cannot admit other things, you are like a man out there in that Mediterranean tempest and tossed in the Melita breakers, refusing to come ashore until he can mend the pieces of the broken ship. I hear him say: "I won't go in on any of these planks until I know in what part of the ship they belong. When I can get the windlass in the right place, and the sails set, and that keel-piece where it belongs, and that floor timber right, and these ropes untangled, I will go ashore. I am an old sailor, and know all about ships for forty years, and as soon as I can get the vessel afloat in good shape I will come in." A man drifting by on a piece of wood overhears him and says:

COME IN ON MATTHEW

"YOU WILL DROWN

before you get that ship reconstructed. Better do as I am doing. I know nothing about ships, and never saw one before I came on board this, and I cannot swim a stroke, but I am going ashore on this shivered timber." The man in the offing while trying to mend his ship goes down. The man who trusted to the plank is saved. Oh, my brother, let your smashed-up system of theology go to the bottom while you come in on a splintered spar! "Some on broken pieces of the ship."

GARIBALDI'S GARDENS.

You may get all your difficulties settled as Garibaldi, the magnetic Italian, got his gardens made. When the war between Austria and Sardinia broke out he was living at Caprera, a very rough and uncultured island home. But he went forth with his sword to achieve the liberation of Naples and Sicily, and gave nine million people free government under Victor Emanuel. Garibaldi, after being absent two years from Caprera, returned, and, when he approached it, he found that his home had by Victor Emanuel as a surprise been Edenized. Trimmed shrubbery had taken the place of thorny thickets, gardens the place of barrenness, and the old rookery in which he once lived had given way to a pictured mansion where he lived in comfort the rest of his days. And I tell you if you will come and enlist under the banner of our Victor Emanuel, and follow Him through thick and thin, and fight His battles, and endure His sacrifices, you will find after a while that He has changed your heart from a jungle of thorny scepticisms into a garden all abloom with luxuriant joy that you have never dreamed of. From a tangled Caprera of sadness into a Paradise of God!

I do not know how your theological system went to pieces. It may be that by your parents you were and you believe little or nothing. Or they may have been too rigid and severe in religious discipline, and cracked you over the head with a psalm-book. It may be that some partner in business who was a member of an evangelical church played on you a trick that disgusted you with religion. It may be that you have associates who have talked against Christianity in your presence until you are "all at sea," and you dwell more on things that you do not believe than on things you do believe. You are in one respect like Lord Nelson, when a signal was lifted that he wished to disregard and he put his sea-glass to his blind eye and said: "I really do not see the signal." Oh, my hearer, put this field-glass of the Gospel no longer to your blind eye, and say I cannot see, but put it to your other eye, the eye of faith, and you will see Christ, and He is all you need to see.

If you can believe nothing else, you certainly believe in vicarious suffering, for you see it almost every day in some shape. Last month of the Cromwell Line, running between New Orleans and here, was in great storms, and the captain and crew saw the schooner Mary D. Cranmer of Philadelphia in distress. The weather cold, the waves mountain-high, the first officer of the steamship and four men put out in a lifeboat to save the crew of the schooner, and reached the vessel and towed it out of danger, the wind shifting so that the schooner was saved. But the five men of the steamship coming back, their boat capsized, yet righted again and came on, the sailors coated with ice. The boat capsized again, and three times upset and was righted, and a line was thrown the poor fellows, but their hands and arms were frozen so they could not grasp it, and a great wave rolled over them, and they went down never to rise till the sea gives up its dead. Appreciate that heroism and self-sacrifice of the brave fellows we all can, and can we not appreciate the Christ who put out in a more biting cold and into a more overwhelming surge to bring us out of infinite peril into everlasting safety? The wave of human hate rolled over Him from one side, and the wave of hellish fury rolled over Him on the other side. Oh, the thickness of the night and the thunder of the tempest into which Christ plunged for our rescue!

Come in on that one narrow beam,

THE BEAM OF THE CROSS.

Let all else go and cling to that. Put that under you, and with the earnestness of a swimmer struggling for his life put out for shore. There is a great warm fire of welcome already built, and already many, who were as far out as you are, are standing in its genial and heavenly glow. The angels of God's rescue are wading out into the surf to clutch your hand, and they know how exhausted you are, and all the redeemed prodigals of heaven are on the beach with new white robes to clothe all those who come in on broken pieces of the ship.

My sympathies are for such all the more because I was naturally sceptical, disposed to question everything about this life and the next, and was in danger of being farther out to sea than any of the two hundred and seventy-six in the Mediterranean breakers, and I was sometimes the annoyance of my theological professor because I asked so many questions. But

I CAME IN ON A PLANK.

I knew Christ was the Saviour of sinners, and that I was a sinner, and I got ashore, and I do not propose to go out on that sea again. I have not for thirty minutes discussed the controverted points of theology in thirty years. And during the rest of my life I do not propose to discuss them for thirty seconds.

I would rather, in a mud-scow, try to weather the worst cyclone that ever swept up from the Caribbean than risk my immortal soul in useless and in which some of my brethren in the ministry are indulging. They remind me of a company of sailors standing on Ramsgate pier-head, from which the life-boats are usually launched, and coolly discussing the different style of oar-locks, and how deep a boat ought to set in the water, while a hurricane is in full blast, and there are three steamers crowded with passengers going to pieces in the offing.

An old tar, the muscles of his face working with nervous excitement, cries out: "This is no time to discuss such things. Man the lifeboat! Who will volunteer? Out with her into the surf! Pull, my lads, pull for the wreck! Ha! ha! Now we have them. Lift them in and lay them down on the bottom of the boat. Jack, you try to bring them to. Put these flannels around their hands and feet, and I will pull for the shore. God help me! There! Landed! Huzza!" When there are so many struggling in the waves of sin and sorrow and wretchedness let all else go but salvation for time and salvation forever.

I bethink myself that there are some here whose opportunity or whose life is a mere wreck, and they have

You started in youth with all sails set and everything promised a grand voyage, but you have sailed in the wrong direction or have foundered on a rock. You have only a fragment of time left. Then come in on that one plank. "Some on broken pieces of the ship."

You admit you are all broken up, one decade of your life gone by, two decades, three decades, four decades, a half century, perhaps threequarters of a century gone. The hour-hand and the minute-hand of your clock of life are almost parallel, and soon it will be twelve and your day ended. Clear discouraged are you? I admit it is a sad thing to give all of our lives that are worth anything to sin and the devil, and then at last make God a present of a first-rate corpse. But the past you cannot recover. Get on board that old ship you never will. Have you left, one more month, one more week, one more day, one more hour—come in on that. Perhaps if you get to heaven God may let you go out on some great mission to some other world, where you can somewhat atone for your lack of service in this.

From many a deathbed I have seen the hands thrown up in deploration something like this: "My life has been wasted. I had good mental faculties, and fine social position, and great opportunity, but through worldliness and neglect all has gone to waste save these few remaining hours. I now accept of Christ, and shall enter heaven through His mercy, but, alas, alas, that when I might have entered the haven of eternal rest with a full cargo, and been greeted by the waving hands of a multitude in whose salvation I had borne a blessed part, I must confess I now enter the harbor of heaven on broken pieces of the ship!"

CHINESE IDOLS SURRENDERED.

IN a letter from North China, published in the Missionary Herald, Mr. Aiken reports the blessed results of a visit home recently made by a teacher in the Boys' Day School at Pening. He says: The teacher went for a vacation to his home, two hundred miles north of Peking, beyond the Great Wall and toward Manchuria. Returning the first part of this month, he told us that his father, his mother, his sister, and his wife, who were all living in one house and who had previously been worshippers of idols, had learned from him the truth, 'slowly, slowly—a little each day'—and all wished to believe on Jesus, and that he had brought with him his father to stay here some weeks and learn the truth. He said that they had thrown away all their idols, including the burning of some paper upon which there were idolatrous images, or figures, which had been in the family two hundred years; in proof of which they brought down with them and presented to us a small metal box containing three wretched little idols. One of these, however, was quite nicely finished, and the whole would probably be worth what would be to them quite a good sum of money.

The women at home, we understand, are studying some Christian books which the teacher left with them, by the aid of such knowledge of the characters as he could give them, and having in his absences the assistance of an old teacher. The father here seems earnest and full of his new experience, and the teacher is going on with his school again, preaching frequently in the street-chapel when not occupied with his other duties; he also seems to be full of new life and hopefulness, as he well may be.

AN AFRICAN SHILOH.

AN attractive picture of a missionary's home is furnished by the Rev. William A. Fair, in a letter from Bassa, Liberia, to the Spirit of Missions. He writes: "We have cause for continual thankfulness. The Lord, through His blessing on our efforts here, has provided a comfortable home for us—a farm of forty-five acres, with dwelling 24x30 and two stories high, about fourteen miles from the sea, where mission work had never before been undertaken. We have named our place 'Shiloh.' Chiefly through the proceeds of our farm we have been enabled to support ourselves for the two years past, and for more than a year feed and clothe six little children of heathen parents.

"We have about five thousand coffee-trees on our land. The children do a good deal of the gathering and preparing of the coffee for market. This year we expect to realize $100 from our crop of coffee, and next year $200. We raise a considerable quantity of eddos and cassada—both good substitutes for Irish potatoes—sweet potatoes, and a few other vegetables, and this year, rice.

"Our dear friends, I know, if they were here, would enjoy a walk through Shiloh. There is a nice stream, with tall shady trees on either side. The hills and vales are covered with fruit-bearing trees, which, we trust, will soon yield abundantly. In their walk, too, they would see some of the various tropical fruits, which to people living in a temperate climate would be very tempting. Of course, as may be supposed, our means being limited, we have been obliged to work very hard and constantly. Many a day we have been very tired and sometimes sick from over-work and exposure; but believing our Heavenly Father has placed us here, we are contented and happy in our lot."

THE MONK'S VISION.

IN a recently-published volume of "Illustrations of Bible Texts," * Mr. C. H. Spurgeon relates the following legend, which though, of course, not true, serves, like the parables of our Lord, to convey a valuable lesson:

"There is a striking legend illustrating the blessedness of performing our duty at whatever cost to our own inclination. A monk had seen a beautiful vision of our Saviour, and in silent bliss he was gazing upon it. The hour arrived at which it was his duty to feed the poor at the convent-gate. He would fain have lingered in his cell, transported with joy at the vision; but, under a sense of duty, he tore himself away from it to perform his humble service. When he returned he found the blessed vision still waiting for him, and heard a voice, saying, 'Hadst thou stayed, I would have gone. As thou hast gone, I have remained.'

"It is a blessed thing to go forth with the Master's message after having seen Him; it is delightful to meet Him on the way when we are going to tell His disciples; and it is inexpressibly pleasant to find Him in the assembly bearing the witness with us. To go from the Lord with the Lord is such an agreeable combination that it cannot be described, but must be personally experienced."

FAITH BY ANALOGY.

A REMARKABLE testimony, recently given at Bethshan, London, is reported in the current number of Thy Healer. At one of the regular meetings Mr. Arthur Weedon, of 11 Chestnut Terrace, Tottenham, rose and said:

"About six years ago I was, with some companions, bathing in the river Lea, and while diving, I cut my knee very badly. I had to go to the hospital, and was laid up for five or six weeks, and then I became an out-door patient. Then I became able to go to my work, but was given to understand that I should feel the effects of my wounds every twelve months as the time came round. Well, when August came round again, I was laid aside, and had to go to the hospital again. The doctor said he could do nothing unless I went in. I did so, and was there for six weeks, and then became an out-door patient. One Thursday, while waiting for the doctor, I broke my stick, without which I could not walk, and I had to lean against the brick wall for support. At this time I had never heard of healing by the Lord; but while thus leaning, the thought came to me—if I had trusted God to heal my soul, why should I not trust Him to heal my body? I determined to do so, and while thus trusting Him, I was able to walk away without seeing the doctor. When I got home my mother was surprised, and said, 'Why, Arthur, what are you going to do?' I sat down by the fire and took the bandages away, one by one, and threw them into the fire; and from that day to this I have not felt the least ill effects from the accident, and do not expect to feel any more. I went to work the next morning as if there had been nothing the matter with me. But I do not think I should have been better except on this condition, that I gave myself up wholly to God, to work for Him. He did it that men might see that there is power in the God of Israel."

THE CRUELTIES OF HEATHENDOM.

JOURNALISTS whose hatred of England prompts them to misrepresent her dealings with Asiatic barbarism have written so much about the Burmese war that people are in danger of being deceived into believing that the Burmese dacoits are patriots giving their lives to liberate their country from foreign despotism. The following item, published by the Indian Witness, shows what is the character of these so-called patriots: "A poor old man of about seventy years of age was brought into the Civil Hospital at Kyoukse, not very long ago, the victim of rebel work. He had a few rupees—about fifty—saved, and he was tortured into giving this—his little all—up; and because he did not confess to the possession of more, his cheeks on both sides were slit from the corners of the mouth up to the ears and his tongue cut in two." Such things occur every day in Upper Burmah, and the English would have very little trouble from the dacoits if they did not interfere with them when they do such things.

THE LAST CITADEL OF HEATHENISM.

THE attempts recently made to effect an entrance into Thibet for commerce and the Gospel, which has unhappily failed, but which will surely be renewed, has directed public attention anew to that strange land. It is a country lying to the north-east of British India, between that country and China. Its area is about 652,000 square miles, and its population is estimated at 6,000,000. As, however, the country is closed to travellers, merchants, and missionaries, the number of inhabitants here given is chiefly conjectural. The Rev. A. B. Simpson, of New York, has recently published in his Word, Work, and World a series of papers on Thibet, from one of which, by Dr. A. T. Pierson, we extract the following details:

This almost unexplored country especially attracts attention as the main territory where as yet the Gospel has no foothold. It is called by the natives "Land of Bod." Lassa god land is the capital, and indeed the sacred metropolis of all countries where Buddhism reigns, as Rome is the capital of the Papacy. The inhabitants are Mongols. Polyandry is common, and one woman may marry all the brothers in a family! The language is mainly monosyllabic; the alphabet phonetic; it leads from left to right, and is evidently close akin to Sanscrit and Chinese, and has an extensive literature, mainly religious.

The principal interest that centres in Thibet is connected with the Worship of the Grand Lama, to whom even the Chinese Government pays homage, giving annually a sum equal to that paid by Thibet as tribute to China. Lamaism is an offshoot of Buddhism, and called by Thibetans "Buddha's Law."

There are two lamas, of equal sanctity, who consecrate each other, but Dalai-Lama is the supreme in power, and has his shrine at Lassa. According to popular notions, the Dalai-Lama incarnates Buddha-Sakyamuni, and is eternal and omniscient. When in his official dignity he sits cross-legged on five splendid cushions, over the altar, robed magnificently, and except that he moves his hands in blessing, is as motionless as a statue. Whatever emanates from him or is touched by him is supposed to be divinely potent. He is the supreme head of a hierarchy of ten grades, embracing a vast number of lamas, all of whom are monks, who live in lamaseries. Prayer wheels are everywhere seen, which turn out prayers and save indolent worshippers all exertion. Rich persons about to die call for lamas, who make a hole in the skull and let out the soul! and there are masses for the departed.

THE RESTORED EARTH.

By Rev. E. J. Hytche.

Peter's Prediction—The Times of Refreshing—The Dislocation—The Curse to be Removed—Sterility Overcome—The Seasons Regular—Longevity Increased—The Purification of the Dead Sea—The Joy at the Lord's Coming.

AS respects the condition of the earth during the millennium among the many prophetical fore-glimpses, there is no prediction more remarkable than the summary given by the Apostle Peter, more especially as it is based on the second advent and reign of our Lord. Thus he said to the Jewish multitudes, who were gathered together at Solomon's Porch (Acts 3: 19–21) that "times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord (or the Father); and He shall send Jesus—who was before preached unto you—whom the heavens must receive until of all things which God hath spoken by the mouths of all His servants the prophets since the world began." These words clearly point backward to some catastrophe in the history of our earth, and they also look forward to a brighter era, when the feet of Messiah shall again tread the Holy Land, and He shall be invested by His Father (Dan. 7: 13, 14) with its kingship.

That the curse pronounced on the earth on the fall of Adam, and which was partially repealed after the Noahic deluge, will be completely removed at the Second Advent, is implied by or renovation of all things." This fact was not, however, a novel revelation of the apostle, but rather it was only a summary of what had been previously declared by the Hebrew "prophets since the world began"—the only new revealed fact being as respects the Divine Personage by whom this restoration of the earth will be originated and introduced. Prominent among those seers of the Old Testament who referred to this renovation of the earth, were Isaiah, Ezekiel, Amos, Zechariah, and some unnamed Israelitish Psalmists.

The larger part of the earth is now so stony or rocky, that any capital expended on it would only entail its entire loss. But during the benign reign of Christ we learn that (Isa. 35: 1, 7) "the wilderness and (literal) shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose: it shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing." Even that mirage which now mocks the thirsty caravans of the desert shall cease its deceptions, since the same prophet declares that "the parched ground, or mirage, shall become a (real) pool, and the thirsty land springs of water." Nor is this all, for to show how the primeval curse will be altogether repealed, Isaiah says (55: 13), "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle-tree," so that thorns and thistles shall no longer exhaust the earth with useless vegetation.

THE PARCHED GROUND

In that glowing millennial Psalm, the sixty-seventh, it is intimated that when the Gentiles shall universally join in the concert of praise to their Heavenly Father, "the earth shall yield her increase." For the full explanation of this prediction we are indebted to Amos, who says that so certain will be the process of the seasons that (Amos 9 : 13) "the days will come when the ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes, him that soweth seed—and the mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills shall meet" with the richness and ripeness of their produce!

But even more than this; for not only will seasons follow

so that one will gradually blend into the preceding so as to remove that uncertainty which is now the most glaring evil of agriculture, but it would appear from Ezekiel, that on the banks of the restored Dead Sea (Ezek. 47 : 12) will grow medicinal trees which will "bring forth new fruits according to his month," or in other words, every new moon will see a fresh crop of fruit. Nor is Ezekiel the only prophet to whom was revealed this fact, for about seven hundred years afterward it was communicated to the exile of Patmos (Rev. 22 : 1, 2), and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the Gentiles.

But, bright as this prospect of the Millennial age is, it would be darkened were life to be as brief and as uncertain as it is now. Happily, however, so that he that only reaches one hundred years will be regarded as a mere child. (See Isa. 65 : 21, 22.) And thus, as a result of their longevity, they "shall build houses and inhabit them, and they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them: they shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat; for as the days of a tree are the days of Thy people, and Mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands." Thus will the long life of the patriarchal age be restored, and (Zech. 8 : 4) "There shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, and every man with his staff in his hand for multitude of days" (margin). And, as the predicted renovation of the earth will not be confined to the Holy Land, but will extend throughout the wide world, so we may conclude that longevity will characterize the human race generally throughout the Millennium.

LIFE WILL BE EXTENDED,

But the most unique of all the renovations of the earth is that which is connected with

to more than its primitive beauty and salubrity. Before the Divine penalty was inflicted for the heinous and shameless sin of the men of Sodom, the plain was (Gen. 13 : 10) "well watered every where, even as the garden of Jehovah, like the land of Egypt." But now nothing can exceed its wildness, awfulness, and sterility; and the Arabs, some probably of Moabite descent, avoid it, as a spot which visibly wears the stamp of the Divine displeasure and curse.

But, happily, like most of the Bible lands, Edom alone excepted, the Dead Sea has a bright future when the earth shall be renovated. The prophet Ezekiel (14 : 53–55) speaks of a period when "Sodom and her daughters [or villages] shall return to their former states." The cause of this wondrous improvement is indicated by Zechariah, who intimates that from a spring which will issue from beneath the rebuilt temple of the times of Messiah (Zech. 14 : 8), "living waters shall go out from Jerusalem—half of them toward the former [or Dead] Sea, and half of them toward the hinder [or Mediterranean] Sea."

No wonder, then, that with such brilliant prospects, when earth is redeemed from the Adamic curse, that the material "creation will, by a bold figure, be called upon" (Ps. 96 : 11–13) to "be glad: let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof: let the field be joyful and all that is therein," that then in response "all the trees of the field shall rejoice." And why all this jubilant feeling? Solely because Messiah, the Second Adam, "will come to rule the world with righteousness and the nations with His truth." For even the Holy Land, which (Lev. 26 : 34) now, "as predicted, enjoys her Sabbaths and lieth desolate," shall be (Num. 8 : 21) "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God."

WHEN CONDITIONS MEET.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially reported for this Journal.)

THERE are moral forces in the world, brethren, just as there are physical forces in the world. About two years ago—not so long—I was walking on the railroad track just above my town with the pastor of our church. He was a younger man than myself. "Jones," he said,

"WE WILL HAVE A CYCLONE

this afternoon about two o'clock."

I said, "Have you gotten out your almanac yet?"

"I am not joking," he said; "don't you see how the wind has changed? Just now it was in our faces; now it's at our backs; in another minute or two it will be on our right, and then on our left. You look out about two o'clock."

Well, we went out and took dinner with my brother, and then he drove us into town in his buggy. We got back just about two o'clock. My brother was around at the back, and we heard him suddenly shout, "Look! Look! Look!" We ran out to the back door, and there was one of those fearful cyclones, carrying houses and trees and almost everything in its sweep. I stood watching it in its deathly course, and it passed just below us. It was just about four hundred yards wide, and looked like a thousand coal-burning engines chained together. I said to the pastor, "There's your cyclone."

"I will tell you why it had to come," he said; "because conditions met. Whenever conditions meet we will have a cyclone."

Now, brethren, I just want to say that wherever conditions meet you will have a moral cyclone that will uproot the evil of the whole community, and lay bare the giants of sin in the land. We don't want a small whirlwind or a little blow, but

A GRAND SPIRITUAL CYCLONE.

Let you and I go to work and get up conditions, and whenever they meet you will have a cyclone. I have seen a few of them. It is a grand sight to see a physical cyclone doing its work, but it is a grander sight to see a spiritual cyclone in operation. It is a grand sight to see the gray-headed old man, steeped in vice for seventy years, come to the stool of repentance, and throw himself on the mercy of God; and it is a grand sight to see a whole family gathered up and brought into the arms of the Church and heaven. What a grand thing to see conditions meet so that God can bless people in a spiritual cyclone! There are just as there are two sides to farming. God's side of farming is raining and shining; and man's side to farming is ploughing and hoeing and planting. There's many an old farmer now that would like to swap sides with God. He thinks it's so much easier to rain and shine than to plough and hoe. And it's much that way in religion. "O Lord!" says an old fellow, "if you will come down and quit uncleanness in me, I will do the blessing." I am so glad He won't do it—so glad He has fixed it so that you have to do the cleaning thing before He will bless you. I hear people say, "I think it is no harm to dance or play a game of cards or drink a dram." Let me tell you, since Jesus Christ took up His abode in my soul, I have drank all the whiskey and played all the cards and danced all I wanted. But, glory be to God, I have never wanted any of those things. The first man to-day is the man that dwells on religion. There is a man that does as he pleases, but he don't please to do anything but the clean thing.

I can't explain this, but, brother, come up higher. The reason these things are in your way, you need to get up a little higher. A great many people don't know

WHAT SALVATION IS.

Religion is not a gush or a sentiment or getting happy. Happiness is no more religion than my coat is Sam Jones. Salvation means loving what God loves and hating what God hates. It means: Lord God, I love the right because you love it, and because right is right; and I hate the wrong because you hate it, and because wrong is wrong. How shall I be brought into this state? Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ.

I was at a place where there were

ONLY FOUR IN THE CHURCH.

Not enough to make a quorum to do business. So I went to a neighbor, and said, "I'm mighty hard up for a few members. I wish you would join the Church." He said, "I ain't fit. I curse sometimes, drink whiskey, get sort of tipsy." "That's why I want you. I know you're an honest man, and if you join the Church you will quit that, and I'm mighty hard up for a member." The upshot of the matter was that the man and his wife joined the Church. Some time afterward the man came to me, and said, "I have been in the Church three months, and I've got no religion; but I have not cursed any nor took a drink, but I am tired of being in the Church and having no religion; and I am going to pray and do my level best; and if God lets me live till I get home I will start family prayer; I will be a class-leader, if you like—just tell me; I'm in—glory be to God!—I've got it right now!" Whenever you surrender to God and say, "Lord, here I am, for time and eternity," blessings will come down upon you, and you will realize that you are a saved man in the arms of God. That's it.

MR. C. H. SPURGEON'S ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

IN the course of some personal reminiscences recently published by Mr. Spurgeon, whose sermons appear week by week in this journal, he says: "A preserving Providence guides the lives of the Lord's people until they have finished their course. This may be ridiculed by modern sophists, who believe nothing but their own fancies; but those who behold the Lord everywhere present are not moved by their jests. It may encourage some faithful but trembling ones if I record an instance of the Lord's care toward myself.

"On Tuesday, October 26th, of this year, I preached at Bromley, in Kent, and travelled there and back in a hired carriage. While coming up one of our hills we came into

SHARP COLLISION WITH A HACK.

It was a great shaking, but we went on our way. I noticed that a wheel rattled; but there was no other apparent sign of mischief. The carriage stopped at the lodge, and I dismounted with my secretary. The coachman turned the horses round to go back to his livery stables, and there and then the carriage experienced a remarkable collapse. A wheel came off, another wheel seemed to be under the carriage, the springs snapped, and the forepart of the vehicle parted from the body of it. Why had not this happened before? We had turned two sharp corners safely; why were we not wrecked? A looker-on gave it as his reason—that it was not to be, and so it wasn't. Indisputably correct, but not all the truth. Our grateful impression was that a Divine hand had been fulfilling the word, 'He shall give His angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.'

"Full of gratitude at an escape which was all the more memorable because of certain minute circumstances, which I need not here repeat, I was led to recall two or three other special preservations experienced within a short time. A man is immortal till his work is done, and when he reaches that point it little matters by what method he is taken home. We may travel with a holy fearlessness when we have prayed the Lord to preserve our going out and our coming in; for He will surely keep us till the hour comes when we shall return to the Father's house.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Vigorous Blow at Mormonism was Struck in the House on January 12th by the passage of the Anti-Polygamy bill, which it is proposed to substitute for the Senate measure. The House bill provides that the lawful husband or wife of any person prosecuted for polygamy is a competent witness against the accused, and further provides for the registration of all marriages, making it a misdemeanor for any person to violate the provisions relative to such registration. It abolishes woman suffrage in the Territory of Utah and dissolves the financial corporations known as the Church of Latter-Day Saints and the Perpetual Emigration Fund Company, and the attorney-general is directed to wind them up by process of court. Polygamists are made ineligible to vote, and a test oath is prescribed to all persons desiring to vote that they will obey the laws of the United States, and especially the laws in respect to the crimes defined in this and the original Edmunds act.

The Passage in the Senate on Friday of the Inter-State Commerce Bill is an event the importance of which the public fully realizes. Indeed, it may be confidently affirmed that but for outside pressure the senators would not have passed it. The public, however, is by no means unanimous in approving it. In some sections there is apprehension that it will have a prejudicial effect on commerce if it becomes a law. That it is not a perfect measure, and that some sections will suffer from its operation the most zealous advocates of the bill admit, but they contend that it will not seriously injure any trade, while its general influence will be beneficial. The demand for some legislation of this character arose from the unjust discrimination of the railroads, resulting from interested persons gaining control of them. In this way monopolies, like the Standard Oil Company, have been able to build up an enormous trade through the advantage they gained over their competitors in the rates of transportation. The object of the bill is to compel the railroads to treat all shippers alike. As the abuse was recognized, the effort to remove it was approved. The real fight has been over what are called "the long and short haul clauses." Even under this bill the railroads are not compelled to charge ten times as much for carrying freight ten times the distance, but they are prohibited from continuing their present system of charging a higher rate for carrying freight a short distance than a long one. They cannot under the bill carry grain from Kansas to the coast for a smaller sum than they charge to carry it from Ohio to the coast. The bill leaves room for discrimination, but it imposes a limit. The other clause which excited opposition was the one prohibiting pooling. It does not forbid railroads to settle among themselves what uniform rate shall be fixed on the transportation of a commodity, but it prevents them from so pooling their earnings that a strong monopoly shall thrive while its competitors are frozen out. Thus the bill is designed in the interest of fair play, and so far it is to be commended. Whether its cumbrous machinery will effect its object, and whether its provisions will be evaded remains to be seen.

The Rejection of the Nomination of Mr. James C. Matthews, as Recorder of Deeds in the District of Columbia, seems to be agreed upon. The District Committee on Friday reported adversely on the nomination, and the Senate is little likely to reject the report. The fact that Republicans and Democrats are alike opposed to him has led to the inference that he is an unfit man for the post, and that the opposition does not spring from party feeling. On the other hand, lawyers assert that Matthews is well qualified, and that while he has had control of the office there has been no decrease in its efficiency. It is suspected that the apparent unanimity of opposition is due to the fact that Democratic senators dislike him on account of his color, and Republicans who do not object to a colored man being in office are annoyed that any colored man should be a Democrat, and are not willing that he should derive any benefit from the combination.

The Death of General William B. Hazen, the Chief of the Signal Service, occurred on Sunday. He had been in ill-health for some time, but no danger was apprehended. He attended the President's reception on Thursday, and caught a cold, which aggravated the disease of the kidneys from which he suffered. Diabetes developed on Saturday, and by Sunday noon it was evident that he could not recover. He sank rapidly, and died about eight o'clock. General Hazen was fifty-seven years of age, having been born in Vermont in 1830. The family removed to Ohio during his infancy, and he was identified with that State thereafter. He was admitted to West Point in 1851, saw some Indian fighting in Texas, in which he distinguished himself, and was made captain at the outbreak of the war in 1861. He took part in many important battles, and rose to the rank of colonel. After the war he travelled in Europe, and was with the Prussian army during the siege of Paris. In 1880 he was made Chief of the Signal Service by Mr. Hayes, but in that position he did not add to his fame.

The German Reichstag has Rejected the Appeal for the increase of the army demanded by Prince Bismarck, and has been dissolved. On January 14th the amendment limiting the action of the bill to three years instead of seven came to the vote, and was carried by 186 to 154. The chamber was about to proceed to the consideration of the next clause when Prince Bismarck rose and intimated that it was unnecessary. Taking a document from his portfolio, he read a decree of the Emperor dismissing the Reichstag. It had been prepared in anticipation of the adverse vote, or it may be that Bismarck has always the loaded weapon on hand to use when he may deem it advisable to terminate the existence of the Reichstag. The elections of the new Reichstag will take place on February 21st, and the time is sure to be one of intense excitement. The members knew perfectly well what would be the result of their action. Both Bismarck and Moltke in their speeches warned them that the Government intended to have the extra 41,000 men for seven years, as demanded, and would not submit to opposition. The blunt terms in which the warning was expressed may have had an influence in determining the result. The Reichstag could not with self-respect see itself degraded into a mere machine for registering the edicts of absolutism, and that was the position to which Bismarck assigned it. Even in the face of the hostile vote the enlistment is to commence as if the decision of the Reichstag had been in favor of the measure.

Lord Iddesleigh, Ex-Secretary of State of Great Britain, died suddenly on January 12th. He had called on Lord Salisbury to pay a farewell visit in his official character, Lord Salisbury having removed him from office, and was sitting in the ante-room when he was seized with apoplexy, and died in a few minutes. The deceased statesman, who was better known as Sir Stafford Northcote, was known to feel his removal from office acutely, and as he was a sufferer from heart disease, his chagrin is believed to have hastened his end. He was sixty-nine years old. He was at one time Mr. Gladstone's private secretary. He first attained prominence under Sir Robert Peel. The journals of both parties and the public generally speak of him with profound respect and deplore his death.

The Policy of the British Government in dealing with Ireland is having disastrous results. The landlords, encouraged by the firm attitude assumed by the Government, are pressing for the rents, and are making wholesale evictions. The number of paupers has increased with alarming rapidity. There are now more than seven hundred thousand persons wholly or partially supported at the public expense. This is an increase of about three hundred thousand over the number at this time last year. Most of them are evicted tenants. Twenty-five were evicted on one estate on Friday. One of them was a sick woman, who was carried out of the house, and was left in a dying condition in the yard. The police assisted in the eviction, and with loaded rifles pointed at the house, threatened to fire on the tenants if they did not vacate the house. Another woman vainly begged to be allowed to shelter her sick child in a hut. She was driven away, but a neighbor permitted her to put the child in a vacant pig-sty, which she did, protecting it from the bitter cold with straw. In one case the people in a house could not be dislodged, and the bailiffs set fire to the house. These atrocities occurred last week on the Winn estates at Glenbeigh, County Kerry.

An Ovation to Mr. Henry M. Stanley was tendered to him in London on Thursday last, previous to his setting out to rescue Emin Pacha. The freedom of the city was conferred upon the distinguished explorer. The ceremony took place in the council chamber of the Guildhall, and a most enthusiastic reception was accorded to the guest by a brilliant company. After the freedom had been conferred a banquet was given to Mr. Stanley at the Mansion House. Among those present were Cardinal Manning, the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, Lord Wolseley, Lord Napier, of Magdala; General Lord Chelmsford, and General Graham. Mr. Stanley, in replying to a toast, said that he had decided to take the route by way of the Congo River as the best and most expeditious for the relief of Emin Pacha. Passage might be forced by other routes, but he pointed out that after the caravans had passed along them all these routes would be closed, while the Congo would always be open.

Rev. M. Baxter will Preach next Sunday morning, afternoon, and evening in Philadelphia, in the City Institute Hall, corner of Eighteenth and Chestnut streets, upon: "Coming great wars and earthquakes during the next thirteen years before the year 1900, great religious revivals, second advent of Christ, and resurrection and ascension of Christians, without dying; England's loss of Ireland and India, and conquest of Germany by France in 1887-89, changing twenty-three kingdoms into Daniel's predicted Franco-Roman Confederacy of ten kingdoms prior to the Napoleonic Antichrist's seven years' covenant with the Jews (Daniel 7 : 24, and 9 : 27); the spread of socialism, communism, nihilism, anarchy, spiritulism, culminating in the great tribulation and Antichrist's massacre of myriads of Christians during three and a half years, and then the millennium of one thousand years."

Mr. William Noble has Returned to America from his Australian tour. During his journey, which has occupied twelve months, he has held large meetings at various places in New Zealand, New South Wales, Victoria, and Queensland. Numerous invitations to speak in several States awaited his arrival in America but having received despatches from England, informing him of the serious illness of Mrs. Noble, he has been obliged to decline them and hasten his departure home. He expects to sail for England on Saturday next by the Umbria. The only public engagement he has been able to accept was to speak at Frankfort, Pa., the place at which Mr. Gough was stricken down last year On Saturday last he paid a visit to Mrs. Gough at her home at Hillside, Mass.

The Rev. and Mrs. W. F. ReQua have Commenced work at McAllister, Ind. Terr. They write hopefully of their prospects of success among the Indians. Mr. ReQua preaches and visits over a circle around McAllister of considerable extent. At present he has to walk to all his stations, but hopes that in some way he may obtain a horse, which would save time and enable him to reach other stations Of course, as he anticipated, the privations and hardships attending his mission are extreme. Cold and exposure have caused illness in his family, and at times they have been in want of food and fuel. Any help that can be sent to him by his friends who encouraged him in his undertaking will be doubly welcome if sent at once while the severe weather continues.

Revival Services Are Being Held with Encouraging results at North Tiverton, R. I. The Rev. Arthur Jones, the young pastor of the Primitive Methodist Church in that place, commenced them two weeks ago, and the blessing of God has been upon them from the beginning. Meetings have been held every night, and conversions have taken place at every service. The work is spreading, especially among non-churchgoers.

The Rev. Sam Jones Commenced His Two weeks' mission in Boston, Mass., on Sunday last. There has been some anxiety about this work, the preacher's strong language and disregard of grammar being thought likely to obstruct his success in the "home of culture." Sunday's services, however, gave no indications of such effects. In the morning Tremont Church was crowded to the doors, and at night seven thousand persons tried to get into the People's Church to hear him.

The Eleventh Anniversary of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Department of the Young Men's Christian Association was held on January 9th, at the Fayette Street Methodist Church, in Baltimore, Md. This is one of the most vigorous and efficient branches of the work in this country, and its influence reaches far and wide. The directors and other officials of the railroad speak in strong terms of the beneficial results of its work on the employés. The report of the past year is a most encouraging one, showing that the Association is growing rapidly and becoming increasingly useful. A new building for its use is about to be erected. The Association has purchased an eligible site, and has three thousand dollars in bank toward the cost of building. Mr. W. H. Morriss, the efficient General Secretary, is making strong efforts to raise the money still required to make the new building one worthy of its object.

"Knocking Out Satan" is the Caption under which Ben Hogan's meetings at Fresno, Cal., are described in the Fresno Republican. That journal, which is apparently better adapted to describe the pugilistic exploits in which Mr. Hogan formerly distinguished himself than his present occupation, nevertheless speaks in terms of praise of his earnestness and of the crowds that listen to him. It says: "Mr. Hogan speaks extemporaneously, and while he is not mindful of the rules of grammar, he is earnest, forcible, and logical. He draws his illustrations from every-day life and experience, emphasizes with easy gestures which at times are quite impressive. Notwithstanding his quaint, odd sentences and homely phrases, the good sense and magnetism of the man entertain and hold his audience, and leave behind a good impression."

An Objection to Prayer was Explained by a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania on January 12th. In moving that the custom of opening the House with prayer be dispensed with, he said he did not make the motion because he was opposed to prayer. The Legislature proposed to force upon the people a prohibition amendment to the Constitution, which would be an abomination in the sight of God, and it would be little less than sacrilegious to have the proceedings of a body which proposed to do this opened with prayer. God had sanctified the use of wine, and it would be an abomination to abolish its use. It would appear that the legislator was perfectly consistent. A man who desires the perpetuation of the liquor traffic, and at the same time believes in the efficacy of prayer, is quite logical in proposing to dispense with it (Mark 11 : 23, 24).

A Huge Crash at Niagara Falls is Reported. On Thursday last more than two hundred thousand cubic yards of limestone and slate rock fell out of the bank of the river, near Horseshoe Falls, on the Canada side. The mass fell with a tremendous crash, which was heard and felt for miles around. The break has considerably changed the appearance of the bank. The main rock is now a perpendicular wall. The tremendous weight of ice which has accumulated during the past three weeks with the steady frosty weather and low water was the cause of the break. The rock looked firm, and might have been expected to continue as it was for centuries, but a mere change of weather sufficed to cast it down. Those who scoff at the wonders which prophecy shows will occur in the near future, and tell us that the day of miracles is past, forget what boundless resources God has at His command which can produce marvellous results without resorting to miracle (II Peter 3 : 4–7).

A Boston Chinaman Expressed His Appreciation of the benefits of a church connection recently in characteristic terms. A Christian lady of that city, who has earnestly and prayerfully labored to carry the Gospel to the Mongolian laundrymen around her, at length succeeded in getting one of them to attend Sunday-school and church regularly. The man was attentive and well behaved, and the lady had great hopes of him. She tried to interest others in his welfare, too, and induced her friends to patronize his laundry. Visiting him at his home a few days ago, she received a warm welcome. John gave her to understand that he enjoyed very much attending the Sunday-school, information that was exceedingly gratifying. Anxious, however, to receive more practical demonstration of the influence of the school upon him, she asked him if he did not think it did him good. "Yi, yi!" came the convincing response, "washee fol le whole conglogation." The Chinaman's idea of getting good is not an uncommon one; unhappily, it is the motive of many a church connection (II Pet. 2 : 2, 3).

How Prisoners of War Escaped from Mexican prisons has been explained in connection with the death of Colonel L. Stanislaus Hargous, who expired at his home in New York two weeks ago. In 1846 and for twenty years afterward Colonel Hargous was the most prominent American citizen residing in Vera Cruz, Mexico. He carried on an extensive banking and shipping business, and accumulated a large fortune. When Colonel Hargous first settled in Vera Cruz there were a large number of Texas prisoners of war confined at the fortress of Perote, in Mexico. From time to time some of them escaped and reached Vera Cruz. They always found in Colonel Hargous a ready and generous friend, who aided them with his means and with the facilities which his shipping interest afforded for their escape to the United States. This he did at the risk of ruin to himself, and the risk was increased by the ungrateful carelessness of some of those whom he aided, who exposed his dangerous kindness through the New Orleans press. Notwithstanding this, Colonel Hargous continued the work, and through the help rendered by him many more prisoners were enabled to reach their homes. It is not of this form of "ungrateful carelessness" on the part of prisoners released from Satan's bondage that Christ has to complain. Too often their ingratitude is shown in silence, when they ought to declare everywhere what their Deliverer has done for them (Luke 8 : 39).

An Absent-Minded Bridegroom Caused Some amusement in a Georgia town recently. He had been regarded by his friends as a confirmed bachelor, and it surprised them to learn that he was going to be married. He seemed unable to realize it himself. His first blunder was made when the minister was performing the marriage ceremony. When it became his duty to place the ring on the bride's finger, he drew a silver quarter from his pocket, and handed it to her, to the consternation and confusion of all parties. That afternoon, when he embarked on the train with his bride for a tour, and the conductor came around for tickets, the groom found that he had bought only one ticket, forgetting that he had doubled his expenses and responsibilities that day. The forgetfulness in this case was simply amusing, but it becomes painful and injurious when it is displayed, as it too often is, by men who have entered into new spiritual relations. It is a common reproach against the Church that no difference can be seen in the habits and lives of men who have been converted (Eph. 4 : 22–25).

The Practice Known as "Swearing Off," which is common about New Year's, is the cause of many disappointments and much humiliation. An indulgence, a bad habit, or a weakness against which conscience protests, is apt to be broken off at the commencement of a new year and good resolutions formed. Then follows a period of struggle, and sometimes before the end of the first month of the year, the good resolutions are broken and the man is living as before. The editor of a contemporary states that he has received a letter from a subscriber who has suffered in this way, and who finding he had never been able to keep his resolutions, informed him that he had started this year without making any. The editor thinks the devil rejoiced at this result, as, while he likes the man who makes good resolutions and breaks them, he likes still better the man who does not make any. Possibly some of our own readers are in like case—disheartened and despairing. If there are any such we trust they will adopt the apostolic suggestion, which is a more excellent way than that adopted by our contemporary's correspondent (Jude 24).

A Monkey at Church Caused some Excitement for the officers on January 9th. When the janitor of Grace Church, Providence, R. I., opened the building for morning service a big, ringtail monkey from an adjoining dime museum presented himself and indicated an intention to remain. The janitor was opposed to the project, as the monkey would get no good from the service, and might disturb the congregation. He chased the animal from one part of the edifice to another, but could not catch him. The nimble creature climbed pillars, hung to cornices, and explored the highest parts of the grand organ. Six policemen and a number of the members of the church assisted in the chase, but without success. The policemen wanted to shoot, but the janitor objected. The creature was eventually captured by strategy. A number of tarts and candies were temptingly displayed, and the monkey, unable to resist the temptation, fell into an ambush. It is not to be supposed that the monkey had heard of the theories of the evolutionists, and was desirous of attending the service on that ground. It was doubtless a pure mischievous frolic on his part. As he was captured and removed Satan would have to find some other means of distracting the thoughts of the congregation, and he was probably successful, as he usually is (Matt. 13 : 19).

THE MASTER-KEY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good."—GENESIS 32 : 12.

The Great Difference between Two Races of Men—Possession or Non-Possession of a God—Jacob and Esau—Jacob Driven to his God by Trouble—How he Pleaded—God's Promise the Sinew of his Prayer—His Example—I. A Memorial—God's Words to be Cherished—General Gordon's Practice—No Monopoly in the Promises—II. God's Bond—Held by His Truth—By His Immutability—His Power—III. Our Plea—In Spite of Unworthiness—In Present Danger—How to Plead.

THE possession of a God, or the non-possession of a God, makes the greatest possible difference between man and man. Esau is a princely being, but he is "a profane person." Jacob is a weak, fallible, frail creature, but he has a God. Have you not heard of "the mighty God of Jacob"? There are many wise, careful, prudent men of the world who have no God; and truly these in the highest sense, like the young lions, do lack, and suffer hunger; for their highest nature is left to famish. Those who wait upon the Lord are often very simple, and devoid of ability and policy, but they shall not lack any good thing: their highest nature is well supplied from heavenly sources. This is the great which people the world: I mean the sons of men who say in their hearts, "No God," and the sons of God, the twice-born, who have received new life, and therefore with heart and flesh cry out for God, even the living God. Because Jacob had a God, therefore he went to Him in the hour of his trouble. He did not know how he should escape from his injured and angry brother Esau. In fact, he believed that Esau was come on purpose to cut him up, root and branch: and so, after doing the best he could, Jacob looked to his best Friend and Helper, and cried unto his God. I am afraid that many professed Christians place their God afar off, and never dream of repairing to Him for practical succor in the hour of danger. Poor Jacob, in the calmer days of his life, had failed to walk with his God, as his father Abraham had done; but now a storm has overtaken him, and he flies to the Lord his God.

Dear friend, art thou in trouble at this time, and hast thou a God? Then go to Him in prayer at once, and spread thy case before Him. Hast thou a Rab-shakeh's letter in the house? Go, like Hezekiah, and spread it before the Lord. Hast thou a dying child? Then cry to the Lord as David did.

Make thou good use of thy God, and especially gain the fullest advantage from Him by pleading with Him in prayer. In troublous times, our best communion with God will be carried on by supplication. Tell Him thy case; search out His promise, and then plead it with holy boldness. This is the best, the surest, the speediest way of relief.

Beloved, we see that Jacob had a God, and that he made use of Him in prayer; but the point I want to call your attention to at this time is, that the stress, the force, consisted in his pleading the promise of God with God. When he came to real wrestling with the Lord, then he cried, "Thou saidst." That is the way to lay a hold upon the covenant angel—"Thou saidst." The art of wrestling lies much in a proper use of "Thou saidst." Jacob, with all his mistakes, was a master of the art of prayer: we justly call him "wrestling Jacob." He said, "I will not let thee go." "Thou saidst" is a good grip with which to hold an honest man, and not less does it lay hold on our faithful God. This will have power over any person in whom is truth; for he that speaks truly will not run back from his promise. When we come to pleading terms with God, there is nothing that so helps us as to be able to quote the promise, and plead, "Thou saidst."

THE SINEW OF JACOB'S PRAYER

In handling my text, which was Jacob's prayer, I shall notice, first, that it ought to be our memorial; and, secondly, that it is God's bond; and, thirdly, that therefore we may make it our plea.

I. First, it ought to be

OUR MEMORIAL.

I mean, dear friends, that we ought to recollect, much more than we do, what God has said. The Lord has spoken often from the foundations of the world by His prophets, and in these last days by His Son; and we are bound to guard jealously every single word which He has thus given to us. He has preserved His own words in the Scriptures; let us also preserve them in our hearts. No subjects in the world can be so worthy of the consideration, the memory, and the reverence of man as those upon which his Maker has deigned to give instruction. The choicest communications ever made to human minds are those which have come from the great Father. I ask you, therefore, brothers and sisters, if I say not rightly that God's divine "Thou hast said" should be our memorial?

We ought to do this, first, with regard to what God hath said. You notice that Jacob puts it, "Thou saidst," and then he quotes the words—"Surely I will do thee good." It is an essential part of the education of a Christian to learn the promises. I always admire that fact in the life of who, whatever mistakes he made, was a grand believer, a very Abraham among us in these latter days—that he always carried with him that little book called Clark's "Precious Promises," which is an arrangement of the various promises of the Old and New Testaments under different heads. The General used to consult that collection of divine promises, and seek out that holy text which best suited his particular condition; then he sought solitude, and pleaded before the Lord that inspired Word, believing that it was true, and that the Lord would do as He had said. By faith he looked for an answer, and acted upon it. He went down through the Soudan alone, as you know, daring all manner of dangers because he believed in God. The heroism of his life grew out of his confidence in the promises. If we would be heroes, here is the food with which to sustain a noble life.

I would have all Christian people know God's promises. If you had in your house a number of cheques which you believed to be good, I do not suppose that you would long be unaware of their nature and value. Will you know your earthly wealth, and never consider your heavenly riches? In the Bible there are "exceeding great and precious promises;" shall it be said that some of God's children do not know what those promises contain? What a pity it would be for a trader to be short of money, and to have a draft, for a large amount, but not to know where to find it! It would be would it not? Is it not a shameful thing to be dealing with God in a like slovenly fashion? Brethren, I would that we studied God's Word much more. If thou art well instructed in it, it shall be well with thee. "Surely," say you, "God, who spoke thus to Jacob, or thus to Daniel, or thus to Paul, finding me in the same condition, speaks also thus to me, for the promises are not of private interpretation. They are not allotments hedged in for individuals, but they are a wide and open common, which is the undisputed property of all believers. They are not confined to those to whom they were first spoken, but they reach also to us who are fellow-heirs with them."

Beloved, I say to you, one and all, study much the promises of God's Word! Have them at your fingers' ends. Remember what things God has said to men, and when He has said them, and to what kind of men He has said them, and discover by this means how far He has said them to you. Let this indeed be the forefront of your knowledge. If you cannot read the stars, yet read the promises. If you cannot study the stone book of geology, yet know the Rock of Ages, and the declarations engraven thereon. If you remain a stranger to the deep things of metaphysics and philosophy, yet at least know the household privileges of the family of God. Dear child, do know what your Father has said! It will be very sad if you do not. Happy heir of heaven, do you know what it is to which you are an heir according to the promises and the covenant!

II. Secondly, "Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good"—this is GOD'S BOND.

Nothing holds a man like his word, and nothing so fully fixes the course of action of the Lord our God as His own promise. What a mighty thing, then, is a promise, since it is a bond which holds God Himself! How does it do so? I answer, it holds Him, first, by His truth. If a man says, "I will," it is not in his power, without a breach of truth, to refuse to make good his word. If a promise be made by one man to another, it is considered to be a matter of honor to fulfil it. Unless a man is willing to tarnish his honor, and disgrace his truthfulness, he will certainly do as He has solemnly promised to do. Learn, then, when you are praying to God, whether you be saint or sinner, to take the promise, and say, "O my God, thou hast bound Thyself to give me this blessing, for thou hast said that thou wilt do so, and I know Thou canst not lie! I am sure that Thou wilt do even as Thou hast said, for Thou art a God of truth!" The promise is God's gracious bond, since His truthfulness cannot be put in question.

But, next, he who enters into an engagement is bound to keep his word, or he is considered to be vacillating and changeable: the Lord is, therefore, held by His immutability. He is God, and changes not. We hear persons say, "I have changed my mind;" but God is of one mind, and who can turn him? Change is written upon all human things; but hearken to the Eternal—"I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed." Ages make no difference to Him. His promise is as fresh and unfading as when first He caused it to delight the eyes of His chosen. But sometimes men make a promise, and they are unable to fulfil it from want of power. Many a time it has cost honest minds great grief to feel that, though they are willing enough to do what they have engaged to do, yet they have lost their ability to perform their word. This is to a sincere mind. This can never happen to the Almighty God. He fainteth not, neither is weary. The Lord cannot possibly withdraw from His Word through inability; for "with God all things are possible." Therefore, go to Him in prayer, and take His promise, and say, "Lord, be pleased to help Thy servant, for I know that Thou canst deliver me, and I trust in Thee as God All-sufficient!"

Once more, the Lord's wisdom also holds him to His promise. Men make engagements thoughtlessly, and before long they realize that it would be ruinous to keep them. It is foolish to keep a foolish promise. Yet, because wisdom is not in us we make mistakes, and find ourselves in serious difficulties. It may so happen that a person may feel compelled to say, "I promised to do that which, upon more careful consideration, I find it would be wicked and unjust for me to do." Whatever justification an erring man may find in his folly to excuse him from fulfilling his rash promise, nothing of the kind can occur with God. He never speaks without knowledge, for He sees the end from the beginning, and He is infallibly good and wise. Therefore, again I say unto you, what a hold we have upon God because of His character!

I should not, however, complete my statement if I did not add that to go to God through Jesus Christ, is to use the best and most powerful of pleas. The great God will deny nothing to Jesus. For His sake He will give us all things. When we bring His Son in the arms of our faith, and lay Him before the Father, we may have whatsoever we need. Let us not be slow to use this august plea. Let not our Lord Jesus have to say to us, "Hitherto ye have asked nothing in My name."

III. So then, last of all, this may be, and this ought to be, in prayer as it was Jacob's plea—even this—"Thou saidst." We may urge the gracious promise of the Lord as pleading against our own unworthiness. Listen to Jacob's cry, "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which Thou hast shewed unto Thy servant; but Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good." Is not that splendid pleading? This must win the suit. If a man has made me a promise, he cannot refuse to keep it on the ground that I am unworthy; because it is his own character that is at stake, not mine. However unworthy I am, he must not prove himself to be unworthy by failing to keep his word. "If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himself." Everything hinges upon the character of the Promiser. Do you not see this?

This is also good pleading as against our present danger. See how Jacob puts it with regard to his own peril. He says, "Deliver me, I pray Thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau: for I fear him, lest he will come and smite me, and the mother with the children. And Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good." This reminds one of the plea of Moses, when he asked, "What will the Egyptians say?" If Israel were destroyed in the wilderness, what would Jehovah do for his great name? This is a prevalent argument.

Brethren, what is your present trouble? One sighs out because he knows not where to look for food and raiment. But there is a Word of the Lord for that need: "No good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly." There is another, "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee;" and another, "Bread shall be given him; his waters shall be sure." Can you not go to the living God with these words of His upon your tongue, and beg Him to be as good as His promise? Say in so many words, "Lord, I am afraid that, if I am much longer without a situation, I shall not have shoes to my feet, nor bread for my children, and I shall be brought to a condition of utter penury; and yet Thou hast said, 'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee!' Lord, I plead that promise!" See whether the Lord does not deliver you.

Do you ask me, "Are you sure that God will keep His Word?" I answer, Yes.

I WILL BE BOUND FOR HIM

at any time, and in any place. Many children of God are in sore distress. I do not know how low He may let them go, but I do know that they shall never go lower than that word: "Underneath are the everlasting arms." I cannot say with David, "I have been young, and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread;" for I have seen his seed begging bread, and I expect to see it again. If the seed of the righteous misbehave themselves, they shall beg their bread as other people have to do. But I can say, "I have been young, and I am now in middle life; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken; no, not so much as once!" The Lord will not turn His back on His friends, nor suffer those who trust in Him to be forsaken.

I beg to bear my witness, as far as my experience goes, that the shortest way out of trouble is pleading with God. Straightforward makes the best runner. You may go round about, and round about, and round about, and come at nothing; but go straight to God about the business, and if He does not end it, then it is not to be ended, but is meant to go on, and work out a higher good. In any case, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee: He shall never suffer the righteous to be moved." Try you that promise, and you shall find it cover you with armor of light.

Once more, as to future blessedness. Jacob used this argument, "Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good," as to all for he went on to say, "Thou saidst, I will make thy seed as the sand of the sea, which cannot be numbered for multitude." Not as much as he should, but still in a measure Jacob lived in the future. He lived under the influence and expectation of the covenant blessing. Now, brethren, what hope have you and I of getting to heaven? None, except that the Lord has said, "I give unto My sheep eternal life; and they shall never perish." All our hope of the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the reward which He will give His saints in the day of His manifestation—all our hopes of the crown of life that fadeth not away, and of the beatific vision—all depend on "Thou hast said." We, according to His promise, look for a new heaven and a new earth.

I have done when I have just mentioned, in as brief a way as ever I can, two or three of the things which God has said, and which I want some of you to plead.

Is there one here who wants to find salvation to-night? I invite you to go home, enter your chamber, shut to the door, get down your Bible, and open on this passage (Isaiah 55:7): "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon."

Now I imagine that I see you in your little room; and if you do as I wish you to do, you will read the words carefully and thoughtfully, and then say, "Lord, I am one of these wicked ones! This night I desire to forsake my way. I will have done with it. This night I desire, unrighteous as I am, to forsake my thoughts, and return unto Thee. Now, Thou hast said, 'I will have mercy upon him: I will abundantly pardon him.' Lord, have mercy upon me, and abundantly pardon me, for Thou hast said it!" When you have thus prayed, expect the Lord to keep the promise. When you look an honest man in the face, and say, "You promised it," you expect him to be even so expect that God in Christ Jesus will fulfil His Word. Do not doubt. Believe God, and expect the pardon and the blessing.

Next, O tried child of God, I want you to go home, and open your Bible at Psalm 50:15. Put it down on a bit of paper, will you? Read, "Call upon Me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify Me." Put your finger on that text, and then kneel down, and say, "Lord, here I am calling upon Thee! It is a day of trouble: deliver me, that I may glorify Thee." Believe that God means His promise, and is not trifling with you. On the other hand, do not trifle with His Word; but make business of it, and wait upon the Lord to have His promise made good.

Is there a poor soul here seeking salvation, who cannot get at either of these promises? Then go home, and look up John 3:18: "He that believeth on Him is not condemned." Go and plead that, and say, "I do believe on Jesus Christ, and therefore I am not condemned. Lord, give me to feel the peace which comes of Thy justifying grace!" If that Scripture does not suit you, there is one more, upon which I myself lived for months in the day of my self-despair. It is found in Romans 10:13: "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." I recollect getting hold of that passage, and feeling that it was a door of hope to my soul.

Dost thou believe that God speaks the truth? If thou dost, thou hast living faith within thee. Canst thou trust God to keep His promise? If thou canst, the work of grace has already begun in thy soul. Thou art no dead sinner any longer. Thou art not under condemnation. "He that believeth on Him hath everlasting life." Thou hast a measure of that everlasting life within thee at this moment, because thou hast a measure of faith in God. Oh, for power now to turn that faith to practical use by an earnest, pleading prayer! "Lord, do as Thou hast said!" Such a prayer will soon bring peace and rest to your soul.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

PROCLAMATION OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.*

THERE was presented a most extraordinary spectacle [on Sept. 4, 1870, at the Palais Bourbon, where the Legislature was sitting. It had been hurriedly convoked by the Empress on receipt of tidings from the front of French reverses]. A part of a regiment of the line had been brought hurriedly into the yard, and had formed across it, and were loading their muskets. Behind them and in the street, and rushing through the gates and up the front steps of the building, was a vast mass of excited people and the National Guard, who had fraternized—the guard having their muskets butt end upward, as a token of friendship. It was evident that there had been collusion between the people who were on the steps of the Palais Bourbon and the National Guard in the Place de la Concorde, on the other side of the river; for it was upon the signal of the people on the steps that the guard and the people broke through the military force that was holding the bridge. As the crowd mounted the steps of the Palais Bourbon it was received with terrific cheers and shouts of "Vive la Republique" and "Deposition." . . .

Leaving the Chamber, we went at once to the Hôtel de Ville. The number of people assembled there was enormous, and we found the same fraternization existing between them and the National Guard as elsewhere. The building had been invaded by the people, and all the windows fronting on the square were filled with rough and dirty-looking men and boys. Soon we heard a terrific shout go up. Rochefort was being drawn in a cab by a multitude through the crowd. He was ghastly pale; he stood up in the vehicle, covered with sashes of red, white, and blue, waving his hat in answer to the acclamations. As he was slowly hauled through the multitude to the main door of the Hôtel de Ville, the delirium seemed to have reached its height, and it is impossible to describe the frantic acclamations which were heard.

At precisely four o'clock and forty-five minutes in the afternoon, as I marked it by the great clock in the tower of the Hôtel de Ville, at one of the windows appeared Gambetta; a little behind him stood Jules Favre and Emanuel Arago; and then and there, on that historic spot, I heard Gambetta proclaim the Republic of France. That proclamation was received with every possible demonstration of enthusiasm. Lists were thrown out of the window, containing the names of the members of the provisional government. Ten minutes afterward Raspail and Rochefort appeared at another window and embraced each other, while the crowd loudly applauded them. During this time the public were occupying the Tuileries, from which the Empress had just escaped. Sixty thousand human beings had rolled toward the palace, completely levelling all obstacles; the vestibule was invaded, and in the court-yard, on the other side of the Place du Carrousel, were to be seen soldiers of every arm, who, in the presence of the people, removed the cartridges from their guns, and who were greeted by the cries, "Long live the nation!" "Down with the Bonapartes!" "To Berlin!" etc. During all this time there was no pillage, no havoc, no destruction of property, and the crowd soon retired, leaving the palace under the protection of the National Guard.

* From Scribner's Magazine. It is written by the Hon. E. B. Washburne, who in 1870 was United States Minister to France. The protection of German citizens resident in France when the war with Germany broke out, was confided to him; he was therefore a very prominent person in Paris, and was notified by the Government of every change in the position of affairs. This article describes the stirring events which took place in Paris between June and September, 1870, and is illustrated with pictures of scenes in the streets and portraits of the Frenchmen who were at that time the leaders in public affairs. The magazine contains besides this, eleven articles, among them an interesting article on "The Babylonian Seals," by Dr. William Hayes Ward, and an able article on Socialism, by Francis A. Walker. It is profusely illustrated and is, typographically, all that could be desired. The unequivocal verdict of the public on its merits is the fact that 140,000 copies of the first number have been sold. Launching the Life-Boat.

Some discussion had been raised at the Hôtel de Ville about changing the flag, but Gambetta declared that the tri-color was the flag of 1792–93, and that under it France had been, and yet would be, led to victory. From the Hôtel de Ville Mr. Eustis and myself went back to the Chamber of Deputies, to find it still in the possession of the people. From there I returned to my legation, which I reached at half-past six o'clock in the evening. In a few brief hours of a Sabbath day I had seen a dynasty fall and a republic proclaimed, and all without the shedding of one drop of blood.

LAUNCHING THE LIFE-BOAT.

(See Illustration.)

THE melancholy incident reported in these columns last week is happily exceptional in the life-boat service. All that science has suggested has been applied, with the object of rendering these boats safe. A large measure of success has attended the effort, for a life-boat will live in a sea that would swamp any other craft. But as was shown in the wreck on the Virginia coast, safety has not yet been attained.

The life-saving corps are well aware of this fact, and they know that when they go out for the rescue of a shipwrecked crew they are putting their own lives in imminent peril. To their honor and the honor of humanity, be it said, that they are not deterred by the knowledge. As with the fire brigades of our great cities, so with the life-boats on our coasts, the service is never crippled by lack of men. The work of rescuing lives from peril has a fascination for men of noble character, and attracts brave souls to the ranks. They do not underrate the danger, perhaps few men know better than they just what the danger is; but they never shrink. They enter the boat eagerly, disinterestedly, with no hope of large reward; but seeing their fellow-creatures in peril, they venture their lives to effect their deliverance. It is a noble work.

Did we rightly estimate how much greater is the value of the soul than the body, and how infinitely more terrible is it for the soul to be lost, a calamity irretrievable, it might be said of the Lord's service as of the lifeboat service that there is no lack of men. Were that awful fact realized by the Church we should see no Christian man immersed in business, giving all his time and talents and energies to the work of accumlating a big fortune, contenting himself with attendance at church and occasional gifts as his conception of his duty. Every man would be laboring and praying for the one object, of rescuing perishing souls.

JENNY OF THE DUST-HEAPS.

IT was hard work and repulsive work at that. All day long, from sunrise to sunset, Jenny Ingram was on the heap of refuse, sifting, sifting, sifting, wearily hour by hour. The contents of the ash-barrels and the sweepings of the streets —dirt of every kind was brought to this place and dumped there. The heap contained cinders, ashes, paper, bones, rags, and rubbish of all kinds. But the men who owned the heap knew how to make money out of rubbish, if only they had enough of it. Jenny was one of the troop of women and girls who helped them to make the money. The duty she and her companions undertook was to separate the heaps into their component parts.

The heap of filthy refuse after it had passed through their hands became a dozen smaller heaps, one of which was cinders, that laundresses would buy; another was rags, that brought a good price at the paper-makers; another was ashes, which brickmakers would pay for. Then there were medicine-bottles and other odds and ends that would find a market, while the residuum—the dirt pure and simple—could be disposed of to builders and road contractors.

But what filthy work it was! No one would work at it who was not hard-pressed for an occupation, and it was so poorly paid that the women had to live in tenement-houses, where four, and sometimes more shared a single room. There they lived amid moral filth far more injurious than the material filth that clung about their garments. Unhappily Jenny and her companions were not troubled about either kind.

Jenny's mother worked there. She was vaguely understood to have "seen better days," and she used to speak scornfully of the work; but she was glad to get it, for since her husband died nothing but that stood between her and starvation. And it enabled her to get the drop of rum which now was all she cared for in life. Jenny, however, knew nothing about those better days, and could not realize how delightful it must have been to live as her mother used to do, in a house all to themselves with a garden before it, in which real flowers grew. She had played about the heaps as a child, and was quite willing to work there as soon as she was big enough, and she had worked there ever since. No one concerned himself about her moral and spiritual welfare, so Jenny grew up in the scene of filth pretty much like the others, and was likely to end as her mother was ending, at a stage in which the only light and comfort was the daily modicum of rum.

But a hand was interposed, and Jenny's whole life was changed, as was that of many others. The change came suddenly. Jenny saw nothing in that morning more than in other mornings to indicate that it would bring the dawn of a new existence. She sallied forth before sunrise with her mother, a handkerchief tied about her head, to keep the dust out of her long, thick masses of hair, and the old piece of carpet tied round her waist to do duty as an apron. When they reached the wharf where the dust heaps were, they set to work on a new cargo just brought in by a tow-boat, a man shovelling the dirt while the women deftly sifted it and separated the materials.

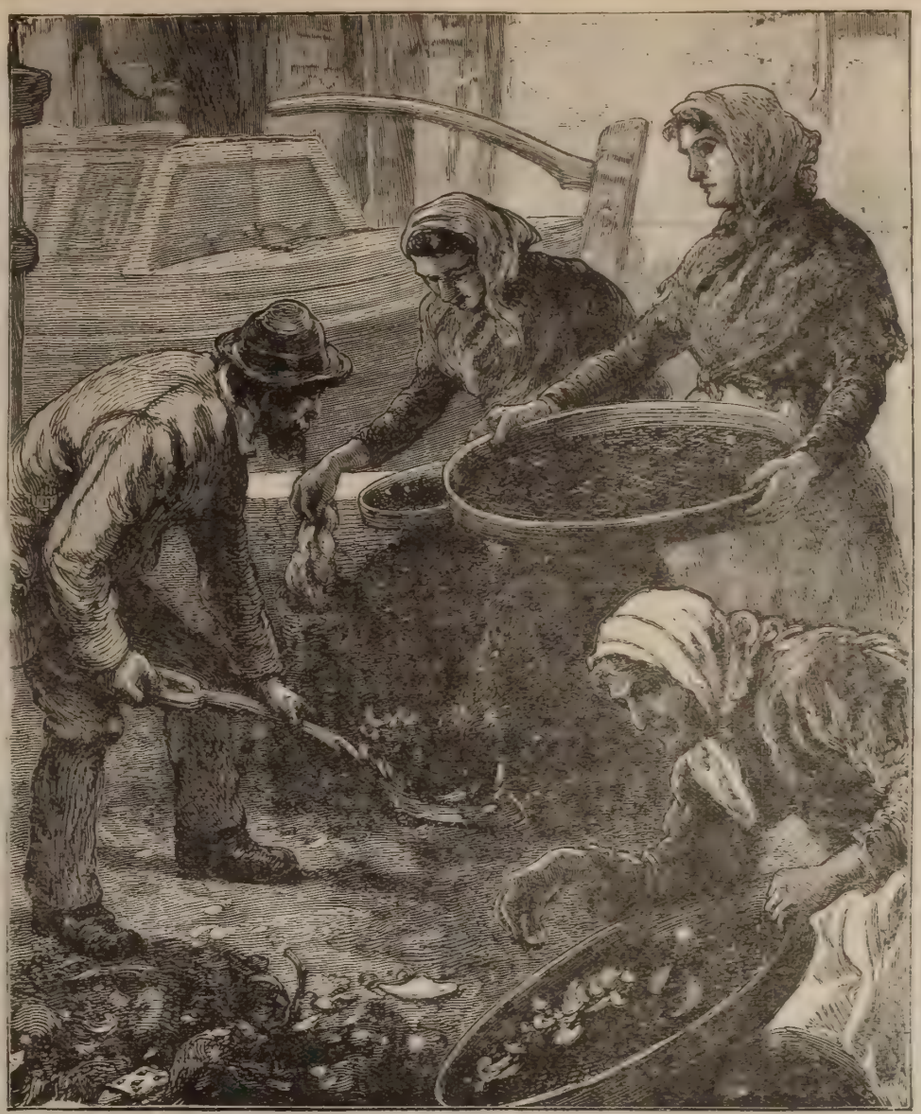
A little before noon, however, a visitor came He was a quiet, kind-looking gentleman with a soft, gentle, persuasive voice. He asked many questions about the work, their homes, and lives. Afterward he asked permission to sing to them, and such songs as he sang Jenny and the young ones never heard before. Nothing like those of the serio-comic vocalists which she had heard at the variety theatre once, on New Year's, when her mother took her for a special treat. Jenny could not understand the difference, but she stopped work to listen, and as she looked around for her mother, she saw she was listening too and crying.

"What's the matter, mother?" Jenny asked.

"Nothing," said the old woman, "only it carries me back to the old time, long before this, when I used to go to church. Listen, what's he saying?"

"You don't know me, do you? Well, I'll introduce myself," the singer said. "My name is Henry Pearson, and I hope we shall be better acquainted. You are having a hard life, with scarcely any pleasure, and I think I can help you to make it brighter. To make a beginning, I have brought an invitation for you. A very kind, motherly lady wants you to come and see her. There will be a real good tea and after that some singing and music. Nothing to pay, and there is no need to put on your best clothes. You will be welcome just as you are. Now here are some cards with the place and time printed on, and Mrs. Ranyard will be glad to see as many of you as will come; the more the better."

After Mr. Pearson was gone there was a consultation and about a dozen agreed to go. Pennies were put together and a cake of soap bought, no one among them possessing that article, but all agreeing that it would be necessary to persons accepting an invitation to tea. Jenny had a comb—an old one found among the ashes one day—and this was to be lent around, and so the toilets were made, and "the dust fairies," as they were satirically called, presented themselves at Mrs Ranyard's table.



Jenny's Dusty Occupation.

That was the beginning of a new life for Jenny and many such as she. Of all the good effected through the instrumentality of that noble, self-sacrificing woman, whose name is reverenced the world over, none ever returned more blessed results.

It was a light shining in a dark place, and it shone right into the hearts of the neglected and the outcast Henry Pearson continued his labors until he caught a fever while visiting among them. In three days he was dead. The girls gathered weeping about his grave, mourning over the loss of their faithful friend. Mrs. Ranyard, too, is gone, but the work goes on. Man dies, but his work, if it be work for God, is immortal.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

A Physician Puzzled.

WHEN Simon Holmes quitted Edgar Atheling he walked away, silently praying for a blessing on the young man's mission. He had not gone far, however, before he saw one of the servants from the Hall and took the opportunity of asking how Miss Ethel was.

"Worse," said the man, laconically. "Sir Godwin said so, I heeard him. An' he said the Lunnon doctor was comin'."

"Dear, dear!" said Simon, as the man walked stolidly away. "I'll go up to the Hall and find out what it is." He turned off across the park by a short cut which he knew in the direction of the Hall, meditating as he did so on the strange changes which occurred in the condition of the sufferer.

He was startled out of his cogitations by the voice of Jacob Benson, the gamekeeper, whose footsteps on the soft greensward had given no token of his approach. "Mornin', Simon. It's a fine mornin', isn't it?" said he. "Quite like a summer's day. Goin' up to the Hall?"

"Good-mornin', 'keeper. It is glorious weather. Yes, I'm goin' to see Miss Ethel. Sir Godwin thinks she's worse."

Jacob Benson, the gamekeeper, or 'keeper, as he was called in the local vernacular, was a stout, strong-limbed, middle-sized man of thirty-five. He professed to be "a bit of an infidel," as he called it, a sort of sceptic on religious subjects. His infidelity, however, like that of many others gifted with much readiness of captious speech, was only skin-deep; and Simon Holmes had often pierced it with a home-thrust that not only made him wince, but accomplished a more notable victory in silencing his tongue.

"Goin' to see Miss Ethel, are yo'?" said he, drawlingly, in response to Simon's information. "Why I didn't know 'at you'd turned doctor. I heeard 'at Sir Something Somebody, M.D., was comin' down from London. Mebbe you're goin' to meet him for a consultation."

"Nay, marry," said Simon, with a good-humored laugh. "I should be a fifth wheel to ony cooach o' the sort, no doot. But Miss Ethel wants medicine an' advice from another quarter."

"Deary me!" quoth Jacob, in satiric wonderment, "what a good thing it is that she hez Doctor Simon Holmes handy to mak' up for it."

"Exactly," said Simon, with an emphatic nod, quite content to coincide. "Nut that I'se competent myself to answer her purpose; but she's gotten a notion that I can recommend her to a good Physician 'at can meet her case, and," continued the carpenter, with an exulting gleam in his gray eye, "I think I can.".

"Hey!" quoth the gamekeeper. "That's news! An' who's the doctor? an' what's his medicine? an' what's it for?"

"There's three questions all of a row," said Simon, with a smile, for he felt the opening he had been patiently angling for had now come. "Did you never hear your dear old mother sing—

'My life was sad, my heart was faint,
Sore was my sin-sick soul;
But Gilead's balm healed my complaint,
'Twas Jesus made me whole'?

All your three questions are answered there, Jacob; and when good old Hannah Benson's son goes to that Physician and gets that medicine, he may hope to be as good and as happy as his mother, and to join her where she's gone when the summons comes. Good-mornin', Jacob." So saying, the carpenter pursued his way to Aspen Towers. The gamekeeper whistled his two well-trained lurchers to his heels, and went his way to his master's preserves with something to ponder on that made him silent all the way.

"There, Jacob!" said Simon to himself, as he strode along, "I've given you a text; your mother's memory 'll preach the sermon. May your conscience mak' the application."

Sir Jarvis Mainwaring, whose arrival at Aspen Towers was thus announced, was one of the most eminent of the many eminent professors of the healing art in England or the world.

On two previous occasions he had visited Ethel Spofforth at heavy cost and charges, and had bestowed great attention on her case. If he had been a much sterner individual than he was, he could scarcely have helped feeling and manifesting strong interest in the young and beautiful, and forever uncomplaining, sufferer at Aspen Towers. With all his great skill, however, neither his prescriptions nor his counsels had done more than alleviate the more painful features of Ethel's mysterious disease, and to add to her comfort in other ways. This, however, was a precious gain, and quite compensated, according to the baronet's thinking, for Sir Jarvis Mainwaring's princely fee. But the root of the disease baffled all the doctor's wit to pluck out or even to find.

"Good-morning, Sir Godwin," said the physician, who was warmly welcomed by the baronet as he entered the hall. "I bring bright weather with me, at any rate; let us hope that is a good omen. How is the young lady this morning?"

"Much the same, Sir Jarvis. I think she is worse—weaker, you know, and less able to bear the strain than when you saw her last; but Ethel declares that she is better."

"Nay, nay, Sir Godwin," said the physician cheerily, "your conclusion is not warranted by your premises. The opinions quoted are not of equal value. Miss Ethel is surely in a position to know better than you; and among all my patients I know of none less likely to deceive themselves. So I conclude that time, patience, and good nursing, with youth as a powerful ally, are doing what medical science seems unable to perform. I am candid, you see."

Sir Jarvis proceeded to take some refreshment. He had travelled from London by the night mail, and was prepared to do justice to his first substantial meal for the day. "By the way, Sir Godwin," said he, as soon as he began to be less interested in the good things set before him, "I have something very remarkable to tell you—something that I consider to be very remarkable, indeed.

"Just before I started for the North, by a stroke of good fortune this week's number of the Lancet came into my hand; and I was able by the aid of my reading-lamp to make my journey less tedious by dipping into its pages. Well, I read for a time, then dropped off into a brief nap; then I woke up and read again. Then after, as I imagined, I had exhausted every page, advertisement columns into the bargain, I threw it carelessly aside, and settled myself for a good two hours' sleep, by which time, as I reckoned, the train would pull up at Chilworth Station.

"My long nap was by no means a steady one. I was in that semi-wakeful condition that stupefies more than it refreshes, when I was suddenly roused by the porter's cry, 'Chilworth! Chilworth!' I felt so thoroughly unhinged that I determined to go into the waiting-room and get half an hour's refreshing sleep. The porter brought me my travelling-rug, and by and by I managed to get fairly to sleep. Straightway, as it seemed to me, I began to dream, in which, after passing through a few confused experiences, I found myself in the house of a dear old chum of mine, who was a fellow-student at Guy's Hospital, and who has devoted himself of late years to the study of electricity, especially in its action on the human body. He was very fond of this kind of thing in our student days. We looked on it only as an amusement, and used to chaff him a good deal, student fashion.

"Well, in my dream I seemed at last to become aware that he had perfected a new medical apparatus, which was supposed to supply a means of generating nerve force, or rather of stimulating the nerve centres, so that on the one hand these should be made to perform their office, and yet, on the other hand, should not subject the nerves of a weak patient to an unnatural and dangerous strain.

"Nothing would satisfy Dr. Greaves, so my dream ran, but that I must try the effect of a sharp shock upon myself. I suppose I have the uncomfortable couch to thank for that, for as soon as I laid hold of the instrument, I received a shock that thoroughly woke me up. I started to my feet, and distinctly heard myself say, 'That's the very thing, old friend. It will be of great use in special cases.'

"Your carriage had arrived, and as soon as I was 'on board,' I noticed that the careful porter had rolled up the discarded Lancet, and had thrust it under the leather strap that bound my portmanteau. I took out the journal again, and would you believe it? the first paragraph that caught my eye was headed, 'Dr. Feltham Greaves on Electro Dynamics in relation to Surgery.' I suppose I must have glanced my eye over it when I was half asleep, and by some occult process of unconscious cerebration, it had made its impression on my brain, and had produced the dream which I have just described to you.

"Of course I read the article now with fresh interest, and just as the carriage brought me within distant view of Aspen Towers, the thought suddenly flashed upon my mind, 'Miss Spofforth! the very thing!' Without an instant's pause, I bade the coachman drive back to the railway station. I sent off a message to my friend Greaves, and if the thing be within the limits of possibility, he and his apparatus will be down by this evening's mail. I feel so deeply interested in the matter, for the sake of this dear girl, and for the sake of medical science, too, that if you can give me a 'shake-down,' I'll stop and see the issue.

"Now, Sir Godwin, was it not truly remarkable? I call it very singular, very singular indeed. I positively do not know that I have met with anything more strange in the whole of my experience. What say you, Sir Godwin?"

"It is, indeed, very singular," replied the baronet, slowly and thoughtfully. There was a far-away look in his gray eyes, for they were fixed upon a scene which took place in the street of a Jewish city more than eighteen hundred years ago, when Jesus, looking into the sad face of an anxious father, said, "Be not afraid, only believe."

"Yes, Sir Jarvis Mainwaring, it is as you say, very singular, very singular indeed. But I humbly and modestly submit to you, and through you to all the learned faculty connected with your noble science, that neither 'unconscious cerebration' nor 'molecular movements,' nor all the phosphoric agencies secreted in the cranium can at all account for it. But if you will stoop a little; if you will step down from your high scientific pedestal, and will consult Simon Holmes, the village carpenter, I think he will be able to explain it, and give you clear testimony as to the reason why, and that without claiming any miraculous intervention in the case. I am afraid you will not be inclined to accept so humble and unlearned a witness as he; I will therefore refer you to that other Carpenter, who said, 'All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth,' and who also said, 'Whatsoever ye shall ask in My name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son.' If you reject this witness, then it will forever remain, as you say, 'singular, very singular indeed.'"

Sir Jarvis Mainwaring proceeded to visit his young and interesting patient. He was agreeably surprised to find her wearing a bright and cheerful look, and with ever so faint a tinge of color in her cheeks.

"Well, Miss Ethel," said he, cheerfully, as he seated himself by her bed, "I declare you look brighter and better than when I saw you last; and I remember that even then you were brighter than I should have thought you could be, poor little pent-up prisoner that you are."

"Why, you see, Sir Jarvis," replied Ethel, "I get my cheerfulness from a source which is independent of circumstances, and being a prisoner, only serves to keep it steadier and to make it more."

"Well," said the physician, "I am willing to own that, whatever it is, it puts our skill completely into the shade, Miss Ethel. I cannot understand it."

"No; I suppose not. It has no relation to science, and even if I could make it clear to you, it is not likely that you, as a scientific man, would believe it. I know, however, that I am supported and cheered by God's love and grace. But for that this chamber would be, indeed, a prison; but while I am conscious that I am living the life appointed for me, I do not feel like a prisoner."

"Well, well," said Sir Jarvis, evidently conscious that she was getting out of his depth, and he might well have thought, above his height, too—"I envy your philosophy. It is not every bird that can sing in a cage. However, I do hope and believe we shall open your prison doors; so keep a good heart."

"Thank you, Sir Jarvis," said the maiden; "but I don't like you to call it philosophy. Call it the love of Jesus, please. His cage-birds can always sing, and sing their sweetest behind the wires. I believe that I shall get well again. Indeed, I may say that I know it."

"Oh, you know it, do you? Well, that, I imagine, is half the battle. Faith helps the doctor wonderfully. But what makes you feel so sure?"

"The promise of my faithful God," said Ethel, firmly and steadily:

> "'His every word of grace is strong
> As that which built the skies;
> The voice that rolls the stars along
> Speaks all the promises.'

Do you know, Sir Jarvis, I believe that my God has given me a mission to perform; and when the set times comes, His time, you know, He who sends me to do it will give me power to go."

The great physician listened, wondered, felt half taken captive by her "full assurance." He was bound to say something. "Well, Miss Ethel, I sincerely hope that you will soon recover. I really am not without faith that you will. I am going to try another method of cure, and if—"

"Don't trouble about the 'if,' Sir Jarvis," said she with a smile. "I can quite believe that my Heavenly Father has suggested to you what is the best thing to do. Only I wish you would give Him credit for it, and, perhaps, in your heart you do."

Sir Jarvis thought of his strange dream, and retired from her presence, saying to himself, "It is very singular, very singular indeed."

Of course, all this became the subject of conversation between Sir Godwin and his guest. As they sat beside the library fire after dinner, Sir Jarvis could not but refer to his conversation with the young invalid. "What an extraordinary notion Miss Ethel has got hold of," said he. "Of course, I could not possibly see things from her standpoint; but for the life of me, I could not but listen. There is such a transparent simplicity and genuine truth in the dear girl that it quite disarms one. I would not have disputed her position for the world."

"What are you referring to?" said the baronet.

"I refer to her simple faith in God," said Sir Jarvis. "The notion that she has received some inward gift that makes her happy; that she is a kind of ward of Divine Providence, who shapes and directs affairs in a way that specially concerns her. I have heard of people who profess to believe in that kind of thing, and I have not hesitated to set it down as mere superstition, where, indeed, it is not downright hypocrisy. But I have never seen such a development of it as in Miss Ethel. She is too good and real to deceive herself or other people; and I should say that superstition does not meet the case here, because of her native good sense, and the clearness and readiness with which she renders a reason for the hope that is in her."

Sir Godwin was silent for a moment or two, and then replied with a sigh, "I am often very much inclined to think that she has happened on the sunlight, and that we, excuse me for saying so, are living in the shadow." He was thinking just then of the voice that said, "Talitha cumi," long ago.

"Where do you think Miss Ethel picked up these ideas?" said Sir Jarvis, apparently disregarding the baronet's suggestion.

"From her mother, first of all," was the reply. "Of her, I must say, that life and faith were in beautiful agreement. From her nurse and waiting-maid, in the second place; and of her I am equally bound to say that she is sterling gold, faithful, high, principled, invaluable. From an old carpenter in the village called Simon Holmes, in the third place, and, perhaps, the chief place; and of him I am bound to say that he is a good man, estimable in all the relations of life; a plain working-man of great intelligence, unquestionable integrity, and honored by all who know him; half-worshipped, indeed, in Thorpe Aspen, where he is known the best. All this you must own is striking witness, and I must not leave out my darling herself. When I am with her she makes me feel, quite unconsciously to herself, that I am in the presence of something higher, nobler than I. I wish you could have a little chat with Simon Holmes. You would find in him what Diogenes, they say, could not find even with the aid of his lantern, a man, and also a scholar learned in a lore that I fail to understand. He told me the other day," continued the baronet, with a smile, "that he regarded you as the instrument, tool, he called it, of Divine Providence, and that he believed that before you went away it would so appear."

The physician looked at his host with some surprise, and then his gaze fell upon the library table. There lay the Lancet, and he thought of the "unconscious cerebration" that had produced his dream. Was he, indeed, the tool of a Power whom he did not acknowledge, made to do the bidding of a God whom he did not know?

THE CALL OF ABRAHAM.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 30, Gen. 12 : 1–9. Golden Text, ver. 2.

The Turning-Point in Abraham's Life — The Degeneracy of the Antediluvian World—A Combination to Thwart God—Modern Anti-christian Associations—The Limits God Sets to Them—What was Required of Abram—Surrender of Everything—Abram's Departure —The Half-Way Halt—Communion Established—A Pioneer in Faith Life.

"Now, the Lord said unto Abraham, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto the land that I will shew thee : and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and be thou a blessing. And I will bless them that bless thee, and him that curseth thee will I curse : and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blest" (R. V.). Such were the words which turned the whole current of Abraham's life.

After the flood, although all the inhabitants of the world were the posterity of Noah, yet the knowledge of the true God had, little by little, died out from among mankind. God had commanded Noah, as He commanded Adam before him, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen. 1 : 28 ; 9 : 1–7) ; yet we find His creatures

BENT ON REBELLION.

They conceived the idea of building "a city and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven." No diversity of tongues hindered them from complete unanimity of purpose ; the same self-love which causes enmity and strife was fed by this grand idea ; these people ignored the order of God, that they should disperse themselves over the world, and they combined to dwell together, saying, "Let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." Lest God should have His way, we will combine to have ours! From first to last, in all circumstances, and all ages,

"THE CARNAL MIND IS ENMITY AGAINST GOD"

(Rom. 8 : 7). But God's right of authority could not be thus set at nought. Justice demanded that a terrible judgment should come upon man ; and no other blow than the one which came could have so effectually hindered his purpose. Until this time "the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech," but the God who has "made man's mouth" had perfect power over all the vocal organs, and He confused their language so that they could no longer "understand one another's speech," and thus it became easier to them to live apart. God's order is that man should be bound to Him. Ungodly men bind themselves into associations, with intent to overthrow governments, and to accomplish their purposes of ambition or of selfishness. The largest and most influential of these at the present time is that which is formed of the Jesuits. But God is behind the scenes here. He says, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further" (Job 38 : 11). He says, "Associate yourselves, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces. . . . Take counsel together, and it shall come to nought ; speak the word, and it shall not stand" (Isa. 8 : 9, 10). The Jesuits may pull the strings behind nations and governments, but all the time God is silently at work, and He says to all who combine together apart from Him, as He said to Sennacherib of old, "I will put My hook in thy nose, and My bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest" (Isa. 37 : 29).

But the confusion of tongues did not break the haughty spirit of the people ; they remained still unhumbled, "For the people turneth not unto Him that smiteth them, neither do they seek the Lord of hosts" (Isa. 9 : 13). Thus it came to pass that, from the building of Babel till the call of Abraham—i.e., during the space of between two and three centuries—history records no instance of

COMMUNION WITH GOD.

Noah lived until within a year or two of the birth of Abraham, and about two hundred and fifty years after the building of Babel. How far he lived from Babel, or how much the confusion of tongues affected him and his household, we know not. There is no mention either of his lapsing into idolatry or of his continuing to preach after the deluge.

In any case Abraham, equally with his father Terah and his brother Nahor, was an idolater (Joshua 24 : 2). It is more than probable that the history of the flood, and probably, also, some traditions of Eden and of the fall of man, had found their way to Ur of the Chaldees, where Abraham lived ; but the privilege of personal intercourse with God was unknown to him. The first advance was, as it ever must be, from God's side. How God spoke to him we know not, but every one who knows what communion with God is will remember the ineffable sweetness and wondrous enlargement of soul which he experienced when it first dawned upon him, God is speaking to me. God's first communication was one of blessing, but it involved a surrender of the will. God said, "Get thee out of thy country"—i.e., "give up all thy business prospects," "and from thy kindred"—which meant surrender of all His social status, "and from thy father's house"—surrender of all social and family ties! And what was left to him?

ONLY GOD AND HIS NAKED PROMISES.

"I will make of thee a great nation." Where and when was not revealed to him. "And I will bless thee"—but no description of the kind of blessing was appended to the statement. "And will make thy name great"—no word as to whether it should be in the present or in the future, nothing in hand, no guarantee, but the God whom he had come to know. Yet "by faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed ; and he went out, not knowing whither he went" (Heb. 11 : 8).

"BE THOU A BLESSING," spoken by the same authority which, in the days of the creation, commanded light to be, was Abram's sufficient warrant, and he took the step of faith. "A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid" (Matt. 5 : 14). Abraham must at once cease to worship at the idol shrines, and must tell his reason why. Such a stand would run counter to the whole current of thought in his day ; he would be set down by the world as an ignorant fanatic, and in his own family be looked upon as a disturber of the peace. But God was with Abraham, and He rewarded his faith by making his wife, his aged father, and his nephew Lot, accompany him out of Ur of the Chaldees. "They came unto Haran, and dwelt there."

But this was but half way. A great many Christians get thus far—they leave off going to balls and theatres, but settle down into a comfortable family life, in which they live for themselves, forgetting that Christ died for us, "that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them and rose again" (II Cor. 5 : 15). If we live unto Him, the question with us is not, "What is convenient?" but "What does Jesus want?" "Who does He want me to have in my house?" "How does He want me to educate my children?" "How does He want me to employ my time?" "What Christian work does He will that I shall do?" It is the privilege of every child of God, like his Master, to

"DO ALWAYS THOSE THINGS THAT PLEASE HIM"

(John 8 : 29), and so to walk in the light of His countenance, rejoicing in Him all the day (Ps. 89 : 15, 16). And if we are really yielded up to God, we delight to do His will as soon as we are sure of it ; the only difficulty is sometimes to find out what that will is. Often some members of the family hinder, as Terah seems to have hindered Abraham. After his death "Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother's son, and all their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran ; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan ; and into the land of Canaan they came." They had started before, but now they had reached the place of blessing, it was no longer a half-way place. Abraham now pleased God, and "the Lord appeared unto Abraham," communion was established between God and Abram. God renewed His promise to him, and Abram built an altar to the Lord. As yet,

THE BLESSING IN ITS FULNESS

lay in the future, shut up in the promises of God, but the joy of communion was in the present. Abram had a present God, present peace, and present joy, and he was a present blessing to the souls of those around him. But he had a greatness in the future as the "father of all them that believe" (Rom. 4 : 11) and the head of God's chosen people. God "gave him none inheritance in it [the land], no, not so much as to set his foot on : yet He promised that He would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him" (Acts 7 : 5). Was this to tantalize Abram? Surely not. Had Abram come into full and immediate possession of the land of Canaan he might have been, indeed, a greater man in his own eyes, he might have had more present honor from men, but he WOULD NOT HAVE KNOWN GOD AS HE GOT TO KNOW HIM.

It is not in ease and comfort, but in straits and difficulties, that we come to know our God. Abraham was a pioneer in faith life ; he had no one and nothing to count on but God alone. There are many imitations of faith life. Many come to meetings and announce that they live by faith, and give the plainest hints possible that they expect those who are present to give them something. We cannot call this other than dishonest begging. It would be far better to beg outright and to be honest about it, than to profess to trust in God and to be all the time looking to man for help. Abram had no man to lean upon. Should God fail him, the course he had taken would be proved to be utter madness : a life of faith must have the solid Word of God to rest upon, or it breaks down.

We do not hesitate to say that a genuine life of faith is rare. But, on the other hand, we have known such cases as the following : A precious man of God who has given up business prospects and all else to devote himself to the Lord's work was invited by a rich lady to evangelize in a city in America. The work was largely blest. A friend said to this lady, "What did you give him?" "Why, he lives by faith," said the lady. "I did not think of giving him anything." How much there is of this want of consideration! Poor people, if they invite any one to visit them, almost always think of paying their expenses; but rich people, who have never known want, often forget to ask, "Lord, wouldst thou have me give this evangelist something?" God make us true in trusting and in giving.

[The following beautiful poem, which was published in this paper over two years ago, is republished by request, with the earnest desire and prayer that it may be the means of leading some wandering, waiting ones into the fold of the Good Shepherd. J. E. J.]

WHY DOST THOU WAIT?

Poor trembling lamb! Ah! who outside the fold
Has bid thee stand, all weary as thou art,
Dangers around thee, and the bitter cold
Creeping and growing to thy inmost heart?
Who bids thee wait till some mysterious feeling,
Thou know'st not what—perchance may'st never know—
Shall find thee, when in darkness thou art kneeling,
And fill thee with a rich and wondrous glow
Of love and faith; and change to warmth and light
The chill and darkness of thy spirit's night!

For miracles like this who bids thee wait?
Behold "the Spirit and the Bride say, 'Come,'"
The tender Shepherd opens wide the gate,
And in His love would gently lead thee home.
Why should'st thou wait? Long centuries ago,
Thou timid lamb, the Shepherd paid for thee!
Thou art His own. Would'st thou His beauty know,
Nor trust the love which yet thou can'st not see?
Thou hast not learned this lesson to receive:
More blest are they who see not, yet believe.

Still dost thou wait for feeling? Dost thou say,
"Fain would I love and trust, but hope is dead,
I have no faith, and without faith, who may Rest in the blessing which is only shed
Upon the faithful? I must stand and wait."
Not so. The Shepherd does not ask of thee
Faith in thy faith, but only faith in Him.
And this He meant in saying, "Come to Me."
In light or darkness, seek to do His will,
And leave the work of faith to Jesus still.

The Late Bishop HANNINGTON and Rev. JOHN HOUGHTON—Scenes in Equatorial Africa.

THE LATE BISHOP HANNINGTON:
The Martyr of Uganda.

The Recent Uganda Massacres—Mr. Hannington Born in 1847—His Boyhood—Studies at Oxford—Graduates in 1872—Converted and Ordained—Stanley's Challenge—Goes to Africa in 1882—Return Home Through Ill Health—Consecrated Bishop in 1883—In Africa Again—The Thrilling Events which Ended with His Tragic Death.

NO event of missionary history has aroused deeper or more general sympathy than the recent massacres of native Christians described in this journal on January 13th. Although so many and so great conflicts have been won for Christ peaceably in the dark corners of the earth, there was nothing surprising in the fact that contact with barbarous tribes was followed by bloodshed and peril; but few were prepared for this sudden revelation in Central Africa, of patient faith and victorious endurance in the face of persecution, which proved that these African converts were supported of God as were the early martyrs. Such incidents appeal to the Church universal; they have a language of their own, and are understood in every country. They are full of inspiration for the future, although the present is overclouded.

James Hannington, the martyred Bishop of Eastern Equatorial Africa, whose portrait appears on our front page, was born at St. George's, Hurstpierpoint, England, on September 3d, 1847, and ended his mortal career near Uganda in October, 1885 (the 29th it is supposed), at the early age of thirty-eight.

At the age of thirteen he was sent to a private school at Brighton, and two years later he entered the counting-house of his father's house of business in the same town, and here he remained more or less during the following six years, at the end of which period it was decided that he should, in due time, seek for ordination as a clergyman of the Church of England.

On October 22d, 1868, Mr. Hannington became a student at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford. He soon established himself as a general favorite, but was not a very diligent or brilliant student, though in chemistry, botany, natural history, and general science he is said to have been well grounded. In 1870 he began a course of reading with the Rev. C. Scriven, Rector of Wivenhoe, on the wild north coast of Devonshire, where he studied with increased indications of success. On June 12th, 1872, he took his B.A. degree.

occurred, according to the entry in his diary, on July 15th, 1873, and his ordination by the Bishop of Oxford took place about six months later. He commenced his clerical career as Curate of Trentishoe, in Devonshire, and here he began to realize more than ever he had done, his union with Christ, and commenced that fellowship with Him which was sustained unbroken to the end.

When Mr. Hannington heard, early in the year 1878, of the manner in which the heroic labors of Lieutenant Shergold Smith and Mr. O'Neill had been crowned by their violent death on the shore of the Victoria Nyanza, he was deeply moved. He felt within himself the stirrings of a strong desire to offer to fill the gap which their fall had made in the ranks of the little

CENTRAL-AFRICAN MISSION ARMY.

That desire slowly ripened, and developed into a definite purpose. It is a significant fact that the man who was himself to die a martyr's death was drawn to the field, not by the hope of reward, but by the example of men who had died in the work.

While waiting for an appointment to the Foreign Mission field he continued his home work with zeal. He was foremost in all temperance and philanthropic work, and in great request for missions in different parts of the country. In February, 1882, he received a letter from the secretary of the Church Missionary Society, saying: "It has been reported to me that you are willing to labor in the Foreign Mission field," and offering to afford him the opportunity he desired.

The Committee of the society was about to send a fresh party to Central Africa to re-enforce Mr. Mackay and the Rev. P. O'Flaherty, who held the ground at Rubaga, that latest city of martyrs, by the source of the Nile.

was then alive; he whose bright, intelligent, thoughtful, though fitful, nature, had so attracted Speke when he visited his court in 1861, and whose qualities made so deep an impression upon Mr. H. M. Stanley, that he wrote, in 1875, a letter to the Daily Telegraph, in which he "challenged Christendom to send missionaries to Uganda." On May 17th, 1882, Mr. Hannington and his party set sail, and reached Zanzibar on June 19th, and before the end of the month the journey to the interior was commenced. Of the incidents, perils, and providences of this journey we have no space to speak. On Christmas Day, at 8 A.M., the Holy Communion was celebrated in the heart of the great African wilderness, by a band of wearied and fever-stricken men, who for a while forgot their loneliness and their pains, as with praise and thanksgiving they celebrated the Saviour's dying love.

In February, 1883, the health of Mr. Hannington was completely broken down. A longer sojourn in Africa at that time would have been certain death. He therefore, in the hope of prolonging his life and doing more work, returned to England to recuperate, and in June, 1883, he appeared among his friends looking like an animated corpse. But with returning health the desire to assail once more the fortress from which he had been driven back came strongly upon him. For the next twelvemonth, however, he both preached and spoke upon platforms many times in behalf of the Church Missionary Society. On June 24th, in the parish church, of Lambeth, he was consecrated

BISHOP OF CENTRAL AFRICA.

On November 5th he once again set sail, and on January 24th, 1885, he arrived at Mombasa, on the eastern coast of Africa. For most of what follows we are indebted to his diary, which was kept with punctilious regularity, and which has recently been published. In this diary Bishop Hannington gives evidence of the consecrated and heroic spirit which led him to determine to go to Uganda, and to hurry thither at all costs along the shortest and most dangerous route. He had come to Lubwas, where a tributary sultan of King Mwanga holds sway, and was there met with insolent demands for guns and powder, and that he should stay for some days. Unawed by threats he proceeded to push his way laughingly through a crowd of soldiers, but afterward yielded to what looked like conciliation, and promised to stop for a day.

The real nature of the feeling toward him was, however, soon made manifest, when his guns were stolen, a sentry was appointed to guard and follow him, and he and his head man were violently attacked on a hill, whither they had gone to view the Nile in the distance. The bishop was thrown violently to the earth by a group of ruffians, stripped of his valuables, threatened with a club, hastily dragged by the legs over the ground, and, on regaining his feet, was brutally dashed against trees as he was hurried along at the rate of five miles an hour, till finally he was and told that there he would be kept while communications respecting him were made with Mwanga. Even while being dragged along in expectation of immediate death he sang "Safe in the Arms of Jesus" and "My God, I am Thine." The remainder of his narrative is concerned with the painful details of his detention up to the moment of his execution. He found himself at first in an unventilated and filthy hut (of which he gives a sketch), which, while suffering from great pain, thirst, and sleeplessness, he had to share with twenty other men and an unlimited supply of rats and vermin. Sometimes physical weakness would assert itself, as when, after enjoying the fresh air for a brief period, he burst into tears at the dreadful contrast of his prison-hut; but again he would recover his manhood and feel more in the "caged lion frame of mind." He appears to have been perfectly resigned to the will of God. Even his savage captors perceived how ill he was, and sent his tent for him to use in the daytime.

One afternoon, says the bishop, "to my surprise my guards came kneeling down, so different to their usual treatment, and asked me to come out; I came out, and there was the chief and about one hundred of his wives come to feast their eyes on me in cruel curiosity. For the moment my entire nature revolted, but I sat still, and presently read to myself Matt. 5: 44, 45, and felt refreshed." Afterward it became one of the fashionable amusements of the chief's numerous wives to come and gaze at the prisoner, who was presently attacked by the agonizing pains of rheumatism and by fever. All this time he was in suspense as to whether any message had been sent to the king or not, and, if so, as to the nature of the answer that had been returned. He became very broken down in health and spirit, but comported himself with Christian submission.

At length he learned that three soldiers had arrived from Mwanga; but what news they brought he did not know. On the eighth day of his imprisonment he made his final entry in the diary—in these words—"I can hear no news; but was held up by Psalm 30, which came with great power. A hyena howled near me last night, smelling a sick man, but I hope it is not to have me yet."

ON THAT DAY HE WAS SLAIN, leaving behind this memorial of calm and holy devotion to the cause of Christ and to the welfare of the dark races of the dark continent.

As the Christian martyr was attracted to the field by the death of his predecessors, so God has raised up many to follow Bishop Hannington in the same work. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church; there is no hanging back in fear, but volunteers in large numbers are offering themselves, undeterred by the danger. Already the Archbishop of Canterbury has appointed and consecrated the Right Rev. Henry Perrott Parker to be successor to Bishop Hannington, and the new bishop is now on his way to Equatorial Africa.

THE LATE REV. JOHN HOUGHTON:
The Martyr of Golbanti.

Born in 1858—Conversion and Early Labors for Christ—Enters College—Commences His Ministry in 1881—Sets Sail with His Wife for Africa in 1884—Their Welcome—Visited by Bishop Hannington—Attack by Masai Warriors—Death of the Missionary and His Heroic Wife.

JOHN HOUGHTON, whose portrait accompanies that of Bishop Hannington on our front page, and who, like him, has gained the martyr's crown, was born at Shevington, England, on March 26th, 1858, and ceased from his earthly labor May 3d, 1886, at the early age of twenty-eight. His conversion took place at Denton, near Manchester, in August, 1873, when he was a little more than fifteen years of age, and he began at once to fit himself, by reading and study, for any Christian work to which the Lord might call him. Two years later he became a lay preacher, and so great was the success which he experienced, that he resolved to enter the ministry. Accordingly, in the year 1879, he commenced a two-years' course of college training, and obtained considerable distinction as a student. In 1881 he began his ministry under the auspices of the United Methodist Free Churches.

In response to an appeal for missionaries to go to the

he offered himself, and was accepted, and Miss Annie Brown, to whom he was married in 1884, consented to accompany him in his sacred, though perilous, enterprise. After a short honeymoon spent at Lytham, and bidding farewell to friends, on October 22d they set sail from London for Mombasa, where they safely arrived after a voyage of five weeks, and received a hearty welcome from Mr. and Mrs. Handford, Church of England missionaries, at Frere Town, and Mr. and Mrs. Wakefield, of Jomvu, with whom they stayed some months in order to learn the language.

The United Methodist Free Churches had three principal stations in Mombasa, the most important being at Jomvu, the second at Ribe, and the third at Golbanti among the Gallas. In the month of April, 1885, Mr. and Mrs. Houghton volunteered to take charge of the station at Ribe, with which place are associated the names of several devoted missionaries who have successively wrought and suffered in the glorious cause. Only a couple of days after their arrival the late Bishop Hannington paid them a visit of welcome.

In December, 1885, Mr. Houghton went to Zanzibar, a journey of one hundred and twenty miles, to obtain the assistance and protection of the British agent in his preparations for the establishment of the Galla mission, to which he was soon to remove, and on January 17th, 1886, he and his wife removed to Golbanti. The people of the place were pure heathens and very superstitious. The Rev. W. H. During having assisted the newly-arrived missionaries to become settled in their new residence, and introduced them to the natives and to their work, went to Ribe. They were not, however, absolutely alone. They were cheered by the presence of native Christians, among whom was Aba Shora, who for a long time had been known at Ribe and Jomvu as a truly Christian man, a bright illustration of the triumph of the Gospel over heathenism. Only about five weeks later a dark shadow settled upon the little community and filled the hearts of the missionaries with grave anxiety and sorrow, and many of the natives' homes with mourning, desolation, and woe, and which was, alas! to be the prelude of

DEEPER WOES YET TO COME.

The dreaded Masai warriors, who are noted for their cruelty and depredations, suddenly appeared in the very neighborhood of the mission, and with what intentions there was too good reason to understand. They burned down a number of huts, took away cattle, and killed between forty and fifty of the Gallas, among whom were four Christians, who attempted to resist the efforts of the marauders, one being Aba Shora himself.

The remainder of the story is soon told. The visits of the Masai became increasingly frequent, their demands extortionate, and their victims numerous; but still the noble missionary and his wife, calm and undaunted in the face of imminent peril, and strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus, went on with their work as though they had received an immunity from all danger. And their hearts were rejoiced by seeing that their labor was not in vain in the Lord. But the end was at hand. The morning of Monday, the 3d of May, broke peacefully over the little flock at Golbanti with no shadow of the dreadful tragedy which was to take place there before the sun should have reached its zenith in the sky. Presently a woman announced to Mrs. Houghton that the Masai were coming, and immediately fled to the forest close by. The warriors, approached the missionary's house, and were confronted by Mr. Houghton and his wife. Without allowing time and opportunity for a "palaver," one of the tall young Masai raised his spear and struck Mrs. Houghton in the side. The wound was mortal. The cruel and relentless strangers then attacked the helpless missionary himself, spearing him in the side, back, and in the neck, when he, too, fell in the road only a few feet distant from where the lifeless body of his noble wife was lying; and another martyr-spirit received an abundant entrance into the everlasting home of the blest.

ARMED WITH SPEARS AND CLUBS,

THE PICTURES

on the first page represent scenes in African mission work. The one under Bishop Hannington's portrait depicts the mode of travelling in the enervating climate of equatorial Africa. Horses are rare and almost unknown, especially on the western coast, for the combination of heat and moisture speedily saps their health, and, therefore, the white man, when he wishes to travel, gets into a hammock, over which an awning is spread, to shield him from the scorching rays of the sun, and is borne onward on the shoulders of stalwart negroes. Ten miles is considered to be an ordinary day's journey. The picture immediately below Mr. Houghton's portrait represents among whom Mr. Houghton spent his last days on earth. According to the account given by Dr. Kirke, British Consul-General at Zanzibar, the Gallas appear to be a remarkably fine race, full of untamed spirit and natural grace. The faces of many of them, especially the women, are strikingly handsome. Directly underneath this illustration is one which gives an accurate idea of near Zanzibar. The situation is generally chosen which promises to be most healthy in itself, and which affords sea-bathing, cool breezes, and immunity from mosquitoes. The other picture, at the extreme left-hand corner, represents a Church Missionary Society's house in Eastern Africa.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Shoemaker's Love of Liquor.—Mr. Beuglas; speaking at a Mizpah Hall, observed: "There was in Glasgow prison not long ago a shoemaker, one of the best of his trade. He was engaged while in prison making a pair of boots, but as his sentence was a very short one, it was feared they would not be finished before his time of liberation. Just before the end of his sentence, a warder was trying to get him to hurry, that he might as nearly as possible finish his job before leaving. The prisoner turned, and said, 'Look here, give me money for drink, and I'll get drunk as soon as I'm out, and come back here and finish them.' That man was so fond of drink that he could not do without it. It was even sweeter to him than liberty."

An Alarming Dream.—Mr. Clarke Observed: "One night I had a fearful dream. I dreamed that Christ had come, and that I found myself all alone in the house of the friends with whom I am at present staying. I went into the room to look for my friends, but could find no one. I was alone. At length I rushed to my own room to look for my wife, but she also was gone. Thus I rushed about in despair, that Christ should have come, and all of them but myself thought worthy to be with Him. In the midst of my despair I awoke, and how glad I was to know it was but a dream. But what must be the state of those unprepared ones when the Lord shall come, as He shortly will do!"

A Consumptive Led to Christ.—Mr. William Davidson said: "A Christian woman told me of a young man, nineteen years old, who lived in the flat over that I occupy, and who was very ill. I at once said, 'I'll go and see him.' When I called I found him in a most wretched state, outwardly and inwardly. I saw at once he was dying of consumption, and expressed a hope that he was trusting to Christ for salvation. He told me he knew all about the Gospel, but he was no better; in fact, he got no practical good from his knowledge. I told him he must accept of Christ as a personal Saviour, and read several portions of the Word to explain what I had said. I called three days afterward, and found him much worse. After saying that he thought he would not get better, he said he would not care much if he was prepared for the eternal world. The third time I called I saw his countenance was changed, and he held out his hand to me, and exclaimed, 'Oh, I've given my heart to Christ, and He has pardoned me and made me so happy. I looked off to Him, and He came into my heart, and now my misery is all gone forever.' In a few days he passed away into the land beyond the river, saying, 'Oh blessed, blessed Jesus; how precious, how precious!'"

A Persian Attendant's Devotedness.—Mr. Marsh related that when Miss Fisk was working in Persia, she returned one evening after a hard Sunday's labor in the open air, and being quite tired out, sat down on a seat outside the house to rest. An attendant, seeing her, came up and sat down beside her, and putting the weary head on her shoulder, said, "Lean on me." But the lady strove to support herself. Then her companion looked lovingly down on her, and said, "If you love me, lean hard," and the lady, touched with her love, leaned upon her, and enjoyed a sweet repose. And as she was thus resting, the thought came into her mind, That is just what God wants us to do, to lean whenever we are tired and weary, and need His help; and when do we not need Him? We need Him every hour, and, praise the Lord, He is always able and willing to help us.

A Lady Thirty Years in Darkness.—The Rev. Mr. Ross observed: "In the year 1874 the Fisk Jubilee Singers visited this country. At this time a gentleman in London heard them singing the hymn, 'O, sing of Jesus, Lamb of God.' He listened with manifest pleasure to the beautiful hymn, and so pleased was he that he offered the singers a sum of money if they would sing that particular hymn wherever they went. They promised, and one night, when singing it in a meeting in Dublin, a lady came forward to the president at the close, and told him that she had been wandering in darkness for thirty years, but that night she got her eyes opened while they were singing the chorus, 'I'm redeemed, I'm redeemed through the blood of the Lamb that was slain.' The thrilling words had gone right to her heart, and revealed Jesus to her for the first time."

A Book "All About Love."—Captain Tupman remarked: "I heard an incident lately of how a servant-girl was brought to the Lord. A man was going from door to door selling books, and he went up to a house where this girl opened the door, and when the man offered his books for sale the girl first said she did not want any, and then she said, 'If you have got a book about love I will buy it.' 'Yes,' said the man, 'here is a book, and it is all about love from beginning to end,' and he handed her a New Testament. 'Is it really?' said the girl, becoming greatly interested, 'I will buy it, then.' The man assured her that there was nothing but love in it, and took his departure. The girl began to read it, and God was pleased to bless the reading of His own Word, and the next time the man came round he found the girl rejoicing in a Saviour's love. God's love is indeed a mighty love, and reaches down to bless all who will accept it."

A Young Lady's Anxiety.—A Christian worker said: "A friend of mine went to a minister of a certain large city not long ago, and said: 'I have a dear friend, a young lady, staying with me just now, and as she often comes to your meetings, I should like very much if you would speak to her about her soul.' The minister said, 'Yes; I have noticed her and would have spoken to her before, only she seemed a very superior young lady, and extremely reserved.' He promised, however, to speak to her on the first opportunity, and they separated, having each agreed to pray for her salvation. Next evening, when going into his meeting, the minister saw this lady standing outside with the singers; and, stopping beside her, he said, 'I have been praying for you, and so also has a friend; tell me, would you not like to give your heart to Jesus?' 'Yes,' she said, 'I should; that is what I came here for, and I put myself in your way all yesterday, that you might speak to me about Jesus as my Saviour; but you did not.' I asked her to come to the vestry for a moment; she did so, and before she left it again, she had found Christ and went home praising God."

WHEN God would set fast a beautiful thought He plants it in a tree; when He would put it afloat He fashions it into a fish; when He would have it glide the air He moulds it into a bird. There is to many of us a complete fascination in the structure and habits of birds. The blackbird floating like a flake of darkness through the sunlight; the meadow-lark, with head of fawn and throat of velvet and breast of gold; the red flamingo flying over the Southern swamps like sparks from the forge of the setting sun; the pelican, white and black, morning and night tangled in its wings.

They seem not more of earth than heaven, ever vacillating between the two. No wonder that Audubon, with his gun, tramped through all the American forests in search of new specimens. Geologists have spent years in finding the track of a bird's claw in the new red sandstone. There is enough of God's architecture in a snipe's bill or a grouse's foot to confound all the universities.

Musicians have with clefs and bars tried to catch the sound of the nightingale and the robin. Among the first things that a child notices is a swallow at the eaves; and grandfather goes out with a handful of crumbs to feed the snow-birds. The Bible is full of ornithological allusions. The are not dead and stuffed, like those of the museum, but living birds, with fluttering wings and plumage. "Behold the fowls of the air," says Christ. "Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down," exclaims Obadiah. "Gavest thou the goodly wings to the peacocks?" says Job. David describes his desolation by saying: "I am like a pelican of the wilderness; I am like an owl of the desert; I watch, and am as a sparrow upon the housetop." "Yea, the stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed time; and the turtle and the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord;" so says Jeremiah. And in the text Isaiah looks ahead and sees the gathering of many people unto Christ and the Church, and it makes him think of a flock of pigeons alighting on their coop, and all at once trying to get in at the window of the coop, and he cries out: "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" This is of the Brooklyn Tabernacle. On other Sundays we drop the net; to-day we haul it in. On other days we send out the invitations for a king's party; to-day we sit at the banquet. On other days we fight the battle; now we claim victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Ye who have toiled and contributed and prayed for the success of this institution, take unto your souls the grand satisfactions of this hour. To you, O men and women! is fulfilled the promise: "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." Wake up, O Church of God! and bring garlands and music, and let us celebrate our "harvest home."

Oh, this mercy of God! I am told it is an ocean. Then I place on it four swift sailing crafts, with compass and charts, and choice rigging and skilful navigators, and I tell them to launch away and discover for me the extent of this ocean. That craft puts out in one direction and sails to the north; this to the south; this to the east; this to the west. They crowd on all their canvas, and sail ten thousand years, and one day come up the harbor of Heaven, and I shout to them from the beach: "Have you found the shore?" And they answer:

"No Shore to God's Mercy!"

Swift angels, despatched from the throne, attempt to go across it. For a million years they fly and fly, but then come back and fold their wings at the foot of the throne and cry: "No shore! No shore to God's mercy!" Mercy! Mercy! I sing it. I preach it. I pray it. Here I find a man bound hand and foot to the devil, but with one stroke of the hammer of God's truth the chains fall off and he is free forever. Mercy! Mercy! Mercy! There is no depth it cannot fathom; there is no height it cannot scale; there is no infinity it cannot compass.

When persons apply for membership into any society, the question is asked: "Who are they and where do they come from?" and as this multitude of people to-day present themselves for membership, it is right that we should ask: "Who are these that come as doves to their windows?" They are captives whose chains have been broken; they are soldiers who have enlisted for a thirty years' war. They are heirs of Heaven.

I. They Come as Doves to the windows, first, because they fly low. The eagle darts up, as if to strike its beak into the sun. There are birds that seem to dwell under the eaves of Heaven; you see them as little specks against the sky, so far off that you cannot guess the style of their plumage or the shape of their bodies. They float so far away that if the hunter's gun be discharged at them they do not change their course. Not so with the doves or pigeons; they never take any high excursions. They fly around your roof and alight on the fence, and seem to dislike great altitudes. So these souls who come to Christ and to His Church to-day fly low. They ask no great things; they seek an humble place at the feet of Christ. They are not ashamed to be called beggars for mercy; they are willing to get down on their knees, and to crawl under the table, and to pick up the crumbs of Gospel provision.

There were days when they were proud and punctilious and inexorable and puffed up; but not now. The highest throne of earth could not tempt Mary away from Jesus' feet. Stoop, O pardened soul! if thou wouldst enter Heaven. A high look and a proud heart God hates.

Fly Low.

It is a mercy that thou canst fly at all. Remember all the years of thy sin; thy days of youthful wandering; thy days of manhood transgressions; thy sins—dark, brooding, deathful—sins against thy soul, against thy God.

In one of the benevolent institutions of Europe, where the destitute are provided for, the newcomers have their photographs taken while in rags before they are washed, so that they may always have in the picture a reminder of the degradation from which they were lifted; so, in this book, God keeps before thee a picture of thy former destitution and raggedness of soul.

It is an offended God before whom thou comest. Thou deservest His wrath. He scattered the one hundred and eighty-five thousand of Sennacherib's host in a night. He abhors sin. He will judge the nations. Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God Almighty. Fly low.

A thousand years ago an Emperor planted a rose-bush from which roses are plucked to-day. At the foot of the cross nearly nineteen centuries ago a rose was planted which blooms to-day; stoop down, if thou wouldst pluck it. Oh, for more of the child-like spirit! I rejoice in the belief that those who come to Christ to-day come aware of their sins and their wants, and have learned how to fly low.

II. Again: These persons who come to-day are like doves on their way to the dove-cot, because They Fly for Shelter.

The albatross makes a throne of the tempest; the sea-gulls find their grandest frolic in the storm—their merriest hour seems to be that in which the surf of the sea piles most high. Not so with doves: at the first blow of the northeaster they fly to the coop. Eagle contends with eagle in mid-air, and vulture fights vulture on the bosom of the carcass; but doves at the first dash of the bird of prey speed for shelter from fiery eye and iron beak and loathsome talon. So to-day these souls come here for shelter.

Every one has a besetting sin; that

Sin is Always After You.

The robber watches you when you come out of the bank, sees in what pocket you put the money, follows you down the street, notices where you go to dine, and where you sleep, and what kind of a lock you have on your door; so there is some sin ever on a man's track. It goes with him to the store, it sits on the money-safe, it looks over his shoulder while he makes out the bill of lading, it goes out with him to dine, it walks home with him at night.

As to some dog that you do not want to follow you, but who persists, you say to it: "Back home with you!" You stone it away and start on. After a while, casually turning your eye, you find it close after you, with a sneaking look. Wherever you go, sin goes; where you stay, sin stays. You have watched the hawk above the barnyard; it sails around and around over the brood of chickens; around and around, now almost down to the flock, then back again, until at last it drops and seizes its prey. There is a hawk ready to pounce on every dove, and that is the reason that these doves come to-day to the windows—they want shelter in the grace of God and in Christian associations. They say: "If there is any power in your prayers, let me have them; if there be any virtue in good counsels, give them to me; if there be anything elevating in Christian associations, let me feel their influence." "Where thou dwellest I will dwell. Thy people shall be my people, thy God my God." Open your doors, O Church of God! and let them come in "as doves to their windows."

Christ is the only shelter of

The Soul in Trouble.

What can you do without Him when sorrow comes? Perhaps at first you take valerian to quiet your nerves, or alcohol to revive your spirits; but have you found anything in the medicines or physical stimulants sufficient? Perhaps in the excitement of the money market or in the merry-making of the club you have sought relief. This world has no balsam for a wounded soul, no shelter for a bruised spirit. The dove in the deluge flew north, south, east and west, and it was all water, in which were the carcasses of the dead world, and the first solid thing the dove's feet touched was the window of the ark. So the soul in trouble goes out in one direction and finds nothing substantial to rest upon, and in another direction, and every whither, but there is no rest for the dove save the ark.

"Substantial comfort will not grow
In Nature's barren soil;
All we can boast, till Christ we know,
Is vanity and toil;
But where the Lord has planted
And made His glories known
There fruits of heavenly joys are found;
And there alone."

You lost a parent; some one said that it was in the regular course of nature that your father should expire.

Did that Comfort You?

You lost a child; somebody said that if that child had lived it might have turned out badly. Did that comfort you? You lost your property; they told you that riches were very uncertain. You knew that before. You were sick; they explained to you that the difficulty was in the secretions or in the sciatic nerve. Did that soothe you? Oh, the despicable quackery of earthly comfort! But when Christ comes to the soul and says, "I took your estate because I wanted to give you more valuable treasures; I made you sick in body that your soul might be brought up to eternal health; I took your loved ones away because I have a better and brighter place for them in my own presence," then the wound heals, then the tears dry off the face, then God has become the everlasting portion of the soul.

* At this service Dr. Talmage gave the right hand of fellowship to three hundred and forty-two new members. The total membership of the church is now three thousand seven hundred and two.

Oh, the air is full of black wings and ravens' beaks! They join their wings of darkness until they shut out the light of the sun. They have fattened on the carcasses of men. Their clangor is horrible to the ear. Trouble and disease and death coming down on the wind. No wonder these souls have come for shelter "as doves to their windows." What does the pigeon in the coop care for the hawk in the sky?

Safe in Christ, safe forever. The mountains may depart and the hills be removed, but Thy lovingkindness shall never fail.

III. Again: These souls are like doves, because They Fly Home.

Most of the winged denizens have no home; now they are at the north and now at the south, as the climate indicates. This year a nest in one tree, next year a nest in another tree. The golden oriole remains but three months of the year in Germany, and is then gone. The linnet of Norway crosses the ocean to find rest away from the winter's blast. The heron, the gold-finch, and the gross-beak are migratory. The cranes call each other together several days before going, choose their leader, arrange themselves in two lines, forming an angle, and are gone. But the pigeons alluded to in the text, summer and winter and always, have a home in the dove-cot. And so of those who come to Him. He is a warm home; they rest under the "feathers of the Almighty." Christ tells us that chickens find not a warmer place under the wing of the hen than we in Him. He is a safe home; our fortunes may go down ten degrees below zero, the snows of trouble may fall, the winds of persecution may howl, the jackals of death may stalk forth—all is well, for "great peace have they who trust in God." From this home we shall never be driven out. The sheriff may sell us out of our earthly house, or the fires may burn it down, or the winds carry it away, but that home shall always be ours.

Men talk as though starting for God were putting out on a trackless moor, or wandering through the sands of a great Sahara. No, no; it is coming to the warmest and best of homes, "as doves to the windows."

IV. Again: These souls to-day gathering for membership are like doves, because

They Come in Flocks.

The buzzard, with dripping beak, fluttering up from the carrion, is alone. You occasionally look up against the wintry sky and see a solitary bird winging past. But doves or pigeons are in flocks; by scores and hundreds do they fly. You hear the loud whirr of their wings as they pass. So to-day we see a great flock coming into the kingdom. It is not a straggler trying to catch up with his regiment; it is a solid phalanx taking the kingdom. It is not a drop on your hand or cheek that leaves you in doubt whether it rains or not, but the rush of an unmistakable shower. It is not the raking up of the gleanings, but the tossing up of the full sheaves into the mow—"as doves to their windows."

There are all ages in this flock. Some of them are young, and the very first use they make of their wings is to fly into the kingdom. Some of them are old, and their wings have been torn with shot and ruffled with the tempest, and they had almost dropped into the sea. Some of them have been making a very crooked course. They dipped their wings in fountains of sin—they wandered near the gulf of perdition; but they saw their danger—they changed their course. They have come at last, "as doves to the windows."

I thank God that I have lived to see this day; to my dying hour I shall not cease to praise Him for this manifestation of His grace. Praise to Him, sun and moon and stars! Praise Him, Church militant on earth! Praise him, Church triumphant in Heaven! Let the Church beneath raise up its right hand of gratulation and the Church above reach down its right hand of joy, and while the two are clasped, let the elders of the Church put to our lips the wine of earthly celebration, and the cup-bearers of Heaven bring up out of the vaults of eternity the oldest wine, prepared by Him who trod the wine-press alone, and so let two worlds at once keep jubilee!

Who are these who come to us to-day? Many are young. Until Robert Raikes came, there was no organized effort for Saving the Young.

We spent all of our strength trying to bend old trees, when a little pressure would have been sufficient for the sapling. We let men go down to the very bottom of sin before we try to lift them up. It is a great deal easier to keep a train on the track than to get it on when it is off. The experienced reinsman checks the fiery steed at the first jump, for when he gets full swing, the swift hoofs clicking fire from the pavement, and the bit between his teeth, his momentum is irresistible. It is said that the young must be allowed to sow their "wild oats." I have noticed that those who sow their wild oats seldom try to raise any other kind of crop.

I went through the heaviest snow-storm I have ever known to see

A Dying Girl.

Her cheek on the pillow was white as the snow on the casement. Her large round eye had not lost any of its lustre. Loved ones stood all around the bed, trying to hold her back. Her mother could not give her up; her father could not give her up, and one nearer to her than either father or mother was frantic with grief. I said, "Fanny, how do you feel?" "Oh," she says, "happy, happy, Mr. Talmage! Tell all the young folks that religion will make them happy." As I came out of the room, louder than all the sobs and wailings of grief, I heard the clear, sweet, glad voice of the dying girl: "Good-night; we shall meet again on the other side of the river." The next Sabbath we buried her. We brought white flowers and laid them on the coffin. There was in all that crowded church but one really happy and delighted face, and that was the face of Fanny. Oh, I wish that to-day my Lord Jesus would go through this audience and take all these flowers of youth and garland them on His brow!

But while a great flock this day comes to the largest flock are going the other way. It is a very easy thing to tame doves. Go out with a handful of corn to feed pigeons, and they will fly on your shoulders and your hands, so tame are they. God has fed those who are before me with "the finest of the wheat," and yet you have flown from Him all your lives long. You have taken your clothes out of His wardrobe and your bread out of His hands. God's Spirit will not always strive. In the morning, after a severe night, you have gone out and seen the birds dead on the snow; so, after a while, God's mercy will cease, and the earth will be covered with the bodies of those who perished in the storm. That storm is coming. It will shiver the mast of pride; it will drive into the white reefs of death every cargo of sin. The cedars of the mountain will split in the hurricane, and the islands shall be moved out of their places, and the continents shall be rent asunder, and the hemispheres shall whirl like a top in the fury of that day. The mountains will be blasted and the beasts, in affright, be pitched from the cliffs in an avalanche of terror. The dead shall rush forth from their sepulchres to see what is the matter, and all those who despise God shall horribly perish.

Now, do you suppose that I can stand here and know that that day is coming without telling you about it? My last resting-place will probably be near yours. What if, when I get up in the resurrection day, I should see you rushing at me across the lots of the cemetery, and hear you cry: "Why did you not tell me of this? If it had not been for your neglect, I should have been on the way to glory." I cannot prepare myself for such a consternation. "Can you tell me said a young man as, on Sunday, on horseback, he dashed past a good Christian deacon. At the next turn in the road the horse threw the scoffing rider, and he was dead. He wanted to know how far it was to hell, and found out without the deacon's telling him.

So thou art mounted on a swift steed, whose hoofs strike fire from the pavement as he dashes past, and you cry out: "How far is it to ruin?" I answer: "Near—very near!"

"Perhaps this very day
Thy last accepted time may be;
Oh, should'st thou grieve Him now away,
Then hope may never beam on thee!"

Oh, that my Lord God would bring you now to see your sin and to fly from it; and your duty, and help you to do it, so that when the last great terror of earth shall spread its two black wings, and clutch with its bloody talons for thy soul, it cannot hurt thee, for that thou art safe in the warm dove-cot of a Saviour's mercy!

"Come in! come in!
Eternal glory shalt thou win."

PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON'S ESCAPES.

AMONG some reminiscences recently published Mr. Spurgeon writes:

"Not very long ago my esteemed friend, Mr. Duncan, took me in his yacht to the harbor of Rothesay. It was arranged that I should preach there on the Sabbath, and on the Saturday we went for a ride, four of us. In descending a long hill, some part of the harness broke, the carriage ran upon the horse, and

The Horse Ran Away.

It rushed down the hill like a thunderbolt, and became altogether unmanageable. I have a distinct sense of the lamp-posts, which seemed to stand in the road, flying by one after another. All hands were occupied with the reins, our friends inside standing on the seat and helping as best they could. At the foot of the hill if the animal turned to the left we should find a very ugly descent, which would involve the turning over of the machine, and the probable death of us all.

"If the creature could be made to face to the right, there would be a rising ground, and this would stop his mad career. Which would it be? To my unspeakable relief, I found myself cool in the moment of peril, but my heart beat fast as we came to a standstill a little way up the hill on the right. Was there no overruling Hand in this? We all felt so at the time by a sort of natural instinct. Had we travelled without a mishap we should have been bound to adore the guardian care of God; but we were all compelled to do so as we quitted the carriage and looked at the ugly place down which we might so readily have fallen.

"A few years ago I set out on my annual journey to the South of France. I had at former times travelled by the first train; but upon this occasion I chose to start by the eleven o'clock train. I knew not why the choice was made; but some time before we reached Boulogne, we were detained on account of an accident on the road. An accident indeed it was, for we passed and learned that many had been injured by a collision. One bares his head in reverent gratitude, and worships the Lord, in whose hands are all the ways of His servants Unbelievers may say what they please, but he who is the immediate object of such deliverances is compelled to say, 'Surely, God was in this place.'"

A COSTLY PROMISE.

THE cost of fulfilling a sailor's promise appears on the books of the Atlantic & St. Lawrence Railroad Company in an account recently closed. Thirty-three years ago the company needed a piece of land adjoining their road in Portland, Me., which was owned by James Mountfort. James Mountfort's brother Daniel had been a sailor, and had placed the widow and daughter of one of his shipmates in a house on the land, and had promised that they should have it free of rent as long as they lived. Daniel lost his life in a shipwreck, but his brother James, to whom the house was left, knew of his brother's promise, and for his brother's sake left the house in possession of the woman, rent free. When the railroad company wanted to purchase the land, James explained that the house upon it was let on a life-lease to the two occupants. The company asked to see the lease, but James said, "My brother gave no written lease, but gave his word for it as long as they lived, which was higher and stronger than any written lease could be." He offered to sell the land at a low price, on condition that the two women were not turned out of the house, and the company purchased it on those conditions. As they afterward desired to pull down the house, they were obliged to pay the rent of another place for the women to live in, and this they continued to do as long as they lived. The widow soon died, but the daughter lived for thirty years, and the company find that the payments made, with interest upon them, amount to $3808, which have been expended rather than the old sailor's promise should be broken. This was as it should be; but, if the two women had foreseen the death of their benefactor, and the sale of the house by his brother, they might have felt some diffidence about moving into his house. Their doubts would, however, have proved groundless, for the promise was kept. That is the difficulty with anxious Christians; they read God's promises, but they do not "move in;" all who appropriate them testify that God is faithful to the end (Joshua 23 : 14).

NEARLY SAFE.

IN urging his hearers not to rest satisfied with anything short of complete salvation, and not to suppose that because they repent they will be saved, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon remarked:

A Christian minister says, "When, after safely circumnavigating the globe, 'the Royal Charter' went to pieces in Moelfra Bay, on the coast of Wales, it was my melancholy duty to visit and seek to comfort the wife of the first officer, made by that calamity a widow. The ship had been telegraphed from Queenstown, and the lady was sitting in the parlor expecting her husband, with the table spread for the evening meal, when the messenger came to tell her he was drowned. Never can I forget the grief, so stricken and tearless, with which she wrung my hand, as she said, 'So near home, and yet lost!' That seemed to me the most terrible of human sorrow. But, ah! that is nothing to the anguish which must wring the soul which is compelled to say at last, 'Once I was at the very gate of heaven, and had almost entered in, but now I am in hell!'"

I remember a man coming to me in great distress of soul, and his case made a deep impression upon my mind. He was a man-of-war's man, with all the frankness of a British tar, but, alas! also with a sailor's fondness for strong drink. As we talked and prayed together, the tears literally rained down the poor fellow's weather-beaten face, and he trembled violently. "Oh, sir," he exclaimed, "I could fight for it!" Truly, if salvation could have been obtained by some deed of daring, he would have won it. He left me without finding peace, and the next day went back drunk, to join his ship; and I have never heard of him since.

Some are in the suburbs of the city of refuge. I warn you against staying there. Oh, what a pity is it that any should perish at the gates of salvation for want of another step!

He that makes but one step up a stair, though he be not much nearer to the house, yet he has stepped from the ground, and is delivered from the foulness and dampness of that. So he that taketh the first step of prayer by truly crying, "O Lord, be merciful unto me!" though he be not established in heaven, yet he has stepped from off the world, and the miserable comforts thereof.

THE POPE AND HIS NEW YORK PRIEST.

THE Pope's suspension of Father McGlynn from the rectorship of St. Stephen's Roman Catholic Church because of his public advocacy of Henry George, the Socialist, as Mayor of New York, has been an exciting topic during the past week. Prophetic writers have long ago shown in their books from Revelation 17 that the Church of Rome is to become allied with Socialism at the final crisis of this dispensation, which the prophetic dates show to be about the period 1896 to 1900.

Hence, although Father McGlynn may be rebuked by the Pope at present for siding with the Socialists, yet the time is not far distant when a future Pope of the last days, and the Roman Catholic priesthood, as a body, will zealously advocate the whole programme of Socialism. Consequently, Father McGlynn is only ahead of his times and leading on in advance in the direction where all the priesthood in due time will follow him.

THE TIME OF SETTLEMENT.

THE preacher under the Old Testament dispensation found it necessary to caution sinners against supposing that if "sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily," it would not be executed at all (Eccles. 8 : 11). Dr. George T. Pentecost mentions in his Words and Weapons an instance of a man who needed and received the same lesson. He says: "An infidel, boasting in a published letter that he had raised two acres of 'Sunday corn,' which he had intended to devote to the purchase of infidel books, adds: 'All the work done on it was done on Sunday, and it will yield some seventy bushels to the acre; so I don't see but that nature or Providence has smiled upon my Sunday work, however the priests or the Bible may say that work done upon that day never prospers.' To this the editor of an agricultural paper replies: 'If the author of this shallow nonsense had read the Bible half as much as he has read the works of its opponents, he would have known that the great Ruler of the universe does not always square up His accounts with mankind in the month of October.'"

A MISSIONARY AMONG WOLVES.

AN extraordinary experience with wolves is described in a letter recently received from Dr. A. Haegert, who is laboring among the benighted Santhals of India. He writes:

One Thursday we had our morning service at 4.15 A.M. After a cup of tea and a biscuit I left for Bethlehem. At 5.15 A.M. I passed Paharndi's jungle, where the cattle were trying hard to get a morning's meal by nibbling the grass. Near the cattle were two wolves; one walked all round, and the other went right in among the flock, and caught hold of a nice black goat by the neck. After a brief struggle he dragged her off to the neighboring jungle. Being pretty well mounted, I gave "Thomas" the spurs, and made straight for the wolves, shouting with all my might and brandishing my umbrella. But the wolf was not going to give up his prey; he kept on dragging her away till we came to close quarters. These wolves are the gentlemen at large in our jungles; they live on the fat of the land without increasing its prosperity. I hear they come daily stealing cattle. These wolves had never seen a lively missionary on horseback, and when I came too close they bolted, and I saved the goat out of a wolf's mouth. Riding on I again met the wolves crossing my path, as if they burned for revenge, and meant to fight me. Running away would never do; they were big, powerful brutes, of an alarming swiftness. So I charged them again with all speed, my only weapon being my umbrella. "Resist the devil and he will flee from you," and I found this to be true with the wolves. Hid away among the trees were three or four shepherds chewing tobacco; hearing me shouting, they got up, and in real Santhal fashion charged the wolves from behind with their clubs. However, this was too much for them, and they bolted in hot haste.

I was vividly impressed with the scene before me. It was a picture of many a church and congregation. While the wolves were carrying off the goat, the flock kept on feeding as if the enemy was far away; and while death was among them the ministers were enjoying themselves.

After the wolves had left, I preached Christ to the shepherds. May the dear Lord save every one of them as I feel confident that He will.

Mr. Haegert, writing recently, says: "The Lord's work makes strides here. Since I left home in Nov., 1880, I have baptized two hundred and six men and women from forty villages, built a big church and a mission station twenty miles from here, beside attending many thousand patients, etc."

THE SOCIALIST SPECTRE IN CHICAGO.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

AN article is published in the New York Herald of January 17th under the startling title, "Chicago's Alarm—Her Citizens Thoroughly Scared by the Rising Spectre of Anarchism—To Become a Garrison City—Nearly a Square Mile of Land Offered to the Government for Barracks—Chicago Wants Twelve Companies of a Thousand Men Each—Scheme of the Commercial Club—Its Members Banded Together to Save their City from Fire and Bombs—Their Contempt of the Militia." It appears from this article that some wealthy citizens of Chicago have presented to the United States Government a square mile of ground at Highwood, twenty-five miles from Chicago, on the Milwaukee line of the Northwestern Railroad. This land is to be used as a garrison post for twelve thousand soldiers.

THE PANIC OF WEALTH.

The Herald adds: "The solid men of Chicago have taken alarm at the progress of Anarchism, and fear that it may develop a strength beyond the ability of either the police force or the State militia to cope with. Consequently, steps have been taken to secure the permanent establishment of a United State military force within convenient reach for effective use in case of necessity.

"The leading business men and property-owners have become alarmed at the rapid spread of Anarchism, and have deemed it necessary to take extraordinary action to protect life and property against the threatened danger. 'The city government,' says Mr. Henry F. Eames, one of the subscribers to the fund for the purchase of land for the proposed military post—'The city government is rotten. During the last disturbance here, and during a little disturbance at the stock-yards, the police and militia have proven entirely inadequate to suppress the demonstration of the Anarchist element. A repetition of these things would prove very disastrous. For that reason national troops within call are imperatively needed.' That discloses an alarming condition of affairs in an American city."

Interviews with prominent capitalists in Chicago by the Herald correspondents elicited confirmation of these views. While the millionaires were generally careful not to express fears of an Anarchist rising, they admitted that the subscriptions came in largely after the dynamite outrage in the Haymarket last May. They referred to the large proportion of German, Russian, and other European exiles among the population of the city, and evidently regarded a rising as being possible, though not probable. A man of any class objects to admitting that he is scared, and these millionaires are no exception to the rule; but they regarded the location of a force of twelve thousand men in their vicinity as a wise precaution. It is not in the nature of a millionaire to part with money readily—perhaps, if he did acquire the habit he would soon cease to be a millionaire, as his poorer fellowmen are constantly placing in his way opportunities for the employment of money. The millionaire is by nature a cautious man. It is therefore safe to conclude that when a few of them spend about half a million dollars in the purchase of a tract of land which they immediately offer as a present to the Federal Government, that they have for their act some motive which seems to them cogent. The time and the circumstances combine to show that this motive is a desire to protect their persons and property from some serious danger.

Nor is it difficult, from their utterances and from the state of things in Chicago, to proceed a step further and define the danger which they apprehend. They attach a condition to the offer of the land to the Government. It is to be used for a garrison. As it is not a foreign invasion that is dreaded, the protection they seek must clearly be from domestic enemies. They dread the Anarchists, and they part with this large sum of money "lest a worse thing come upon them."

A DESPERATE RESORT.

That they will obtain what they desire appears probable. The United States Senate has already voted an acceptance of the gift, and in the House the resolution has been favorably reported. That the organization of the camp will avert the danger is not, however, so clear. In social disturbances and great revolutions armies have in the past proved very frequently a menace rather than a protection. Composed of poor men, allied by birth and early association with the poor, and leavened with a mass of pugnacious, dissolute, idle, and unprincipled men, who drift into the ranks to enjoy an easy life, promising authorized fighting and legalized murder, the army is liable to fight with the poor against the rich if it seems safe to do so. Thus, while a garrison at hand is the best means of protection available, it may, in a certain combination of circumstances, precipitate and aggravate the trouble instead of averting it.

THE OUTBREAK INEVITABLE.

All this, however, is a mere secular view of the situation and its perils. We are on surer ground when we turn to God's Word and read there the warnings uttered to prepare us for the things which are coming upon the earth. The last years of this dispensation are now close at hand. The focus lines of prophecy are tending to a point but little removed from this year of grace. In 1896—before another decade has been completed—the world will have entered the rapids of the Antichristian era, and the awful outpouring of tribulation will have commenced. Let not the people of the United States think that their beloved land will escape the storm. Mercifully removed from dynastic jealousies and the fierce conflicts of nations cooped up in limited areas, they will be spared some of the ills that will then afflict the peoples of crowded Europe; but religious persecution and the uprising of anarchy are, perhaps, more to be dreaded.

A MIGHTY COMBINATION.

The elements are gathered here for an awful explosion in both departments. Roman Catholicism, haughty, intolerant, relentless, has its grasp on the body politic. Again and again in recent years it has shown its power. The time is not yet ripe for it to cast aside the mask and attempt to crush the religious liberty of the nation; but it will come. The mutterings of the Communistic, Socialistic, Anarchic element of the population can be heard in every city. Secret societies, powerful combinations are learning their power, and are testing it. Riches and luxury flaunt themselves in the face of starving men, and Socialism gathers into its net daily crowds of discontented persons who are but slightly removed from desperation. What would the union of these two mighty forces mean? Let the Socialistic beast submit itself to the guidance of the scarlet-clothed woman of the Papacy, and then the much-vaunted liberty of the nation would be speedily strangled. And this is what prophecy clearly predicts. Happy are they who through Christ will escape that awful time, who, watching for the Bridegroom, hear the midnight cry and are caught up to meet Him in the air before the day of wrath.

PURITY BEFORE POWER.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially reported for this Journal.)

"CREATE in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me. Then [and not till then] will I teach transgressors Thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto Thee." Now, if David, with all his authority as King of Israel, with all the advantages and facilities he could command, needed this in order that sinners might be converted, I reckon we are free to admit we can do nothing until we get the thing he talked about. We have got no prestige, and very few facilities, and really

WE'RE NOT MUCH ANYWAY.

Suppose you were to buy a house and lot or an elegant residence, pay the money and get the deeds, and the day you were to go in the gentleman said, "Here's the key to eight rooms; I have reserved two rooms." "Didn't I buy the house?" "Yes." "Well, what do you mean?" "I want to keep four tigers in one room, and the other I want to fill with reptiles. I want them to stay here." You say, "Well, my friend, if you mean what you say I would not have your house as a gift. You want me to move my family into a house where one room is full of tigers and the other full of snakes!" Many a time we turn over our whole heart to God, and when He comes in we have reserved some rooms for the wild beasts of pride and the hissing serpents of iniquity.

Let me tell you, brethren, I won't ask God to come and live in a house that I won't let my family live in. Empty every room in the house, and then the heart is the centre of gravity to Jesus Christ, and He will come in and live with you. Religion will make the floor clean and the pillow-case shine as bright as snow in its purity and whiteness. Cleanliness is next to godliness, and filth is next to perdition. Spurgeon said: "There are three enemies that I have fought all my life—

DIRT, DEBT, AND THE DEVIL."

A clean heart likes clean hands and clean words and a clean life. Let us look at our hearts this morning. Is there lurking in the cells anything contrary to the Spirit of our divine Lord?

Some of you holiness people have got a clean heart, but you have not got a right spirit. You're clannish, and you don't like a fellow if he don't agree with you. Some of you will get up and get out of a church if the pastor don't preach to suit you. Now, the more religion a man has got the more he loves the pastor and the Church of God, and the more he will do for them. If you get too much religion to love your pastor and do your duty to your church, you may have a good deal of religion, but very little sense. A clean heart is one thing; a right spirit is another thing. It is a kind spirit, a forgiving spirit, a gentle spirit. That's it. Get a wrong spirit in you, and get it to dominating your life, and you are a ruined man as certain as God reigns in heaven. I recollect once fell out. They were both stewards, I think. I couldn't get them to settle it, all I could do. Then I tried to get them to fight it out, but they wouldn't fight. I didn't know what to do with them. Finally, when a revival broke out in the church, one morning I looked over, and they had each other in their arms hugging each other. I had a talk with one of them as soon as I could. I said, "You got sense; now I want to ask one question. How did you pray while you were feeling mad with that brother?" "Well," he said, "I've acted the rascal, but I haven't acted the fool. I haven't been on my knees since I got mad." I'll put up with a fellow acting the rascal, but when he gets to mixing things and acting the fool, too, he's getting in mighty bad shape then.

TWO BROTHERS IN MY CHURCH

I made this proposition at a woman's meeting once: "Everybody that's mad with anybody stand up," and before they thought, about twelve jumped right up. I suppose if I was to put the same question here about fifty of you would jump up. You would if you answered the impulses of your heart. "Well," you say,

"YOU'D HAVE BEEN MAD, TOO."

Mad about what? Well, I've had a fight or two since I became a preacher. I thought it as much my duty to defend myself from assault since I became a preacher as before. I've been mad enough to strike a man or two. The last fight I had I got in the fire, and the sparks flew right off me, and I thought, God will turn me into hell forever. I made a vow. I said: "O Lord, I'll never get mad again with anybody, unless he treats me worse than I have treated you." See how God treats us. And the idea of a man that God has forgiven ten thousand talents jumping on another fellow about a nickel and beating him half to death. That's a poor business, ain't it?

And I'll tell you another thing. This getting mad is the poorest business in the world. Don't you know Jesus settled this question when He said: "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink." I said when I started in religion, when a man slandered me or injured me, "Why does the Lord tell me to pray for him? I wish the Lord would let me go for him and whip him. He'd stop then. But instead of letting me knock him down and stamp on him, I'm to pray for him." I hadn't gone very far when I found the Lord didn't want to protect the rascal that had injured me, but to protect me.

When Jesus wanted to conquer the world He walked up on Calvary and died for His enemies, and, thank God, Jesus will conquer this world yet, to a man. It is not simply the words you use, but the spirit of the man that uses the words that gives you influence with sinners. Somehow a fellow knows whether you like him or not. If a fellow thinks you like him, from head to foot and take his hide to the tanyard, and he'll walk along with you all the way begging for his hide. I felt for a long time just like the fellow said he felt when his sweetheart accepted him. "Felt just like I had nothing again anybody in the world." If I had an enemy in this town I wouldn't let the sun go down until I had hunted him up and settled the question. Brotherly love and kindness. Where you find divisions and bickerings you will find there that the Church of God will never thrive.

HE'LL LET YOU SKIN HIM

KILLING A NEIGHBOR.

A man once bought a farm, and the neighbors said, "You can't live with your next-door neighbor. He is a terror to the settlement. That's what the other man sold out for He will torment you to death." The new man said, "If he fools with me, I will kill him." Well, they told the bad neighbor this, and it made him worse than ever. He would cripple his stock, and throw rocks at his children. There was not a mean thing in this world he wouldn't do. The new neighbor would send him quarters of sheep, and care for his stock, and give his children apples and books and kind words. One day the bad neighbor was coming home with a load, and he got stalled on a big hill; the new neighbor came and helped him out, and offered to do anything he could for him. The man dropped to his knees and said, "You said you were going to kill me, and you have knocked me cold and dead; and I'm going to make you the best neighbor you ever had in your life." You see, if you kill a fellow with love you don't have to bury him. Get the right spirit toward Christians, and you will soon get the right spirit toward sinners.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Policy of Retaliation on Canada in the fishery dispute was under consideration in both branches of Congress last week. Mr. Edmunds in the Senate and Mr. Belmont in the House reported bills authorizing the President to adopt such a policy. The bill introduced by Mr. Edmunds is the one most likely to pass. It provides that in case American vessels are any longer interfered with in Canada it shall be the duty of the President in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny to Canadian vessels any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies, as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels have come directly from Canada or by way of some other port, and also, if he things proper, to deny entry into any port of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of Canada coming to the United States. This question ought to have been settled by the diplomatists, without resort being had to retaliation. Whatever the merits of the dispute may be, retaliation is an objectionable mode of dealing with it. Two great Christian nations indulging in such childish proceedings present an undignified spectacle to the world.

A Large Number of United States Senators were elected last week. Among them were Charles B. Farwell, in Illinois; C. K. Davis, in Minnesota; M. S. Quay, in Pennsylvania; George Hearst, in California; Francis B. Stockbridge, in Michigan; A. S. Paddock, in Nebraska, and Frank Hiscock, in New York. These are all new men in the Senate. Several States re-elected their former Senators. Another term is given by Massachusetts to Senator Dawes, by Delaware to Senator Gray, by Missouri to Senator Cockrell, by Connecticut to Senator Hawley, by Maine to Senator Hale, and by West Virginia to Senator Camden. Probably the most important of all these elections, and the one that will have most momentous results in the country, is that of New York. The election of Mr. Hiscock to succeed Senator Warner Miller implies an approach to union between the two factions of the Republican Party in the State. The other two candidates, Warner Miller and Levi P. Morton, were supported respectively by the rival wings of the party, and the election of either would have caused an increase of animosity. The compromise on Mr. Hiscock and his consequent election may lead to a closing of the breach in other respects. This is a matter of national moment, because in the Presidential election the result will probably depend on whether there is harmony among New York Republicans or not. It is evident, however, that the nomination of Mr. Blaine would divide the party again, as it did three years ago. On that subject there is no approach to harmony apparent. Mr. Blaine's opponents seem as firmly opposed to him now as they were in 1884. All prognostications about the Presidency next year are therefore mere guesses until the nomination is made. The value of Mr. Hiscock's election consists in the fact that it shows to the Republican Party in the country how the solid vote of the party in New York may be obtained.

The New Labor Trouble is Affecting an Enormous area of the country and eighteen millions of the population. This is due to the strike of the coal-handlers along the New Jersey coast. The Philadelphia and Reading Company recently passed under new management, and one of the first things done was to reduce wages. The coal-handlers were reduced from twenty-two and a half cents an hour to twenty cents. Their work is to remove the coal from the cars to barges and schooners. The men struck, and the movement extended quickly to other coal companies, until it involved six, which together were employing three thousand men. These are now idle, and their idleness throws out of work the men engaged in the carrying trade and seventy thousand miners, who have now no empty cars to load. It also affects the population of six States, where the price of coal has been driven up from five dollars a ton to eight and ten dollars. As usual, the poor suffer most, as they buy their supplies in small quantities, and are now paying at the rate of twenty dollars a ton. This entails widespread suffering, and in many homes during the severe weather of last week it was impossible to have both coal and food. Great indignation is felt toward the companies for lowering wages, and precipitating a strike just at a time when the sufferers would be confined to the poorer classes, and when the rich who had not exhausted their fall supply of coal did not need to pay the advanced rates. The strikers were orderly until the companies attempted to supply their places with German laborers. An attack was then made on the new men, and the companies had to hire a gang of Pinkerton's men to protect them. These officers distinguished themselves on Thursday by shooting dead a boy of fifteen years old who, as they allege, jeered at them and threw stones.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley Set Out from London for the relief of Emin Pacha on Friday last. He told a reporter that the expedition would go by way of Zanzibar; that the enterprise would cost $100,000, and that it would leave Zanzibar composed of one thousand men. Of these eight would be English and the rest natives of Zanzibar. Mr. Stanley said he expected that news of the progress of the expedition would reach Europe by July. The Congo Free State has ordered the assembling of its entire flotilla on the upper part of the Congo River at Leopoldville by the end of March, with a view to aiding the Stanley expedition in the event of the expedition proceeding vid the Congo route.

The German Electoral Campaign has Commenced in earnest. The progressists have issued a manifesto calling upon their partisans to support only candidates opposed to absolute government and a sham constitution, warning them that otherwise tobacco and spirit monopolies and other evils will be introduced in Parliament. "We must make a stand," they say, "to maintain the foundation of the imperial constitution, especially universal secret suffrage." The Conservatives have also issued a manifesto, in which they say that the watchword of the struggle must be, "No parliamentary army, but an imperial army." The National Liberal leaders have issued an address severely censuring the action of the majority of the Reichstag and calling upon National Liberals to elect only men determined to make sacrifices for the security of the Empire against foes at home and abroad.

The Conservative Cabinet in England is Rejoicing in the energy of its new member, Mr. Goschen. He delivered two speeches at Liverpool last week, in which he exerted himself to prove that he is worthy of the confidence the Tories have reposed in him. In fact, as usually happens when political proselytes come to the front, Mr. Goschen is more conservative than the Conservatives themselves. Should he ever desire to return to his old friends his Liverpool speeches will certainly bar his way. Mr. Goschen appeared to know all about the two problems which are now puzzling English statesmen, and to be prepared to deal with them with a light heart. The Irish trouble he believes to be the work of agitators. He said they "are now treading on tragedy. They are increasing collisions between tenants and the law. They are lighting a blaze whenever they can and fanning the flame by agitation." As to the Bulgarian trouble, he solemnly assured his hearers that neither the Queen nor the Cabinet was supporting Prince Alexander nor intriguing for his return. This may be true so far as the Cabinet is concerned, but it is certain that the favor shown to the Prince during his recent visit to the Queen has been commented upon throughout Europe and has excited futile hopes in Bulgaria.

Daniel's Predicted Franco-Prussian War is evidently near at hand. We have constantly stated that according to Daniel 7 : 24 and 2 : 31 a triumphant ten-kingdomed confederacy of Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, and Bulgaria, prefigured by the ten-horned wild beast and the ten-toed image, must soon be formed, in military antagonism to Germany and Russia, which do not belong to the ten kingdoms of the Roman Empire. And it must be formed by 1890—i.e., about ten years before the End of this Age, which seems from the prophetic dates to be about A.D. 1900. The New York World of January 21st says: "The cue to the whole situation in Europe is that the founders of the regenerated German Empire, being all old men, intend to consolidate their handiwork before they die. They are determined to put an end once and for all to the danger of a French war of revenge, with which they are constantly menaced. This is a fact well known at every European court. The Germans are now ready. A fortnight ago every man in the imperial army had been armed with the new repeating rifle. The French are not so far advanced. It does not, however, appear that Germany can hardly be expected to wait until they are entirely ready and have concluded all their preparations. The general belief in the official circles of Europe is to the effect that the outbreak of hostilities is only a question of a few weeks."

Rev. M. Baxter will Preach again Next Sun- Sunday morning, afternoon, and evening in Philadelphia, where he preached last Sunday to large audiences. The services are held in the City Institute Hall, corner of Eighteenth and Chestnut streets. His subject is: "Coming great wars and earthquakes during the next thirteen years before the year 1900, great religious revivals, second advent of Christ, and resurrection and ascension of Christians without dying; England's loss of Ireland and India, and conquest of Germany by France in 1887–89, changing twenty-three kingdoms into Daniel's predicted Franco-Roman Confederacy of ten kingdoms prior to the Napoleonic Antichrist's seven years' covenant with the Jews (Dan. 7 : 24 and 9 : 27); the spread of Socialism, Communism, Nihilism, Anarchy, Spiritualism, culminating in the great tribulation and Antichrist's massacre of myriads of Christians during three and a half years, and then the millennium of one thousand years."

Clergymen and Evangelists who will Allow copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be placed in the seats of churches, or who will have them distributed at the doors, will be supplied with assorted parcels of back numbers if they will write to the Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

A Letter Received Last Week from a Lady in a distant State describes an effort which deserves success, and is worthy of imitation. She informs us that in the village where she lives there are about twenty of "the Devil's papers" sold every Saturday for Sunday reading. She has resolved to try whether some of the Lord's papers cannot be sold, too, and is sending one of her children around to try what can be done. She thinks this journal would be sold, and is making the attempt with a few copies as an experiment. Most heartily do we hope she may succeed, and that not wholly from interested motives. God blesses THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the homes of the people, and the happiest results may be expected from its circulation. It will give us great pleasure to facilitate any of our readers in other towns who will engage in this work. Thousands of copies might in this way be sent every week as messengers of the Gospel into dark places. Persons who are too busy to undertake the work themselves may know of unemployed men or boys who could be engaged in it, making a profit for themselves and doing good at the same time. We know of cases in which a considerable sum has been earned every week by a canvass from house to house.

Nearly Ten Thousand Dollars Were Granted in books for mission work by the American Bible Society at its recent meeting. The volumes were consigned to Brazil, Mexico, Japan, and Russia. A special grant was made for the work among the Ojibwas of Michigan. About four hundred dollars was given to the Methodist-Episcopal Church for the mission in Sweden and Finland. A letter was read at the meeting from Dr. Gulick, describing his experience in Siam, where he has made arrangements for the circulation of Bibles and religious books. Over fourteen thousand volumes were issued by the Bible Society last month.

The Warner Institute in Brooklyn, the Object of which was described recently in these columns, is now completed, and is doing a very valuable and successful work in a district now becoming thickly populated. Mr. Warner is anxious to consolidate and extend its influence by organizing a branch Y. M. C. A. under its roof, forming a temperance society, and increasing its library. He is prepared to accept assistance or to dispose of the building at a low rate, considerably under its cost, to an association prepared to carry on the Christian work there. His desire is to make the building a centre of usefulness in the district, and he is ready to co-operate as may be deemed best with Christian clergymen and laymen with like aims.

A Testimony to the Good Influence of the Prohibition law in Kansas has been given by forty-nine judges in that State in answer to questions addressed to them by the Chicago Daily News. The replies show that the question asked by the people, Does prohibition prohibit? is answered overwhelmingly in the affirmative. Only five counties—Sheridan, Ford, Clark, Republic and Harper—pronounce the law unqualifiedly a failure; in Kingman it is frankly admitted that the law is "not enforced;" in Rush, Trego, Riley, and Clay, although the replies are rather in the nature of opinions, as are almost all of those above mentioned, instead of statements of observed fact, they are rather favorable than otherwise. With these exceptions the answers show a decrease in the use of intoxicating drinks in Kansas ranging from fifty to seventy-five per cent, and in crimes and offences growing directly out of the use of such drinks a decrease of fifty per cent.

A Remarkable Avowal of the late Senator John A. Logan is reported by a clergyman in a letter to the Philadelphia Press. He says that in talking with the senator not long before his death, Logan said: "I have often thought that I would like to be in the ministry." I replied: "To have done that, general, you must have surrendered many ambitions." "That," was his noble reply—"that would be nothing. The end will come soon, and these things will then be seen to be worthless." I was convinced of his transparent honesty when he uttered these words, and believe that he simply spoke as he believed and felt.

A Congregation Imprisoned in a Chapel had an uncomfortable experience a few days ago. A press despatch from Norwich, Conn., dated January 16th, states that while the usual prayer-meeting was being held at the Methodist chapel at Preston, an unkind trick was played by some practical jokers of the neighborhood. They went to the chapel, and during the singing, when any noise they might make could not be heard, they closed the doors and securely fastened them from the outside. The trick was not discovered until the last prayer had been offered, and then it was found that the doors could not be opened. All the windows were nailed or frozen down, and for two hours the congregation was kept imprisoned, finally being released by an alarmed parent, who came rushing down to the chapel to see why his children had not come home. There was probably no serious aim in the pitiful trick; it was intended only to cause annoyance, but it was doubtless prompted by the devil, who would be very glad if he could shut Christians up permanently in their places of worship. They would then be withdrawn from the world, and his kingdom would not suffer loss through their teaching and example (Matt. 5 : 14-16).

A Physician Deranged by the Use of Cocaine is now in a critical condition. For more than twenty years past a very popular and successful physician has resided near Erie, Pa., and has had a large practice among the best families. About a year ago he was seized with a painful malady, which caused him intense suffering. He used the newly-discovered drug to allay his agony, and was enabled by its help to continue his duties. He has continued its use ever since, but a few weeks ago he noticed that it was having a most serious effect on his mind. He became nervous and excitable and was the subject of hallucinations. He imagined that he was beset by fairies and hobgoblins, and was in constant dread of being swallowed up by an earthquake. He tried to discontinue the cocaine, but was driven back to it by an irresistible craving. On Sunday, January 16th, he became completely demented, and the physicians attending him fear that even if he lives—which is doubtful—he will never recover his reason. It would have been better for him to have endured the pain, however severe, than to have resorted to an anodyne that works such fearful evil. Ministers and Christian workers have seen analogous cases in their work. Young persons in spiritual anguish on account of conviction of sin, sometimes under the advice of worldly friends, go into society and shake off their concern. The anodyne relieves their distress, but it is fatal to the soul, and prepares torture for the death-bed (II Cor. 7 : 10).

Two ex-Slaves Are Supporting Their Former owner in Wilkinson County, Ga. A local journal states that living in the neighborhood is a well-known citizen who before the war was very wealthy, owning large tracts of land and a large number of slaves. The war left him poor, and, acre by acre, his broad lands were sold, until they were all gone, to support himself and his family. A year or two ago he was afflicted with blindness, his family were all dead, and he was so poor that he was about to accept the hospitality of the county almshouse. At this juncture news of his sad condition reached two brothers, colored men, who were formerly his slaves. They had prospered since the war, had bought several acres of rich land, and built a good house. They took their former owner to their home, gave him their best rooms, provided for his wants as an honored guest, and made their people treat him with the utmost deference. Recently, however, they found that the old man was distressed by the fear that when he died he would be buried as a pauper. To ease his mind, the brothers have deposited a hundred dollars in the bank, to be held until the old man's death, when it is to be used for defraying the expenses of his funeral. Doubtless, gratitude for past kindness is the motive which has prompted the two colored men to this noble conduct. How few Christian men would be in need if every believer who knows what he owes to his Lord manifested like gratitude! He cannot do it directly as they are doing, but he can do it by helping his poor brethren, which was the way Christ Himself appointed (Matt 25 : 40).

The Separation of a Bridal Couple on Their wedding-day is reported by the Toronto Globe. It states that a few days ago, after a wedding at Courtland, the bride and bridegroom repaired to the railway station to go to St. Thomas to spend their honeymoon. A large crowd assembled at the station to see them off, and after the groom had assisted his wife into the coach of a Grand Trunk Railway train, he alighted upon the platform to shake hands with some of his friends. While he was doing so the train moved off with the bride. She arrived in the city, and upon telling her story to a fellow-passenger, he assisted her in hunting up friends. On the following morning the husband arrived in the city, and found his wife. The incident must have been annoying to both parties, but especially so to the gentleman, as it was the result of his own carelessness. He must have wished that he had paid less attention to his friends and more to his wife. When men enter into the bridal relation with the Saviour they do well to avoid leave-takings with their old associates, unless they can induce them to travel in the same direction (Luke 9 : 61, 62).

Two Stags Held Together by the Antlers were found last week in the woods near Waltham, Me. Two young men out driving saw at some distance what they believed was a deer, but as it did not run away as they approached, they thought they must be mistaken. Going to it, however, they found that it really was a deer, and alive, but unable to move. Its antlers were interlocked with those of another stag, which was dead, and had evidently been dead some days. They shot the live buck, but had to get a stout stake to pry the horns apart before the two animals could be separated. The two had evidently fought furiously, for the neck of the dead buck was broken. It was, however, a struggle in which the victor could make no use of his triumph. His enemy, though dead, held him tight to suffer days of torture from hunger and thirst, until the bullet put an end to his sufferings. It was a fate typical of that which befalls some men who fail to avail themselves of Christ's power to deliver. Hating and loathing the sins which were once their delight, they struggle with them and perhaps conquer; but unless Christ gives them liberty, the remainder of life is a perpetual bondage (Rom. 7 : 24, 25).

Killing a Girl to Drive Out a Devil is a Crime for which several persons are in prison in France. The London Standard's Paris correspondent writes to that journal that some young men are in prison in Morbihan for the murder of their sister. They belonged to the family of a miller, and were ignorant and superstitious. All the family were disliked by the neighbors, except the girl, who was a welcome guest in any of the houses. The brothers were jealous of her popularity, and declared that she was possessed of a devil. They repeatedly declared that it must be exorcised, and that they would do it at any cost. The fiendish fellows one day recently threw their sister down, and bored a hole in her forehead, while their mother knelt beside her, praying that the demon might depart through the hole. Of course the girl died, and now the brothers are to be tried for her murder. It would appear that if any of the family needed exorcism, it was the brothers, whose cruelty showed who it was that ruled in their souls. Had the girl really been possessed, she could not in any way have been delivered by them (Matt. 12 : 26). Demoniacal possession, whether in the form described in the New Testament or in the form common in our day, of wilful subjection to Satan's rule, has never yielded to any power but the name of Christ (Luke 10 : 17–19).

SHORN, BUT NOT BEYOND HOPE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Howbeit the hair of his head began to grow again after he was shaven."—JUDGES 16 : 22.

Total Abstinence Compatible with Physical Strength—Not Sufficient to Form a Character—Samson's Moral Weakness—His Fall—His Recovery a Lesson for Backsliders—I. The Growing Hair as a Picture—A Proof that the Roots are Still There—The Christian Overcome—His Restlessness—His Hair Growing—Begins to Pray—II. As a Type—Shorn Churches, Pastors and Workers—Consecration Indispensable to Usefulness—III. As a Prophecy—Of Hope for Samson—Of Joy for Israel—Of Mischief to the Philistines.

LET me introduce the text to you. Samson was set apart from his birth to be the champion of Israel, to break the power of the Philistines who lorded over God's people. Everything in his bringing up had reference to his peculiar calling as the hero of Israel, the hammer of Philistia. He was to be a Nazarite from his birth. Among other things which concerned the Nazarite he never touched wine, nay, nor grapes, nor husks of grapes, nor anything that came of the vine; which goes to show that the greatest physical strength is attainable without the use of wine or strong drink. Whatever else overcame Samson, he was never overcome with drunkenness; and yet he greatly sinned, which goes to show that total of itself to form a character. A Nazarite, in addition to abstinence from wine, also abstained from wearing the common appearance of men. He was not to have his hair at any time shaven or cut away; so that when Samson was grown up to manhood, he was covered with a shaggy mass of hair. He must have looked like the lion that he was. Those locks of his were the token of his consecration to God, the outward marks of his being set apart to be the servant of the God of Israel. Can you not see him with the terrible glory of his hair upon him?

Poor Samson was as weak morally as he was strong physically, and he fell a prey first to one evil woman, and then to another. Perhaps the extraordinary strength of his physical frame placed him under stronger temptation than is common to man; at any rate, he was peculiarly constituted, and seemed more like a wanton boy than a judge in Israel. Through this peculiar sin of his, the Philistines found opportunity to assail him. They tempted Delilah, whom he loved, to extract from him the secret of his great strength; and while he lay asleep upon her lap, the Philistine lords caused a barber to cut away the locks of his head. He awoke from his sleep shaven. Then he went out, and thought to fight the Philistines as before; but, to his surprise he found that his strength was gone.

THE LOCKS OF HIS DEDICATION

had been shorn; he was no longer the acknowledged servant of the Lord, and he was weak as other men Then the Philistine lords took him captive, bored out his eyes—for such is the expression in the margin of our old Bibles—gouged out his eyes, bound him to the mill, and made him work like a slave or an ass. Poor Samson, the hero of so many fights, now at last conquered by his own foolishness! To humiliate him they put him to woman's work, made hard so as to be the work of beasts. See what sin will do. See how the man who had fought God's battles suffers great loss, great pain, great disfigurement, great dishonor, and comes into a cruel and abhorred bondage through his sin.

That shaven man made a slave is the picture of very many who once were the avowed servants of God, and were valiant for the truth. They have given up their secret, they have told the world that which none should know but themselves, they have lost the locks of their dedication, and they are led captive by the devil at his will. They cannot see as they used to see, darkness shuts out all joy; they do not work for God as they used to work, for they are slaving for men, for poor, passing objects,

I begin thus upon the mournful key, because I want to speak of God's great goodness to backsliders, and of how He restores them; but I want to warn them, at the very outset, that that whatever may come of it through God's mercy, yet it is an evil thing and a bitter thing to wander from the Lord. Though Samson's hair grew again, and his strength came back, and he died gloriously fighting against the Philistines, yet he never recovered his eyes, or his liberty, or his living power in Israel! Short and effective was his last stroke against the adversary, but it cost him his life. He could not again rise to be the man he had been before; and though God did give him a great victory over the Philistine people, yet it was but as the flicker of an expiring candle, he was never again a lamp of hope to Israel.

With that as a preface we come again to the text: "Howbeit the hair of his head began to grow again after he was shaven." First, let us see what this growing of the hair pictures; secondly, what it specifically symbolizes; and thirdly, what it prophesies.

I. First, what

pictures. I think that this pictures the gradual restoration of certain among us who have backslidden from God. The hair was there upon Samson's head, though it had been cut short. Though the hair was shaved off, yet the adversary could not take the roots away. It was a living thing, and it would grow again. So is it with those who are the people of God. The devil can shave them very closely, and clip off their beauty, their strength, and their consecration; but a living something is still there that will grow again.

I will show you this hair in the process of growing. A man was once a member of a Christian church, godly and gracious. Satan has shaved him of all that was distinctive and religious. He has gone into the world; he has been put away by his brethren. His conduct was too inconsistent to allow of a continuance of his profession. But there had really been a change of heart, there had been a radical work of grace in his soul; and, therefore, after a while, he begins to be very miserable and uneasy. It is impossible for him to be happy among the Philistines, who have captured him. His gay comrades, who flattered themselves that they had got him fast this time, cannot make him out. He has fits of melancholy. He is evidently terribly uneasy in the ways of sin. Howbeit his hair begins to grow again. It has been shaved very cleverly, but the roots have not been extracted. He cannot rest in his sin; no true-born child of God ever can. Giant Slaygood may pick up a pilgrim on the road when he is faint and weary, but he can never pick the bones of a true believer. He will come out of the den of the giant somehow or other. What a pity that he should ever go into it!

Well, now notice that the man begins to drop in to hear a sermon. It is a long time since he was familiar with the house of prayer; but he finds himself here to-night

AFTER A LONG ABSENCE.

He remembers when he used to be always here, and he almost waters the floor with his tears as he thinks of the happy days which he used to enjoy in the midst of God's people, when he welcomed the light of the Sabbath morning, and the way was never too long for him to come up to the place of his love. In those days the word of the Lord was sweet to him. He has not been for some time, but somehow he felt to-day that he must come again. How welcome he is! How glad I am to see him, though he looks so rough and grizzly, and half-shaved!

I am most of all encouraged with the fact that he begins to feel in his soul an anguish, and a bitterness, and an aching, and a craving, and a longing. I have great hopes of him now that his old feelings are returning. Oh, my dear brother, I was so sorry when you went astray; your backsliding has caused me many a pang of heart; but I begin to rejoice now as I hear you talk in that way, for I think that the text is coming true: "Howbeit the hair of his head began to grow again"! And now, stop till our uneasy friend gets home to-night. Nay, perhaps it will come to pass before he quits this assembly. He begins to pray: "God be merciful to me a sinner!" You notice that Samson began to pray when his hair began to grow; and when they took him into that temple, where they wanted him to make sport for them, he breathed an earnest prayer to God that he might be strengthened but that once to do service to his people and his God. How earnestly do I invite you that have gone back from God and His ways to pray to-night that the Lord will return to you in mercy, fill you to the full once more with His Holy Spirit, and make the bones which He has broken to rejoice!

And if that prayer should go farther still, and you should say, "I will break off every connection that holds me to the paths of sin," this would be better still. If you were to cry, "I know

WHAT DREW ME ASIDE,

I will have no more to do with the evil which destroyed me," it would be a hopeful sign indeed. From our church-fellowship we sometimes find one drawn aside by one motive, and another by another; alas, the ways downward are as plenteous as the gates of death! How many are tempted with unholy loves! How many are seduced by the fatal cup! Ah, how many go aside through false doctrine, heresy, and the delusions of the day! How many are foolishly tempted by their own prosperity! They grow rich, and cannot afford to worship where once they did. On the other hand, how many are led aside by their poverty! They do not think that their clothes are good enough to come in—a piece of pride from which I pray that we may be delivered. Or, because they have come down in the world, and cannot spend as once they did, they forsake their brethren, and their Lord. For different reasons men go aside from truth and holiness; but it is a happy circumstance when they cry, "If I have been led away from Christ by anything sinful, I will give it up.

I think that is the picture which our text paints for us.

II. Now I am going to turn a little way round, still keeping the shorn champion well before us. In the second place, we have to see in our text what it specifically symbolizes—that is to say, this text is of some one thing. You see that Samson's strength lay in his consecration. His hair was the token of his dedication to God. When he lost his locks, he did, as it were, lose his consecration; and when he lost his consecration, he lost his strength. On the other hand, the only way by which he could regain his strength was to re-establish his consecration; and of this the growing again of his hair was the type and token.

Well, now, I know some churches which performed a great work a hundred years ago, or fifty years ago, or less. They do nothing outrageous now; the question is, Are they doing anything? Their minister is an extremely learned man, and as polished as a looking-glass. Of course he never addresses himself to the vulgar, neither does he oppose the views of his cultured hearers. The church itself is highly respectable; no one ever questions its high respectability, or speaks of it without due deference to its prominent position. Yet it has ceased to be a power for good; it has no influence over the mass of sinners around it.

In the opinion of some persons Samson looked much improved when his matted hair was gone. He was more presentable; more fit for good society. And so in the case of churches, the notion is that they are all the better for getting rid of their peculiarities. You who are in the secret know better, and you will follow me while I sorrowfully seek a remedy for the unhappy weakness which has fallen upon many communities which once were strong in the Lord. How is this church, all shaven and shorn, this poor, enslaved, and miserable concern, to be brought back to its old state? How is this Samson, that once was strong, to get its strength back again? Why, only by again. It must be consecrated to God again. The glory of God must take possession of the church instead of its desire to be fashionable and respectable; and when its locks grow again, its strength will come back.

Now, the same truth applies to every preacher. There are some preachers who are splendid men, and yet they are practical failures. You see in them wide knowledge, eloquent language, and yet nothing. They can speak so properly that a senate might sit with admiration at their feet; but when they have done, nobody is pricked in the heart, nobody is convinced of sin, nobody is led to behold the beauties of Christ. Yet in their youth these men were soul-winners, and were looked upon as champions for Christ. O Samson, how are we to make thee strong again? That preacher must begin again to serve God with all his heart. He must give up the idea of being a great man, or a learned man, or an eloquent man. He must give up the idea of charming the élite, and bringing together the fashionable, and must give himself up to glorify God by the winning of souls. When his hair grows again in that respect, we shall see what Samson can do. He will yet lay hold on the pillars of the Philistine temple, and bring them down about the heads of the lords. Give me a man perfectly consecrated, and I do not care much what he is. He may be rough, unpolished, and even illiterate; but if he be consecrated, the people will feel his power.

The same is true of every Christian worker. I have seen this demonstrated over and over again in daily life. If you are to God, you will be strong. I do not say that you will by sincere devotion alone gain all the talents, and all the mental forces you might desire; but, believe me, force does not lie in these; these are like sword and spear, but the strength with which they are to be wielded lies elsewhere. You do not absolutely require great abilities; but you must have perfect consecration. Be thankful if you have javelin and shield, but go on without them if you have not been armed with them; for, to a devoted man, even a castaway bone will be sufficient weapon.

I know Christian people who used to spend an hour a day in prayer. The hour has dwindled into five minutes. They used to be constant at week-night services. They very seldom gladden us with their presence now; and they are not as happy as they once were. I can read this riddle. If a man were to reduce his meals to eating once a week, we could not warrant his health. I would not guarantee that, if a man never ate except on Sundays, he would grow strong. So I do not think that people who neglect the means of grace, and give up their consecration, can expect to be lively, happy, or vigorous. When the razor gets to work, and the hair of conscious, resolute devotion to God begins to fall on the floor, lock after lock, the strength is departing; and only as that hair begins to grow again, and spiritual consecration returns, can these people expect to be useful and strong in the Lord.

III. I will close with this further consideration.

WHAT IT PROPHESIED

when Samson's hair began to grow again. I wonder why these Philistines did not take care to keep his hair from growing to any length. If cutting his hair once had proved so effectual, I wonder that they did not send in the barber every morning, to make sure that not a hair grew upon his scalp or chin. But wicked men are not in all matters wise men; indeed, they so conspicuously fail in one point or another that Scripture calls them fools. The devil himself is a fool, after all. They do not go on cutting off his hair because they fancy that, once lost, the good man's strength is lost forever. Perhaps they said, "Now we have lashed him to the mill; the stronger he gets the more he can grind; therefore let his hair grow, and so he will be the more useful to us." Great was the foolishness of their wisdom; they were fostering their own destruction. Satan, also, is very cunning in getting hold of backsliders, but he generally manages to let them slip by his over-confidence in their wilfulness. Many a man have I seen come back to the dear Saviour on account of the oppression which he has endured from his master, the prince of darkness! If he had been treated well, he might never have returned to Christ any more; but it is not possible for the citizens of the far country to treat prodigals well; sooner or later they starve them, and oppress them, so that they run away home.

When Samson's hair began to grow, what did it prophesy? Well, first, it prophesied

HOPE FOR SAMSON.

I will be bound to say that he put his hand to his head, and felt that it was getting bristly, and then he put his hand to his beard, and found it rough. Yes, yes, yes, it was coming, and he thought within himself, "It will be all right soon. I shall not get my eyes back. They will never grow again. I am an awful loser by my sin, but I shall get my strength back again, for my hair is growing. I shall be able to strike a blow for my people and for my God yet." Now, if any of you have signs of restoring grace in your hearts, and you are coming back to your God and Saviour, be glad, be thankful. Do not hesitate to let your renewed devotion to God be seen by those round about you. Come along, brother, come along; your brethren wait to receive you! Come along, my wandering sister; all the people of God will welcome you!

What did this prophesy? Joy for Samson, but, also, hope for Israel. Oh, if any of the Israelites did get in to see him in prison, how they must have been cheered by the sight of his returning hair! So, my dear brothers and sisters, when we see in you some little signs of grace, and you are coming back, you do not know how cheerily we talk to one another. Why, at the elders' meeting, one of them said, "Our poor brother Jones was at the Tabernacle the other night. You remember him." "Yes, we do remember him, indeed." "Well, he was listening to our pastor; I was so PLEASED TO SEE HIM."

Another brother also said, "I am glad to tell you that Mrs. So-and-so, the sister that went so sadly astray, was outside the chapel; and when I pressed her to come in, she wept, and said she wished she had never gone away. There is a good work going on there." We rejoice together, and we say, "Thank God, they are coming back again!" There is joy not only with the Great Shepherd, but with his friends and his neighbors when the lost sheep is restored to the fold. Do you not know that the Chief Shepherd calls His brethren together, and says, "Rejoice with Me; for I have found My sheep which was lost"?

Lastly, what did it prophesy? Well, it prophesied mischief for the Philistines.

They did not know it, but if they could have read the writing in Samson's heart, they would have understood that he meant to shave their nation quite as closely as they had shaven him. There was a storm brewing for Philistia. When a sinner who has gone astray is restored again, it means mischief to the kingdom of Satan. Oh, how he will serve his God! How he will try to bring back his fellow-sinners! Having had much forgiven, this man will love much, and will serve Jesus much. He will be one of your earnest Christian men, depend upon it. Woe to thee, Philistia, when Samson's hair grows again! Woe to the hosts of evil, when the backslider is restored!

There, I have put it all before you. I have tried to put the matter interestingly; but all the while my heart has been yearning over you that have gone aside. I long for your restoration, for your true conversion. If you have defiled yourselves, may you at once be washed! If you have wandered, may you at once be restored to Jesus and His Church, to the praise and the glory of His grace, wherein He hath made us accepted in the Beloved! Amen.

LETTER FROM MR. SPURGEON.

BELOVED FRIENDS: In answer to many prayers I am raised up, and I am looking forward hopefully to a happy return to my pulpit. True, I am not strong, and may never be long free from my infirmity; but yet I hope to do good service, and at least to "hold the fort." For this I again beg the prayers of many friends, and once more I would say—if these sermons are of any service to you, please spread them by introducing them to fresh friends. Pardon me for repeating this, for I am anxious that I may do all the good I can while I am spared to publish these discourses.

Yours to serve, for Christ's sake,

C. H. SPURGEON.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE BLUES AND THE LANTERNS *

ALMOST every nature, however sprightly, sometimes will drop into a minor key, or a subdued mood that in common parlance is recognized as "the blues." There may be no adverse causes at work, but somehow the bells of the soul stop ringing, and you feel like sitting quiet, and you strike off fifty per cent from all your worldly and spiritual prospects. The immediate cause may be a northeast wind, or a balky liver, or an enlarged spleen, or pickled oysters at twelve o'clock the night before.

In such depressed state no one can afford to sit for an hour. First of all, let him get up and go out of doors. Fresh air, and the faces of cheerful men and pleasant women and frolicsome children will in fifteen minutes kill moping. The first moment your friend strikes the key-board of your soul it will ring music. A hen might as well try on populous Broadway to hatch out a feathery group, as for a man to successfully brood over his ills in lively society. Do not go for relief among those who feel as badly as you do. Let not toothache and rheumatism and hypochondria go to see toothache, rheumatism, and hypochondria. On one block in Brooklyn lives a doctor, an undertaker, and a clergyman. That is not the row for a nervous man to walk on lest he soon need all three. Throw back all the shutters of your soul and let the sunlight of genial faces shine in.

This is a dark world to many people, a world of chills, a world of fog, a world of wet blankets. Nine tenths of the men we meet need encouragement. Your work is so urgent that you have no time to stop and speak to the people; but every day you meet scores, perhaps hundreds and thousands, of persons upon whom you might have direct and immediate influence. "How? how?" you cry out. We answer: by the grace of physiognomy. There is nothing more catching than a face with a lantern behind it, shining clear through. We have no admiration for a face with a dry smile, meaning no more than the grin of a false face. But a smile written by the hand of God, as an index or table of contents to whole volumes of good feeling within, is a benediction.

You say, "My face is hard and lacking in mobility, and my benignant feelings are not observable in the facial proportions." We do not believe you. Freshness and geniality of soul are so subtle and pervading that they will, at some eye or mouth-corner, leak out. Set behind your face a feeling of gratitude to God and kindliness toward man, and you will every day preach a sermon long as the streets you walk, a sermon with as many heads as the number of the people you meet, and differing from other sermons in the fact that the longer it is the better. The reason that there are so many sour faces, so many frowning faces, so many dull faces, is because men consent to be acrid and petulant and stupid. The way to improve your face is to improve your disposition.

SUBSCRIBERS who are interested in horticulture, and who are surprised to find that the editor of a religious journal cannot always answer inquiries which are sometimes puzzling even to a professional florist, may be glad to learn that much of the information they need is published in "The Floral Guide," issued by James Vick, of Rochester, N. Y. He also publishes "The Flower and Vegetable Garden," a book of over 200 pages, with hundreds of illustrations, which is prepared with the special design of helping amateur gardeners.

THE MASON SCIENCE COLLEGE.

(See Illustration.)

THE citizens of Birmingham, England, owe a debt of obligation to Sir Josiah Mason, the extent of which they realize more fully each year. A man of rare mechanical skill and ingenuity, his works gave employment to a large number of men, and increased the prosperity of the town; but it is by his public gifts, which cost him over two million dollars, that he is chiefly remembered. Prominent among them was a large orphanage, and another, of a cognate character, is the Science College, a picture of which appears on this page.

Mason was the son of a Kidderminster carpet weaver, in very poor circumstances, and was employed in his boyhood by a baker, who sent him through the Kidderminster streets every morning to sell hot rolls. The lad was anxious to get on, but there was very little opportunity in that occupation. He thought he would try his fortune in Birmingham, the metropolis of that district. He went there in 1815, and worked at anything he could get to do. He was at one time a shoemaker, then a toymaker, then a jeweller, then a maker of pens and split rings, and then an electro-plater He accumulated an enormous fortune, chiefly in the last-mentioned trade, and determined to devote the bulk of it to charity. Recollecting the struggles of his youth, he resolved to lend a helping hand to others in like circumstances. The Science College was built and endowed for the purpose of giving boys and young men of capacity technical education.

His own words about it in the title deed are: "And the said Josiah Mason hath dedicated a portion of the wealth so acquired in erecting and endowing at Erdington, near Birmingham, an Orphan Asylum for boys and girls; and, being deeply convinced, from his long and varied experience in different branches of manufacture, of the necessity for and benefit of thorough systematic scientific instruction, specially adapted to the artistic requirements of the Midland districts, and particularly of the boroughs of Birmingham and Kidderminster, hath determined to devote a portion of his remaining property to the foundation of an institution wherein such systematic scientific education may be given."

Many a deserving boy now sees his way open to become useful and prosperous through the instruction to be had at the Science College, who but for that might have been compelled to pass his years as a wage-earner, dependent on the caprices of employers. Birmingham is a radical town, in which one may hear some strong words spoken very frequently about the wealthy and the aristocratic classes, but it would not be safe for any speaker denouncing millionaires to speak disrespectfully of Sir Josiah Mason, the giver of the Science College and the Orphanage.

THE NEW FRENCH PREMIER.

(See Portrait.)

OUR sister republic across the sea complains bitterly of her lack of capable statesmen. That she does not complain without cause may be inferred from the fact that Rene Goblet, the Amiens lawyer, whose portrait appears on this page, is now premier. Out of the ministerial crisis of a few weeks back this man has been evolved. He was the only one among the opponents of the Cabinet possessing the small modicum of capacity necessary for the formation of a ministry. The President and the French Legislature have taken him largely on faith; for though M. Goblet has filled some prominent offices in his day, he has never shown any remarkable genius or given proof of brilliant statesmanship. He is, moreover, suspected of being an ally of Clemenceau, who is the leader of the radical section, which in France is more fierce and desperate, probably, than in any country of the world. How much there is in common between the two men cannot be certainly stated, but M. Goblet evidently agrees with the radical leader on religious questions. Possibly the character and conduct of the Roman Catholic priesthood in France may be responsible for this attitude, and the anti-clericalism he has displayed may be founded on dislike of the priests rather than of the religion which many of them disgrace.

M. Rene Goblet is fifty-nine years of age, having been born at Aire-sur-la-Lys in 1828. He has sat in the Chamber of Deputies since 1876. He was also a member of the National Convention of 1871.

THE EMPTY CRADLE.

"WHAT'S wrong wi' George? He's looked all day as if he'd lost a fortune." The question was asked by one laborer of another, as they quitted the scene of the day's labors and saw the man they called George going on ahead of them at a furious rate.

More than one had noticed George's gloomy face that day. He was never hilarious, but was uniformly cheerful, with a quiet happiness that seemed to pervade his entire being—a good, kind, pleasant companion, whose acquaintance was always acceptable to his fellow-workmen. Intelligent, too, and, since he quitted drinking, a very valuable man to his employer. All day, however, George had been taciturn, answering questions in monosyllables, and while he worked with more than his usual ardor, was apparently anxious to work by himself. This was so unlike George's usual course that it was sure to attract notice.

"He's in some trouble," said the workman addressed. "I saw that first thing; but I don't know what it is. He ain't a man you can question."

"That's so; but he's a good sort. I like him, and I am sorry if he's got on the ragged edge."

YES; there was no doubt about George being in trouble. His face showed that as he hurried homeward. Anxious he was, too, and in suspense. The fact was that when he left home that morning his only child, a little girl some fifteen months old, was lying dangerously sick. The doctor was there, and he shook his head. "While there's life there's hope," was the only encouragement he would give, and George knew how much that was worth. The child lay motionless, whether asleep or insensible they could not say. Her face was flushed, her throat pulsating, and her breathing irregular. There were a few breaths, then a pause, which it was agonizing to notice; for would there be another breath? They could not be sure. But after the pause the breathing would begin again, and then after a few more breaths another pause. George and his wife watched in an agony. But work must be done. George tore himself from the side of the little cradle at the usual time for leaving, and went sorrowfully to his labor. There was no good-by kiss this morning, no little clinging arms hugging his neck, no bright little face struggling with the utterance of "Pappap-papa." A silent pressure of his hand on his wife's shoulder as she bent over the cradle and a nod, and then he was gone. What would his coming home be?

He walked rapidly now, but as he entered the street in which his home was, his steps slackened. George was afraid. Terrible as the suspense had been all day, the strong, bearded man trembled as he was approaching knowledge. Certainty might be worse than suspense. But what was the use of lingering? It could not change the fact, whatever it might be. The man braced himself up, and went forward to learn whether the light of his life still shone or had gone out in the darkness of death.

He opened his door noiselessly and stepped inside. There was no need to ask. There was the empty cradle, and his wife sat not far off, crying and sobbing as if her heart would break. "When—" George began huskily. He could get no farther; but his wife understood.

"About noon," she said. "She never opened her eyes after you left. She just quietly stopped breathing—never struggled at all. The loveliest smile came over her face when it was all over. Come up and look at her."

The Empty Cradle.

George went, and the sturdy man and his wife wept together over the little bier on which lay the treasure which millions of dollars could not have bought of them. They came down again, and George flung himself into his chair and looked despairingly at the empty cradle. His wife saw that blank look on his face, and knew what it meant. The manly heart within was bleeding. She went to him, leaned on his shoulder, and wept. She could not console him, but she could remind him that he was not alone in his grief.

It was a touching sight, and one that appealed strongly to the warm, sympathetic heart of the Christian pastor who entered at that moment. It was not an easy task on which he was entering. Resignation, acquiescence in the will of God, were far away from both hearts. How could he bring them near? There was no other issue which promised peace and comfort. Yet rebellion, the sense of being hardly used, was written plainly on George's face. "The Lord hath dealt very bitterly with me" were the words he would have spoken had he broken silence. It was hopeless, and the pastor felt that it was.

"Let us pray," he said briefly. George and his wife looked up in surprise and as if the thought of prayer had not occurred to them in their sorrow. But they knelt down, and the prayer ascended to God. When they rose the work was done. Their hearts were filled with "the peace of God which passeth understanding." Their loved one was with God; that was the thought that was the balm. What an ineffable idea! With God! The father and mother were Christians, and had often sung "Nearer, my God, to Thee." Their child was there. What unutterable bliss must she be feeling now! And they were going, too. A few more years and they, too, would be with God, and the little, gentle, loving spirit would surely welcome them then. She was not lost—only gone before.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

A Lecture in a Carriage.

THE famous physician was no bigot. No one ever said that of Sir Jarvis. His mind was open to the reception of truth, and he had lived long enough in the world to know that a theory which his reason rejected as false, which was diametrically opposed to his conception of the truth, might still be worth examination, and might, when thoroughly analyzed, be found to contain a germ of truth. All false systems, false creeds, and false philosophies have a truth in them; if they had not, they could not live. They would die and become putrid if they did not hold some little truth, which acts as the preserving salt. Sir Jarvis, knowing this, was not disposed to reject utterly the idea of his interesting patient. True he was not conscious that God was directing him—did not believe it, in fact. But how was it that this fortunate series of events occurred? He did not know. Ethel had given him her explanation, and he pondered over it, not rejecting it, not accepting it, but studying it with interest. Probably there was nothing supernatural in the affair, he said to himself, but there might be a natural reason for it. None knew better than Sir Jarvis that there are mental forces in operation which are a mystery still to the wisest men. A man thinking intently of his friend, who is separated from him by thousands of miles of land and sea, learns afterward that his friend felt the influence of his thought, and probably receives a letter from him, saying that he is moved or impelled or disposed to write him, and his correspondent sees by the date of the letter that the moving influence operated at the very time that he was intently thinking of him. Who can explain it? We have yet much to learn, and thinking of this, and other mental phenomena, Sir Jarvis sat up late into the night.

In the course of the next day Dr. Feltham Greaves, the electrical specialist recommended by Sir Jarvis Mainwaring, arrived at Aspen Towers, bringing with him the appliances which, as he firmly believed, were destined to be a powerful ally in expelling disease and in bringing back to the flow the ebbing tide of strength and life.

All honor to the men whose noble powers of mind and whose high attainments are engaged in the nobler work of alleviating human suffering, and of redeeming the sick and afflicted ones from the cruel grip of dire disease and the peril of an untimely death. If they would but place themselves under Christ's guidance, and labor as stanch and faithful allies and servants of the Good Physician, how vastly grander, even than now, would their glorious triumphs be!

Once, twice, thrice was Ethel subjected to the gentle but subtle and potent forces now brought to bear on her mysterious disease. It did not seem as though any sure results would follow. But Dr. Greaves was an enthusiast. He had perfect faith in the course of treatment he was pursuing; and he added to his faith patience, and let patience have her perfect work. Then there came a favorable sign or two, slight but real. Then, little by little, it was seen that the stern grip of paralysis was relaxing, and tokens of returning vital force appeared that could not be misunderstood.

It was slow and tedious work at first; but the tedium was wonderfully lessened by the constant advancement to assured success. Fingers could be moved; then the hands obeyed the action of the wrist. Then the arms could be raised; and then the lower limbs began to act responsive to their owner's call. The icy bonds were slowly melting, and medical skill and wise dietings aided in the task. Of course Sir Jarvis Mainwaring could not stay to watch the process of cure; but, assured of its fair promise, he rose early one morning and retired from the scene with his well-earned cheque in his pocket-book, and, sooth to say, a warm, glad feeling at his heart.

As the carriage which bore him to Chilworth station passed the front gate of Simon Holmes's garden, that good man and true was standing there, and he ventured to ask the coachman the question that was next his heart. "How is Miss Ethel this morning?"

"Better, Simon!" curtly replied coachman Smailes in jubilant tones. Sir Jarvis was struck with the eager way in which the question was asked. He at once recollected the name mentioned by the coachman as the one Sir Godwin had used, and guessed that this was his patient's humble friend. He was much taken with the fine intelligent countenance of the village carpenter, and called upon the coachman to stop.

Simon was dressed, not in his ordinary work-a-day attire, but in his Sunday suit of decent black, and with his stout oaken stick in his hand was evidently going on a journey. As Sir Jarvis put his head out of the carriage, Simon lifted his broad-brimmed hat in respectful greeting. His impressive features, especially his lofty brow and long gray hair, gave him quite a patriarchal look.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Simon, respectfully, expecting a rebuke for addressing the coachman at such a time. "There isn't a soul i' Aspendale that won't eat their breakfast better for hearing good news about the young lady; an' as I'm goin' through the dale to Chilworth, I thowt I would like to tell 'em as I went, let alone that such news as that would be better than brek'fast or dinner to myself."

"To Chilworth, are you, carpenter?" said Sir Jarvis, pleasantly. "Then jump in and let me act the good Samaritan for once. You can tell the news when you come back, and it will sharpen the good folks' appetite for dinner or for tea."

Like a sensible fellow as he was, Simon did as he was told, and took his seat opposite, as if to the manner born. Sir Jarvis was more willing than he would have cared to own to know more of Miss Ethel's peculiar "philosophy," and as Simon was the Gamaliel at whose feet she sat, he seized the opportunity to study it a little further. "I'm glad to be able to give you a lift," said he. "It's a stiffish walk to Chilworth for a man of your years."

"I's varry much obliged to yo', sir. I can't manage it quite so briskly as I used to; but I expect I should ha' been picked up either by the miller's cart, or by some farmer's wagon going to 'liver corn at Chilworth station. I sartainly didn't expect to do the journey i' this style;" and Simon surveyed the luxurious appointments of the baronet's brougham with an admiring eye. Then turning at once to more important matters, he continued, "Excuse me, sir, for makin' so free, but, aboot Miss Ethel; she's goin' to get better, isn't she?"

"That's a statement and a question," said Sir Jarvis, with a smile. "The question I can understand; but what makes you say 'she's going to get better?'"

"Why, I'll tell yo', sir. Me an' my 'Becca, that's my wife, and Nance, that's my dowter, an' Miss Ethel herself, hev' all been at work asking Him that says, 'Ask, an' it shall be given you,' to give her back her health, both for her sake an' her father's sake, but mair especially for her brother's sake, that she may bring him back again. But, mebbe—"

Here the carpenter paused. He had a strong objection to anything like the exposure of other people's misdoings, and he was not sure how much his listener really knew. "Oh, yes, I know," said Sir Jarvis, fully appreciating his motives. "If you could save that young prodigal it would be a grand thing."

"Wouldn't it?" said Simon, bringing his broad hand down upon his knee with a slap that startled the dignified medico. "My word! It would mak' ivery angel i' heaven shoot a extra halleluia! An' Miss Ethel's goin' to do it, thenks to you, sir, an' the good God that's showed yo' hoo to raise her up!"

"The Lord that showed you how." Sir Jarvis was fairly startled at the thought. He could not get away from it; his singular dream, and all that it had led to, came back into his mind. Was he really an instrument in the hands of God for the work of answering these people's prayers? Anxious to draw out his companion on these subjects, he inquired, "Don't you think that it is very strange and mysterious that this dear young lady, who is too good to do harm to anybody, should be made to suffer so much and so long?"

"Yis, sir," said Simon. "There's no doot aboot that. But it didn't come by chance. That's where faith i' God comes in. Sorrowful days an' wearisome neets were appointed to her, a great many on 'em, bless her! But then, you see, sir, they were appointed. They were all the pairt of a plan. What the entire plan was we can't tell, though we're getting a bit of a inklin' aboot sum on it. As for the rest, we just ha' to leeave it, as we ha' to leeave a good monny things i' this wo'ld besides. There isn't a lad that goes to school, that doesn't wonder what for he's to get off this or larn that. But the schoolmaister knoas, an' he just goes on teachin' him as though he understood all aboot it. An' what are we all, I should like to knoa, but just lads at a school? It's gi'en to you an' sitch as you to be i' t' fost class, and mebbe you stand at t' top on't, but, between you an' t' schoolmaster, there's a mighty gap, excuse me, sir, after all, an' you're soon browt up plump ageean a mystery.

"I recollect goin' some years back to see a ribbin factory i' company with a clever fello' with a lot of gumption aboot machinery an' sitch as that. There was one piece o' clockwork or something like it that interested him amazin'ly. There was a lot o' wheels an' threads spinnin' aboot i' all directions, an' for the life of 'im he couldn't understand it. 'I should like to see into that an' examine it a little bit,' he said to the foreman. 'You can't do that,' the man said; 'it's all connected with something i' that big chest that's kept locked.' 'Let me look in,' says my friend. Says the man at once, 'The maister hez the key.' That settled it. Noo, sir, it flashed upo' my mind like leetnin' that's just the answer to all oor questions aboot a mystery that perplexes us, The Maister hez the key. You see, t' ribbins was all right an' beautiful, though the chest was shut an' we couldn't understand it. An' so God's works an' workin's are all right, all of 'em, though we can't mak' 'em oot. It's grand to think that they aren't at the beck an' call o' poor blunderin' mortals. All's right, sir, all must be right, don't yo' see, because t' Maister hez the key."

"Then you really believe," said the physician, who felt that he must content himself with inquiries, "that God has full control, and exercises it over all the events of every life, and influences you and me to serve His purposes?"

"Believe it?" said Simon, with a look of unfeigned wonder, "of course I believe it, an' so do you, don't yo'? I shouldn't ha' gi'en you credit, or, rayther, discredit, o' thinkin' 'at we're all of us livin' happy-go-lucky like, wi' no more plan nor purpose then flints hev when they're skelled up oot of a farmer's cart. You don't suppose, do yo', that you could ha' done Miss Ethel sitch a good turn this visit if He hadn't put yo' up to tryin' a new thing that you scarce heeard aboot until yo' com' to the varry spot w'ere it was wanted? My 'prentice lad Dick's just gone to put a cooat o' paint on Sir Godwin's park gates. Noo, do you think that t' lad fancies that pot o' paint's jummled itself togither to the right color? He hadn't knowledge anuff to do it hisself, so I did it afore I sent him off. He was busy aboot something else until he had to go, an' when he was riddy it was riddy, an' he's just usin' what was provided for him. An' that's what you an' t'other London doctor's doin' at the Hall this minute. Efter all, we're none of us no better than 'prentice lads. Our business is to be good lads, an' to do as t' Maister tells us. Excuse me for being so bold."

"Oh, don't mention it," said Sir Jarvis; "I am very glad to hear your views upon these subjects. But you must admit that they have puzzled wiser heads than either yours or mine."

"No doot, no doot. These things is often hid from the wise an' prudent, an' at the same tahme they're revealed unto babes. There's Miss Ethel, for instance, she knows that the cup she hez to drink is of her Heavenly Father's mixin'. She drinks it with a submission, an' a patience, an' a contentment that's beautiful to see. You've been among 'em a good deal; ha' yo' iver seen ony o' the wise heads that's made less of a wry face than she hez? It's nobbut a bee that can suck honey oot of a thistle-floo'er, an' that's the little quick-wing that hez t' sweetest store o' good things when winter storms blow keen. After all, I can't help thinkin' that Miss Ethel's is the wiser head, an' she believes in a Father's care, God bless her! Long may she do so. We can't do better, sir, than follow the 'babe's' example."

"You were saying," said Sir Jarvis, who felt that matters were getting serious and that the atmosphere of the carriage was rather hot, "that you've been praying for Miss Spofforth's recovery. Tell me, now—you seem to be a sensible and intelligent man—do you really believe that the natural course of things can be altered by doing that kind of thing? Can you for one moment imagine that the laws of nature are to be interfered with in that fashion?"

"The laws o' natur'!" said Simon, fixing his gray eyes on the physician's face with a mixture of rebuke and wonder on his features. "If they are 'laws,' I suppose Somebody must ha' laid em doon. You can't ha' laws without a lawmaker. An' if He can mak' sitch things as them, it surely isn't ower mitch to imagine that He can control 'em. You don't suppose that He's meeade an engine that runs away with Him or from Him, an' that He can't stop or slacken it if He's so minded. An' as for t' natural coorse o' things, as yo' call it, if things do go in a 'coorse,' why, Somebody must ha' chalked it oot for 'em an' started 'em off; a Somebody that keeps 'em in it an' at it all the tahme. A man is a fool that can say when he sees all the motions of natur', an' sees hoo they all fit one into another like spooakes in a wheel, an axle in a naff, an' a ball in a socket, 'at there's no God, as David said afore you an' me were born. You might just as well draw them front blinds doon, an' lean back i' your seat an' listen to the noise o' the wheels, an' watch the coorse o' the carriage, an' say, 'There isn't a driver, nobbut a hoss!' Noo, if you just call oot to Smailes he can slacken or quicken pretty much as he likes, an' even whip t'cooach roound an tak' yo' back again if he wants. If you beleeave that the Somebody who drives things along the ordinary coorse o' natur' hez less poo'er accordin'ly than Smailes the coachman, or hez less care and kindness for them He carries, I must just tak' the liberty o' sayin' I don't beleeave yo'—there! An' you may set mé doon on the highway if you like for bein' so plain spokken."

Sir Jarvis Mainwaring, M.D., F.R.S., etc., really had not the courage to say that he did mean it. He did not care to face another rebuke from the man whose faith in God was so well based. He preferred to remain under the imputation of double-dealing, and was not sorry, perhaps, when their arrival at Chilworth station put an end to the situation. The physician took the next train to town, thinking of the Somebody who guides the course of things; the Charioteer who, with unseen bit and bridle had driven him through his singular dream, and had then put him into double harness with Dr. Feltham Greaves to draw Ethel Spofforth along the ordinary course of things toward health and strength.

There was no doubt in the mind of the great physician nor in the mind of those who ministered to the patient sufferer that she was tending in that direction. She grew better daily, and it was almost possible to see an hourly advance.

With improved health, too, came an increased longing for her brother's moral and spiritual recovery. She and the godly carpenter had entered into a holy league, and thrice a day their prayers rose to heaven, that the wanderer, far as he had wandered, might be brought back again to home and God. For this, as they both believed, the maiden had been raised from a bed of death.

At times the faith of the fair girl would droop, but her purpose never wavered for an hour. On such occasions she would seek the carpenter's cottage, or induce Nancy to fetch him to the Towers, in order that she might catch an inspiration from his noble philosophy and his lofty faith. "Is it possible now?" she said one day to him. "At times I cannot think it is."

"To be sure it is, miss," Simon answered with a smile. "As soon as ivver a bod closses its wings it drops. Nowt so nat'ral. Impossible's a wod that poor mortals ha' offen to use when it's aboot something that they're consarned in. But wi' God it's different. 'With God all things are possible.' We must get hode o' that an' keep it. There was a great man once 'at said that wi' the lever he could move the wo'ld, wi' all its weight; if he could only find a spot to set it. You hev the lever; it's faith; an' you hev a spot to set it; it's the rock of God's omnipotence; an' you don't want to move a wo'ld, only a blunderin' lad that you want to move a bit nearer to God and Thorpe Aspen. What do you think, yourself, noo? Is it over much to hope for?"

"Oh, no, no, Simon! It's only my poor foolish fears that speak. Thank you, dear friend. Harold will come home, and that will be 'just as I expected,'" and the sweet maiden laughed at her own fears.

"That's right, Miss Ethel. That's right. Leave it all to God. When I'm makin' a cart-wheel, it would be a queer thing if one of the spokes could say, 'I can't get into that hole i' the naff. It's impossible.' If it did I should just point t' end on it a bit to give it a start, an' then I should tak' the great hammer an' in it would go like all t' rest on 'em. You an' me are nowt but tools an' instruments, an' it would be odd if the Almighty couldn't manage us and employ us to do His work as well as I can manage a cart-wheel. Let us do His will an' trust Him, an' lean on Him, and lean hard."

LOT'S CHOICE.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 6, Gen. 13 : 1-14. Golden Text, Matt. 6 : 33.

Abram Managing His Own Life—His Schemes for Self-Preservation—Going to Egypt to Avoid Famine—Prevarication About His Wife—Lot Affected by His Inconsistency—The Strife of the Herdmen—Abram's Magnanimity—Lot's Selfish Decision—His Rapid Degeneracy—Unexplored Territory of Promise—Abram's Life of Fellowship.

ABRAM was not faultless; man of faith though he was, he sometimes acted without getting God's counsel. As long as he continued in the land of promise, his communion with God was fresh and constant, the Lord appeared unto him, and he built altars unto the Lord. But by and by he came into new and unexpected circumstances, and without waiting to ask God's direction, he left the land of promise, and went down into Egypt. By this very act he implied that the God who had called him out of idolatry, and from his own land and people, had either not the power or not the will to feed him when the food supply of the land where he was sojourning failed. His descendants discovered later that God has granaries in heaven; "He sent them bread from heaven to eat," and Elijah learned that God could turn the ravens into stewards of His bounty. It is here that so many of us fail—we do not turn and ask God what we shall do, we do what we think to be the best thing to do under the circumstances, and do not give God the chance to do better for us than we can devise. At all times His ways are higher than our ways, and His thoughts than our thoughts.

Abram having taken his own way, got down altogether on to a human level. Having provided for his sustenance, he provided against possible danger, and, lest he should be slain for his wife's sake he resorted to prevarication, and called her his sister, and not his wife. Outwardly, all seemed, for a time, to go well with him, and he became rich. But the charge of God, "Be thou a blessing" was meanwhile suspended, and, instead of his bringing blessing and the knowledge of God into Pharaoh's house, "the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues because of Sarai, Abram's wife." After a while his duplicity was discovered, and he left Egypt,

LEAVING NO SAVOR OF GOD BEHIND HIM.

Once more on true ground, once more in the will of God, we hear of Abram again calling on the name of the Lord. Although he had been guilty of declension God was not changed toward him; yet Abram could not get right with God until he came "unto the altar which he had made there at the first." There is no way back to God but the way of confession, and the precious blood of Christ.

"None of us liveth to himself;" if we are not a blessing to those around us, we are a hindrance to them. Every person in a religious meeting who is occupied with God is an untold help to that meeting; every one who is engaged in criticising those who speak and pray creates around him an atmosphere which grieves the Holy Spirit of God. A restful spirit in a home, i.e., a person who is one with the will of God all the time, whether it be master, mistress, child or servant, is an unspeakable blessing; the influence of that one affects the whole house, and, on the contrary, every Christian in a house who is restless, dissatisfied, uncertain about the will of God, creates an atmosphere similar to that of his own spirit. We can only be a blessing to others as far as we are ourselves in the current of God's blessing. It is wonderful how a mother finds her children much more patient and amenable to discipline when she herself is resting in the Lord.

ABRAM'S DEFECTION TOLD ON LOT:

he as well as Abram had grown rich in Egypt, and then arose a difficulty, "the land was not able to bear them that they might dwell together. Some of the unemployed of London, had they lived in those days, might have helped them by relieving them of some of their cattle and setting up in business for themselves at a sufficient distance. But the thought of giving away what they had does not seem to have occurred to either of them. Their herdmen attempted to take matters into their own hands and fight it out. Lot did not demur at letting them do so, but Abram had the mind of God, and said: "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen, for we be brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me; if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or, if thou depart to the right hand, I will go to the left." The Canaanite and the Perizzite were looking on to see how men of God settled their differences. Abram was the elder, and, surely, had Lot acted aright he would have referred the choice back to his uncle. But Lot had seen that uncle in two instances provide for his own interests—once in going down to Egypt to escape the famine, and once in disowning Sarah. Lot had some knowledge of God. In the New Testament he is called "just (or justified) Lot" (II Pet. 2 : 7), but

and God second. The divine order is: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6 : 33). Abram was doing this, but Lot was not. The young man deferred neither to God nor man, but chose for himself. He "lifted up his eyes," not to God, but to the well-watered plains, and he saw in them a prospect of increasing riches and greatness, saw himself a large cattle-owner, doing an extensive business, saw, in the near distance, a large family well settled, and himself a great man. "Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan" (the best for himself) "and Lot journeyed east." It was not long before he forsook the country, and, giving up the life of a pilgrim and stranger upon earth he "dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom," although "the men of Sodom were wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly." Lot had many servants, yet, he demurred not to remove them from the holy influence of Abram to the proximity of the men of Sodom. Impurity had reached such a height in Sodom that it has given a name to the most loathsome sin even up to this day, yet, rather than be a poor man Lot exposed his people to the contaminating influence of this vile city. Are there no members of churches in our day whose hands are unclean by having to do with the liquor traffic, which, while it is making them rich, is slaying its hundreds of thousands? We have heard of some such who own houses of ill-fame, and live upon the proceeds of the shame of our fallen sisters, and who, nevertheless, are members of churches. O God, are such things done in the name of Christ?

FOR THE SAKE OF HIS OWN GAIN,

Lot's separation from him was a blessing to Abram, although a curse to Lot himself. "The Lord said unto Abram after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes and look from the place where thou art, northward and southward and eastward and westward. For all the land thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever." Free from the half-hearted Lot, Abram could better take in the greatness of God's promises. How often have we been hampered by contact with those who were not willing to go all lengths with God. We have dreaded a rupture with them, perhaps, yet, when God has brought it about, it has been one of the greatest blessings to us. There is a vast territory of God's promises which, as yet, the Church of God has but timidly touched, a northward and southward, an eastward and a westward which we have not explored; but God is calling men and women of faith in believing prayer. "All the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it and to thy seed forever." Abram never possessed the soil, he and his sons "all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. 11 : 13). All that they had, they had by faith, and yet in the present they had God, a real living God with whom they communed, and who guided and cared for them in the minutest way, and who led them "to desire a better country, that is, an heavenly, wherefore He is not ashamed to be called their God." This life of faith is for us also; we have in ourselves no stock of holiness or wisdom, of physical strength, or of aught else, yet the provision of all these things which we have in God and hold by faith, to draw on when the need arises, is far greater than the little horizon of our experience can include. "Arise, walk through the land, in the length of it and in the breadth of it, for I will give it unto thee." The response of Abraham to this glorious declaration of God was to move his tent, and to dwell in the plains of Mamre which is Hebron (fellowship), and he "built there an altar unto the Lord." A life of faith is

A LIFE OF FELLOWSHIP WITH GOD.

He manifests Himself to His believing ones as He does not unto the world, and thus lets them know His mind and enter into it. Those who live a life of faith in God cannot rejoice in any holiness, power, or wisdom of their own, or in themselves in any way, any more than Abram could rejoice in the possession of the promised land; rather, like him, can they rejoice in the lack, for in Christ dwelling in them they have His holiness, the life of Jesus manifested in their mortal bodies (II Cor. 4 : 10), and consequent continuous fellowship with Him. They can say with Paul, "I have been crucified with Christ yet I live, and yet no longer I but Christ liveth in me, and that life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself up for me" (Gal. 2 : 20 R.V.).

LITTLE THINGS.

BY LILLA M. ALEXANDER.

It was only a little word,
But God alone may know,
How it saved a soul from the downward path,
And a life of shame and woe.
It was only a little word,
Yet its cruel, stinging smart,
Estranged a friend who had loved us long,
And wounded a faithful heart.

It was only a glance from an eye,
By sympathy filled with tears,
But its memory clings, like the perfume of flowers,
Whose fragrance grows sweeter with years.
It was only a scornful look,
And a haughty, contemptuous air,
But it maddened a soul that was seeking for help,
And hurried it on to dispair.

It was only the touch of a hand,
But it helped the fallen to rise;
And the Saviour smiled as its record was made,
In the book that before Him lies.
It was only a little thing,
Just to pass on the other side,
But it gave into Satan's power, a soul
For whom Christ, the Lord, had died.

Oh, the little things of life,
Scarce noticed along our way,
May jewel a crown, or condemn a soul,
In the light of the judgment day.
Whatsoever ye do! O, hear it!
Do all to the glory of God;
If you seek the reward of the faithful,
You must follow where Jesus has trod.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST AT HAND—The Lord Jesus Christ said: "Search ye the Scriptures, for in them ye have eternal life. There is a celestial life, being as the angels of God at the resurrection" (Matt. xxii., 30), which Jesus showed while he said to Mary, "Touch me not" (St. John, xx., 17). "There is a life of the mortal body made immortal" (I. Cor., xv., 54), which Jesus showed in saying: "Handle Me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have" (Luke, xxiv., 39). "We know that through sin the death of the body has come" (Romans, v., 12). "But the time is at hand that sin (and with sin the death of the body) shall be taken away" (Romans, xi, 27); "And this shall be fulfilled in Israel" (Ezekiel 18-31). This volume is without doubt the most complete and satisfactory as well as the largest and cheapest book of Bible Readings published.

One very valuable feature of this work and where it differs from other books of a somewhat similar character, is in the line of thought being given with very nearly every scripture reference quoted, without which a book of Bible Readings is of little more help than an ordinary concordance in preparing for this useful branch of Christian instruction.

The Four Irish Leaders of the "Plan of Campaign"—Scene at their Recent Arrest.

THE ARRESTED IRISH LEADERS.

A CABLEGRAM announcing the arrest of the four Irish members of Parliament, who are conducting "the plan of campaign," has already been published in our news columns; we are now enabled to publish portraits of the arrested men, and a picture of the scene at their capture.

The Plan of Campaign.

as some of our readers are aware, is a device to embarrass the owners of estates in Ireland, who are demanding higher rents than the tenants and their friends in the National League think they ought to pay. There are courts to which tenants so situated may appeal, but very frequently they have not the funds necessary to enter suit in those courts; it was therefore proposed by Mr. Dillon and his colleagues that the tenants should combine and form a fund for common defence. This he called the plan of campaign. He proposed that in all cases in which a landowner declined to make the reduction in rents demanded of him, his tenants should offer him a certain sum proportioned to the total market value of the produce of their holdings. If he declined to accept that sum in full discharge of rent, the tenant should deposit it in the hands of trustees and notify the landlord of the names and addresses of the trustees, who were authorized to pay it over to him on his application. If the owner proceeded to evict the tenant, the trustees were to turn the money into a general fund established to defend tenants in the law courts, and keep them from want. The four men, whose portraits appear on the first page, acted as trustees in such cases, and it is for doing so that they have been arrested and are being prosecuted. When the arrests were made, the police seized the money and books in the possession of the prisoners. The men were placed under bonds, and ordered to refrain from receiving more money for the purpose, which the courts describe as conspiracy to defraud.

MR. JOHN DILLON, M.P.

IN the eyes of the Irish people the triumvirate of patriotic leaders who have a claim on their allegiance consists of Michael Davitt, Mr. Parnell, and John Dillon. The last-named is now Member of Parliament for East Mayo. He is the son of John Blake Dillon, one of the rebels of '48, and was a surgeon in large and lucrative practice before he took to politics. He was born in 1851, and is therefore now thirty-six years of age. He was educated at the University of Dublin, and is a fully qualified licentiate of the Royal College of Surgeons of Ireland.

He is a tall, delicate man, with decidedly consumptive tendencies. Serious illness compelled him to resign his seat in the last Parliament, when he departed to recruit his health on the farm of his brother in Colorado. He has jet black hair, and large, calm, contemplative eyes. He has the reputation of saying the most violent things in a most melancholy monotone. He is an impassioned and determined intransigant, and was the most extreme and daring spirit of the Land League struggle, as he is now conspicuous for his defiant persistence of purpose as a Nationalist leader. In the discussions in Parliament which preceded the Coercion Act of 1881, he occupied a prominent position.

MR. D. SHEEHY, M.P.

THIS leader, who sits in Parliament for South Galway, was born at Broadford, Limerick, in 1844, and is therefore forty-three years of age. His father was a well-known business man at Mallow, who was highly respected and very successful. His son David, whose portrait appears on our front page, after receiving a liberal education at the Jesuit Seminary at Limerick, and the Irish College, at Paris, in 1867, joined his father as partner in the establishment, and upon his shoulders at the present time are devolved the responsibilities and anxieties of a considerable commercial enterprise. He is a brother of the Father Sheehy who was one of the late Mr. W. E. Forster's suspects. He was taken into custody with his colleagues, Messrs. Dillon, Harris, and O'Brien, on the occasion of the police raid at Loughrea, illustrated on the first page.

MR. M. HARRIS, M.P.

ANOTHER of the arrested leaders is Mr. Harris, Member of Parliament for East Galway. He is now fifty-seven years old, having been born of humble peasant parentage in 1830. He has advanced in life from a journeyman slater to a road contractor and a master-builder. He has been more or less prominently connected with every Irish political movement since he was eighteen years old, and in every one of them he has been, for undaunted daring, what, in French revolutionary times, would have been called a "Member of the Mountain." He was one of the Young Irelanders in the early days of the Home Rule movement in Athlone. Latterly, he has been a most pronounced Land Leaguer, and, more conspicuous still, one of the traversers in the famous case of the Queen vs. Parnell. Mr. Harris is described as having a fierce eye and a bitter tongue—qualities not uncommon in the Irish Parliamentary party.

MR. W. O'BRIEN, M.P.

THE fourth portrait on the first page completes the quartette of the political prisoners. It is that of Mr. W. O'Brien. He was born at Mallow, in 1852, and is now thirty-five years of age. He received his education at the Diocesan College, Cloyne, and the Queen's College, Cork. He is recognized both by friends and opponents as a great power in Ireland. He is the editor of United Ireland—the official organ of the Parnellite Party—a weekly paper with a large circulation throughout Ireland, conducted with remarkable skill and vigor. Mr. O'Brien, who is justly described as an Irreconcilable, is physically a tall, slim, weakly-built man, with a decidedly intellectual cast of countenance. The energy with which he has entered into the struggle in Ireland, the arduous labor he has performed, and the intrepidity with which he denounces his opponents are alike remarkable in a man of his physical constitution. He is one of the ablest and most active of Mr. Parnell's lieutenants. The bitterness infused into personal relationships in Parliament through the policy pursued by his party, is said to be exceedingly distasteful to him; but he accepts readily all the penalties of the position, which often include social ostracism, in the belief, mistaken or otherwise, that he is thereby serving the interests of Ireland.

Before Mr. O'Brien was appointed editor of United Ireland, he was on the literary staff of the Freeman's Journal. It was in 1883 that he was elected by South Tyrone to represent it in Parliament, and the contest, ending in his victory, was remarkable for the fact that the Solicitor-General stood against him. At the time of his candidature he was awaiting trial for a bitter libel on Lord Spencer; but the trial came to nothing, through the disagreement of the jury. He is a graduate of that Irish Parliamentary College, her Majesty's Prison, for he was imprisoned for six months under the Coercion Act. During this time he was permitted to leave the prison daily on parole, accompanied by a warder, to visit his mother, who was suffering from consumption in an advanced stage. She died only a day or two after her son was released.

THE RAID AT LOUGHREA.

PURSUANT to "the plan of campaign" a Nationalist rent office was opened in December at Loughrea, where it was known that a large number of tenants would be likely to avail themselves of its facilities. The expectation was fulfilled. No sooner were the offices opened than men came in with the money refused by the landlords as insufficient, and the coffers of the Nationalists were filling. The law officers of the Government, however, had been consulted, and gave it as their opinion that "the plan of campaign" was a conspiracy to defraud.

In ordinary circumstances that opinion would be valid. Very short work would be made of such an arrangement made, for example, in this country. Any man who owns houses here would have no difficulty in obtaining legal power to enforce his demand that his tenants should either pay the rent agreed upon, or vacate the houses. If they combined to resist the demand the courts would speedily crush such a combination. It was therefore not to be wondered at that the landowners of Ireland should have invoked the law for their protection. An Irish Nationalist, himself, would, if he had been in America and owned a house, have done precisely the same thing.

It is the exceptional circumstances in which the Irish land question is just now situated which give to the defence of the case extenuating features. The tenants claim that the rents are so high that they cannot get enough produce from their farms to pay for food and clothing if they pay the stipulated rent. They also object to leave their farms, which political economists cannot but regard as an unreasonable position to occupy. But political economists do not recognize sentiment, while the Irish tenants cannot, or will not bow to the decrees of logic or political economy. Thus there is a deadlock which has presented a stubborn front to English statesmen.

The dictum of the Government law officers was duly put in force at Loughrea. The police made a raid on the Rent Office, seized the books and papers, which contained a record of the sums of money, due for rent to the landlords, which the tenants had deposited, in the hands of the trustees, in accordance with the "plan of campaign," and the sum of $405, which had just been received from the tenants of Lord Clanricarde was impounded. The crowd of peasants outside the house naturally became alarmed and angry, but though numerous threats were uttered, the armed police force was strong enough to prevent any outbreak of mob violence. The four trustees, whose portraits appear on the first page, were arrested on and in the terms of the legal document served upon them were required to "show cause why informations should not be taken, and why you and each of you should not be sent for trial, for that you, with others, within three months last past intending to injure owners of farms in Ireland, let at rents to tenants, did unlawfully conspire, combine, confederate, and agree to solicit large numbers of such tenants in breach of their contracts of tenancy to refuse to pay and not to pay to the said owners of such farms the rents which they, the said tenants, were and might become lawfully bound to pay, and which the said owners were and might become lawfully entitled to be paid under the said contracts of tenancy, against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown, and dignity." Upon Mr. John Dillon, the same day, a copy of the order of the Queen's Bench was also served, calling upon him to give bail in £2000 to be of good behavior, or in default to go to jail for twelve months.

Bail was promptly furnished, but Mr. Dillon evidently holds a different definition of good behavior from that held by the Government. In a speech subsequently delivered he said: "I gave bail to be of good behavior, and I told them so in court, because I say that the best behavior I know of to-day is to carry out the "plan of campaign." I gave bail to be of good behavior because I mean to continue to the best of my ability the behavior which I have observed for the last two months, believing, as I do, that no man in Ireland who pretends to-day to be a representative of the people of Ireland is of good behavior, or is doing his duty by his country and his constituents, who does not raise his voice and use his utmost exertions to save the people from ruin and starvation."

At the Trial

a remarkable proof was given of the ability of the Irish leaders, and they showed that the skill for which Irish lawyers have been noted for many generations still survives. Mr. Dillon and his fellow-defendants had the audacity to call as witnesses for their defence the very men who were prosecuting them. The object was to prove that the rents were excessive, and Mr. Dillon suspected that these Government officials believed them to be excessive, and that they had privately remonstrated with the landowners. One of these witnesses was Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, a prominent member of Lord Salisbury's Cabinet, and the Secretary for Ireland. Under examination he admitted that the Government themselves brought pressure to bear upon the landlords who did not reduce their exorbitant rents. Sir Michael admitted that the improvement in the condition of the country was the result of the abatements made by good landlords, of the pressure put upon bad ones by the Government, and of the dispensing with the power exercised by county court judges. The charge against Dillon and others was that they confederated to bring pressure upon landlords to abate unjust rents. Thus it was proved that Dillon and his colleagues had only done in one way precisely what the Government had done in another. The defence was as triumphant as it was amusing.

Mr. John Dillon has commenced an action against Inspectors O'Brien and Davis, to recover £2000 damages for malicious prosecution and assault, and £1000 damages for the seizure and retention of moneys and documents in connection with the arrest of himself and his three friends.

All this contention is inexpressibly sad. Christian men, in whatever way their sympathies go, whether with the Nationalists or the landowners cannot but be depressed. Landowners who enforce rents which mean starvation to the tenant, and tenants who appeal for relief not to the God of the poor, but who trust in lawless and riotous acts to effect their deliverance, both need to be taught of Christ. His law, if obeyed in spirit and in truth on both sides, would remove the trouble, and landowner and tenant, instead of hating each other, would recognize each other as brethren, and strife would cease in the land. In Ireland, as in every other country, the one cry of every Christian heart should be, "O Lord, let Thy kingdom come." Oh for the time when He shall rule whose first Advent was heralded by the proclamation, "On earth peace and goodwill to men." The heart of the true man echoes the cry of one who, under the sight of the misery around him, said: "How long, O Lord, how long? We are tired of the reign of Cæsar; we are beaten down with it; who will help us now to establish the reign of Christ?"

The New Ministry in France is Already among the breakers. Its financial plans are threatened with rejection, and M. Goblet feels himself so completely pledged to them that his resignation is expected to follow defeat on that question. There appears to be no indisposition on the part of the people or their representatives to vote the required millions for the War Department, but there is a wide difference of opinion as to how the money shall be raised. General Boulanger, who is at the head of the War Department, as he was in the former ministry, appears to have arranged to hold his position permanently. He has shrewdly held aloof from the financial problem. He frankly declared that all he wanted was the money for the army, and he would leave to his colleagues the duty of providing it. The general's popularity in the country is growing rapidly, and he is spoken of everywhere as "the coming man." M. Rochefort recently said: "General Boulanger is more valuable to France than a thousand ministries. He must be kept at the head of the army. If the present schemes of reaction prevail and the attempt is made to form a Cabinet without him, then thirty thousand workingmen will march on the Elysée, the troops will fraternize with them, and we shall see what we shall see." In the present condition of France a successful general would have little difficulty in grasping supreme power, as did the first Napoleon.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Two New Trophies for Christ.—Mr. M'Farlane said: "This summer I was in a town not far from Liverpool. I heard of Gospel meetings being held there, and so I went. After the service was over one evening, I went into a side room where some young women were assembled. A lady asked me to speak to two of them about Christ. I did so, and found that both, being deeply convicted of sin by the Holy Spirit, were desirous of becoming Christians. I pointed them to the Lamb of God which taketh away not only their sins, but the sin of the world. I am glad to say that both accepted the Saviour that night, and then the lady told me that both were members of her class, and that for a long time she had been praying earnestly for their conversion."

Turned Out of Doors.—Dr. Lindsay Remarked: "I remember the case of a young girl who suffered bravely for Christ's sake. She came to a Gospel meeting which I was conducting, and was touched by the story of the cross, and led by the power of the Holy Spirit to give herself to Christ. She went home full of joyous thoughts of her newly found Saviour, and when she made known to her parents, who were wicked, godless people, her changed state they turned her out of doors at a late hour of the night, and she had to pass the night on a cold, damp stair, because she was counted worthy to suffer for righteousness' sake. She held bravely on her way, trusting in God, and is a light in the home to which a gracious Providence has led her."

A Baffled Emperor.—Mr. Marsh said: "When Chrysostom was brought up before the Emperor, the potentate thought to frighten him into obedience to him, and said, 'I'll banish you.' 'No, you can't,' said Chrysostom, 'for you can't banish me from Christ.' 'Then I'll take your life,' cried the irate monarch. 'You can't,' was the reply, 'for in Christ I live and have my being.' 'Then I'll confiscate your wealth.' 'You can't,' was still the response, 'for in Christ I have all riches.' 'At least,' the tyrant said, 'I shall cause you to lose all your friends, and you will be virtually an outcast.' 'But you cannot,' Chrysostom exultantly replied, 'for I have a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.' Is it not sweet when to our own souls, as He was to His servant Chrysostom, Christ is all and all?"

A Fearful Vision of Fiends.—Mr. Love said: "I once went to visit a member of my Bible-class who was in an infirmary, and after we had spoken together for a few minutes, she raised herself on her elbow, and pointing to an empty bed, she said with a shudder, 'A woman died in that bed last night, and oh, what a fearful end she had! About half an hour before she passed away she threw her arms about, and shrieked wildly that she saw fiends about her bed coming to drag her soul to hell, and then, with a fearful scream she passed away to render an account of the deeds she had done in the body.' The young girl lay back on her pillow exhausted with her fearful story. I compare the miserable death-bed of the sinner out of Christ with the calm, quiet death of the child of God who only falls asleep in Jesus. Such incidents as this make us sad, but they make us more earnest in praying for the unconverted."

Two Barmaids and Their Admirers.—A gentleman devoted to evangelistic effort, observed: "A missionary in the course of his visitations called at a liquor saloon in London, and was talking to the two barmaids about their souls, when one of them, who was young, and had only been a few months at the trade, was visibly affected. While thus engaged two young men came in, and after giving their orders, began to talk in a most unseemly manner. For some time no notice was taken of their conversation, but at one more than usually coarse expression, the young girl, with tears starting to her eyes, and her face flushed crimson, walked away to the other end of the saloon. Then the missionary turned to the young men, and addressing him who had last spoken, said, 'Let me see your tongue!' The young man was astonished, and asked with surprise, 'What do you mean? why should I do any such thing?' 'Because,' said the missionary, 'when the doctor looks at the tongue of a patient, and sees it coated and furred, it is a sign that there is foulness and disease inside, and from what I have just heard from your lips I am sure that in your case there is foulness and disease within.' The conversation which followed, it is believed, led to the young man seeing the evil of the life he was living."

Won by a Little Girl.—"There was a Little girl whom I knew about four years and a half old, who had the misfortune to lose her mother Many visitors called to comfort her father, and one party expressed a desire to see his little daughter Mary. She was sent for, and came into the room with her nurse. When she was playing quietly about, she surprised the company by looking up into the face of one of the gentlemen and saying, 'Do you love God?' The gentleman thus suddenly questioned was confused, and made no reply. But this little girl's father had also heard it, and he remembered that she had been the constant companion of his wife, who had taught her to love and reverence God; and when he saw her clear blue eyes turn upward and heard her say, 'Do you love God?' it smote him to the heart; and that very night he gave himself to God, and is now heartily engaged in pointing the grief-stricken and the weary to the divine Comforter and Friend."

Sudden Death at a Ball.—A Worker Related: "There were two brothers, the one saved, and the other unsaved. The Christian thought it was his duty as a servant of the Lord to speak to his brother about his soul. He did so, and his brother seemed much affected by his words, but as he had an engagement at a ball that night, he declined to settle the matter then, but promised as soon as he returned to look after his soul's welfare. He went to the ball, met his friends, and in the course of conversation soon forgot all about his brother's serious words. The music began; the dance was being formed, and he with the others went to take his place; but just when about to take the first step his brain reeled, he turned half round, and fell lifeless to the floor. The time of repentance was now past. He neglected his last opportunity, putting it off until a more convenient season; but that season never came, and he was summoned unprepared to give an account of the deeds done in the body. 'Now is the accepted time. Now is the day of salvation.'"

A Mother's Jump.—Mr. A. F. Warden Related this incident? "We were standing on the platform of one of our Northern stations, when the warning cry of the porter, 'Stand back! stand back, there!' bade us beware of the oncoming express. In the hurry and excitement of the time and place, a little girl had strayed away from her mother's care, and somehow as the people stepped back from the edge of the platform, the little one's foot slipped, and she fell off right between the rails. On came the roaring, rushing train Women screamed, men turned thir faces from the sickening sight, when a woman burst through the crowd, dashed by those who tried to hold her, and with a look of desperation, jumped off to where the child lay. Snatching it up, she tossed it out of danger. But alas! another second and the buffer caught the devoted mother as she tried to jump out of the way, and the mangled remains bore a silent testimony to the power of a mother's love. She had given her own life for her child's. It was with moistened eyes and saddened hearts that we pursued our journey, wondering if that girl, when she reached womanhood, would forget her mother's sacrifice or scorn the love that prompted it. Cruel and heartless as such conduct would seem, yet thousands of men and women are guilty of far greater ingratitude when they despise the love of Christ, who died for them."

IS CHRISTIANITY A DELUSION?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Jan. 30, 1887.

"He made his arrows bright, he consulted with images, he looked in the liver."—EZEKIEL 21 : 21.

The Delusions of the Ages—The Delphic Oracle—The Importance of a Comma—Modern Delusions—Christianity Charged with being a Delusion—What It has Accomplished—Great Minds Enthralled by it—Illustrious Believers—Its Influence on the Arts—Its Beneficent Influence—Mourners Comforted—Lives Transformed—Deathbeds Tranquillized—A Mighty Powerful Notion.

TWO modes of divination by which the King of Babylon proposed to find out the will of God. He took a bundle of arrows, put them together, mixed them up, then pulled forth one, and by the inscription on it, decided what city he should first assault. Then an animal was slain, and by the lighter or darker color of the liver, the brighter or darker prospect of success was inferred. That is the meaning of the text: "He made his arrows bright, he consulted with images, he looked in the liver."

Stupid delusion! And yet all the ages have been filled with delusions. It seems as if the world loves to be hoodwinked, the delusion of the text only a specimen of practised upon the human race. In the latter part of the last century, Johanna Southcote came forth pretending to have divine power, made prophecies, had chapels built in her honor, and one hundred thousand disciples came forth to follow her.

The Delphic Oracle deceived vast multitudes of people; the pythoness seated in the Temple of Apollo, uttering a crazy jargon from which the people guessed their individual or national fortunes or misfortunes. The utterances were of such a nature that you could read them any way you wanted to read them. A general going forth to battle, consulted the Delphic Oracle, and he wanted to find out whether he was going to be safe in the battle, or killed in the battle, and the answer came forth from the Delphic Oracle in such words that, if you put the comma before the word "never," it means one thing, and if you put the comma after the word "never," it means another thing just opposite. The message from the Delphic Oracle to the general was: "Go forth, return never in battle shalt thou perish." If he was killed, that was according to the Delphic Oracle; if he came home safely, that was according to the Delphic Oracle. So deceived the people. The priests of those auguries, by the flight of birds, or by the intonation of thunder, or by the inside appearance of slain animals, told the fortunes or misfortunes of individuals or nations. The sibyls deceived the people. The sibyls were supposed to be inspired women who lived in caves, and who wrote the sibylline books afterward purchased by Tarquin the Proud. So late as the year 1829, a man arose in New York, pretending to be a divine being, and playing his part so well that wealthy merchants became his disciples and threw their fortunes into his discipleship. And so in all ages, there have been necromancies, incantations, witchcrafts, sorceries, magical arts, enchantments, divinations, and delusions. The one of the text was only a specimen of that which has been transpiring in all ages of the world. None of these delusions accomplished any good. They deceived, they pauperized the people, they were as cruel as they were absurd. They opened no hospitals, they healed no wounds, they wiped away no tears, they emancipated no serfdom.

But there are those who say that all these delusions combined are as nothing compared with the delusion now abroad in the world, the delusion of the Christian religion. That delusion has to-day

Two Hundred Million Dupes.

It proposes to encircle the earth with its girdle. That which has been called a delusion has already overshadowed the Appalachian range on this side the sea, and it has overshadowed the Balkan and Caucasian ranges on the other side the sea. It has conquered England and the United States. This champion delusion, this hoax, this swindle of the ages, as it has been called, has gone forth to conquer the islands of the Pacific; the Melanesia, and the Micronesia, and Malayan Polynesia have already surrendered to the delusion. Yea, it has conquered the Indian Archipelago; and Borneo and Sumatra and Celebes and Java have fallen under its wiles. In the Fiji Islands, where there are one hundred and twenty thousand people, one hundred and two thousand have already become the dupes of this Christian religion, and if things go on as they are now going on, and if the influence of this great hallucination of the ages cannot be stopped, it will swallow the globe. Supposing, then, that Christianity is the delusion of the centuries, as some have pronounced it, I propose this morning to show you what has been accomplished by this chimera, this fallacy, this hoax, this swindle of the ages.

And in the first place, I remark, that this delusion of the Christian religion has made of human character. I will go down the aisle of any church in Christendom, and I will find on either side that aisle those who were once profligate, profane, unclean of speech, and unclean of action, drunken, and lost. But by the power of this delusion of the Christian religion they have been completely transformed, and now they are kind and amiable and genial and loving and useful. Everybody sees the change. Under the power of this great hallucination they have quit their former associates, and whereas they once found their chief delight among those who gambled and swore and raced horses, now they find their chief joy among those who go to prayer-meetings and churches, so complete is the delusion. Yea, their own families have noticed it—the wife has noticed it, the children have noticed it. The money that went for rum now goes for books and for clothes and for education. He is a new man. All who know him say there has been a wonderful change. What is the cause of this change? This great hallucination of the Christian religion. There is as much difference between what he is now and what he once was, as between a rose and a nettle, as between a dove and a vulture, as between day and night. Tremendous delusion!

Admiral Farragut,

one of the most admired men of the American navy, early became a victim of this Christian delusion, and, seated not long before his death, at Long Branch, he was giving some friends an account of his early life. He said: "My father went down in behalf of the United States Government to put an end to Aaron Burr's rebellion. I was a cabin-boy, and went along with him. I could swear like an old salt. I could gamble in every style of gambling. I knew all the wickedness there was at that time abroad. One day my father cleared everybody out of the cabin except myself, and locked the door. He said, 'David, what are you going to do? What are you going to be?' 'Well,' I said, 'father, I am going to follow the sea.' 'Follow the sea! and be a poor, miserable, drunken sailor, kicked and cuffed about the world and die of a fever in a foreign hospital?'

"'Oh, no!' I said, 'father, I will not be that; I will tread the quarter-deck and command as you do.' 'No, David,' my father said; 'no, David, a person that has your principles and your bad habits will never tread the quarter-deck or command.'

"My father went out and shut the door after him, and I said, then, 'I will change; I will never swear again, I will never drink again, I will never gamble again;' and, gentlemen, by the help of God, I have kept those three vows to this time. I soon after that became a Christian, and that decided my fate for time and for eternity."

Another captive of this great Christian delusion! There goes Saul of Tarsus, on horseback, at full gallop. Where is he going! To destroy Christians. He wants no better play-spell than to stand and watch the hats and coats of the murderers who are massacring God's children. There goes the same man. This time he is afoot. Where is he going now? Going on the road to Ostia to die for Christ. They tried to whip it out of him, they tried to scare it out of him, they thought they would give him enough of it by putting him into a windowless dungeon, and keeping him on small diet, and denying him a cloak, and condemning him as a criminal, and howling at him through the street; but they could not freeze it out of him, and they could not sweat it out of him, and they could not pound it out of him, so they tried the surgery of the sword, and one summer day in '65 he was decapitated. Perhaps the mightiest intellect of the six thousand years of the world's existence hoodwinked, cheated, cajoled, duped by the Christian religion. Ah! that is the remarkable thing about this delusion of Christianity, it Overpowers the Strongest Intellects.

Gather the critics, secular and religious, of this century together, and put a vote to them as to which is the greatest book ever written, and by large majority they will say "Paradise Lost." Who wrote "Paradise Lost?" One of the fools who believed in this Bible—John Milton. Patrick Henry, the electric champion of liberty, enslaved by this delusion, so that he says: "The book worth all other books put together is the Bible." Benjamin Rush, the leading physiologist and anatomist of his day, the great medical scientist — what did he say? "The only true and perfect religion is Christianity." Isaac Newton, the leading philosopher of his time—what did he say? That man surrendering to this delusion of the Christian religion, crying out, on earth is the philosophy of the Gospel." David Brewster, at the pronunciation of whose name every scientist the world over bows his head, David Brewster saying: "Oh, this religion has been a great light to me, a very great light all my days!" President Thiers, the great French statesman, acknowledging that he prayed when he said: "I invoke the Lord God in whom I am glad to believe." David Livingstone, able to conquer the lion, able to conquer the panther, able to conquer the savage, yet conquered by this delusion, this hallucination, this great swindle of the ages, so when they find him dead, they find him on his knees. William E. Gladstone, the strongest intellect in England to-day, unable to resist this chimera, this fallacy, this delusion of the Christian religion, goes to the house of God every Sabbath, and often, at the invitation of the rector, reads the prayers to the people. Oh, if those mighty intellects are overborne by this delusion, what chance is there for you and for me?

"The Sublimest Philosophy

Beside that, I have noticed that cannot be depended on for steadfastness in the proclamation of their sentiments. Goethe, a leading sceptic, was so wrought upon by this Christianity that, in a weak moment, he cried out: "My belief in the Bible has saved me in my literary and moral life." Rousseau, one of the most eloquent champions of infidelity, spending his whole life warring against Christianity, cries out: "The majesty of the Scriptures amazes me."

Voltaire, the most talented infidel the world ever saw, writing two hundred and fifty publications, and the most of them spiteful against Christianity, himself the most notorious libertine of the century—one would have thought he could have been depended upon for steadfastness in the advocacy of infidelity and in the war against this terrible chimera, this delusion of the Gospel. But, no; in his last hour he asks for Christian burial, and asks that they give him the sacrament of the Lord Jesus Christ. Why, you cannot depend upon these first-rate infidels—you cannot depend upon their power to resist this great delusion of Christianity. Thomas Paine, the god of modern sceptics, his birthday celebrated in New York and Boston with great enthusiasm—Thomas Paine,

The Paragon of Bible Haters

Thomas Paine, about whom his brother infidel, William Carver, wrote in a letter which I have at my house, saying that he drank a quart of rum a day, and was too mean and too dishonest to pay for it—Thomas Paine, the adored of modern infidelity—Thomas Paine, who stole another man's wife in England, and brought her to this land—Thomas Paine, one would have thought that he could have been depended on for steadfastness against this great delusion. But, no. In his dying hour he begs the Lord Jesus Christ for mercy.

Powerful delusion, all-conquering delusion, earthquaking delusion of the Christian religion. Yes, this chimera of the Gospel is not satisfied until it goes on and builds itself into the most permanent architecture, so it seems as if the world is never to get rid of it. What are some of

in the world? St. Paul's, St. Peter's, the churches and cathedrals of all Christendom. Yes, this impertinence of the Gospel, this vast delusion is not satisfied until it projects itself, and in one year gives, contributes, six million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to foreign missions, the work of which is to make dunces and fools on the other side of the world—people we have never seen. Deluded lawyers—the late Lord Cairns, the highest legal authority in England, the ex-adviser of the Throne, spending his vacation in preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the poor people of Scotland. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, once the Secretary of State of the United States, an old-fashioned evangelical Christian, an elder in the Reformed Church. John Bright, a deluded Quaker. Henry Wilson, the Vice-President of the United States, dying a deluded Methodist or Congregationalist. Earl of Kintore dying a deluded Presbyterian. The cannibals, in South Sea, the Bushmen of Terra del Fuego, the wild men of Australia, putting down the knives of their cruelty, and clothing themselves in decent apparel—all under the power of this delusion Judson and Doty and Abeel and Campbell and Williams, and the three thousand missionaries of the Cross turning their backs on home and civilization and comfort, and going out amid the squalor of heathenism to relieve it, to save it, to help it, toiling until they dropped into their graves, dying with no earthly comfort about them, and going into graves with no appropriate epitaph, when they might have lived in this country, and lived for themselves, and lived luxuriously, and been at last put into brilliant sepulchre. What a delusion!

Yea, this delusion of Christian religion shows itself in the fact that it goes to Those Who are in Trouble.

Now, it is bad enough to cheat a man when he is well, and when he is prosperous; but this religion comes to a man when he is sick, and says: "You will be well again after a while; you are going into a land where there are no coughs, and no pleurisies, and no consumptions, and no languishing; take courage and bear up." Yea, this awful chimera of the Gospel comes to the poor, and it says to them: "You are on your way to vast estates and to dividends always declarable." This delusion of Christianity comes to the bereft, and it talks of reunion before the throne and of the cessation of all sorrow. And then to show that this delusion will stop at absolutely nothing, it goes to the dying bed and fills the man with anticipations. How much better it would be to have him die without any more hope than swine and rats and snakes. That is all. Nothing more left of him. He will never know anything again.

Shovel Him Under!

The soul is only a superior part of the body, and when the body disintegrates the soul disintegrates. Annihilation, vacancy, everlasting blank, obliteration. Why not present all that beautiful doctrine to the dying, instead of coming with this hoax, this swindle of the Christian religion, and filling the dying man with anticipations of another life, until some in the last hour have clapped their hands, and some have shouted, and some have sung, and some have been so overwrought with joy they could only look ecstatic. Palace gates opening, they thought; diamonded coronets flashing, hands beckoning, orchestras sounding. Little children dying, actually believing they saw their departed parents, so that, although the little children had been so weak and feeble and sick for weeks, they could not turn on their dying pillow, at the last, in a paroxysm of rapture uncontrollable, they sprang to their feet, and shouted, "Mother, catch me, I am coming!"

And to show the immensity of this delusion, this awful swindle of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, I open a hospital, and I bring into that hospital the

and I take you by the hand this morning, and I walk up and down the wards of that hospital, and I ask a few questions. I ask, "Dying Stephen, what have you to say?" "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." "Dying John Wesley, what have you to say?" "The best of all is God is with us." "Dying Edward Payson, what have you to say?" "I float in a sea of glory." "Dying John Powson, after preaching the Gospel so many years, what have you to say?" "My deathbed is a bed of roses." "Dying Dr. Thomas Scott, what have you to say?" "This is heaven begun." "Dying soldier in the last war, what have you to say?" "Boys, I am Going to the Front."

"Dying telegraph-operator on the battlefield of Virginia, what have you to say?" "The wires are all laid, and the poles are up from Stony Point to headquarters." "Dying Paul, what have you to say?" "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand; I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." O my Lord, my God, what a delusion, what a glorious delusion! Submerge me with it, fill my eyes and ears with it, put it under my dying head for a pillow—this delusion—spread it over me for a canopy, put it underneath me for an outspread wing—roll it over me in ocean surges ten thousand fathoms deep! Oh, if infidelity and if atheism and if annihilation are a reality, and the Christian religion is a delusion,

Give Me the Delusion!

The strong conclusion of every man and woman in the house is that Christianity producing such grand results cannot be a delusion. A lie, a cheat, a swindle, an hallucination cannot launch such a glory of the centuries. Your logic and your common-sense convince you that a bad cause cannot produce an illustrious result; out of the womb of such a monster no such angel can be born. Some of you have read everything. You are scientific and you are scholarly, and yet if I should ask you, "What is

The Most Sensible Thing You Ever Did?"

you would say, "The most sensible thing I ever did was to give my heart to God." But there may be others here who have not had early advantages, and if they were asked to give their experience, they might rise and give such testimony as the man gave in a prayer-meeting, when he said, "On my way here to-night, I met a man who asked me where I was going. I said, 'I am going to prayer-meeting.' He said, 'There are a good many religions, and I think the most of them are delusions; as to the Christian religion, that is only a notion, that is a mere notion, the Christian religion.' I said to him, 'Stranger, you see that tavern over there?' 'Yes,' he said, 'I see it.' 'Do you see me?' 'Yes, of course, I see you.' 'Now, the time was, as everybody in this town knows, that if I had a quarter of a dollar in my pocket, I could not pass that tavern without going in and getting a drink; all the people of Jefferson could not keep me out of that place; but God has changed my heart, and the Lord Jesus Christ has destroyed my thirst for strong drink, and there is my whole week's wages, and I have no temptation to go in there; and, stranger, if this is a notion, I want to tell you it is it is a notion that has put clothes on my children's backs, and it is a notion that has put good food on our table, and it is a notion that has filled my mouth with thanksgiving to God. And, stranger, you had better go along with me, you might get religion, too; lots of people are getting religion now.'"

Well, we will soon understand it all. Your life and mine will soon be over. We will soon come to the last bar of the music, to the last act of the tragedy, to the last page of the book—yea, to the last line and to the last word, and to you and to me it will either be midnoon or midnight!

REV. EDWARD McGLYNN,

The Deposed Roman Catholic Priest.

CONSIDERABLE excitement has been stirred up in New York during the past few weeks by the conflict between Dr. Edward McGlynn and his ecclesiastical superiors. It has been found necessary to invoke the assistance of the police at St. Stephen's church where Dr. McGlynn formerly officiated, and they have had some difficulty in protecting his successor from insult if not from ill-usage. It is but fair to Dr. McGlynn to state that he does not appear to have encouraged the excitement but has rather counselled submission to the authorities of the Church.

The trouble has arisen out of politics. During the campaign of last fall Dr. McGlynn, the popular parish priest of St. Stephen's, acted as one of Henry George's lieutenants, and at some of the meetings which were held to promote Mr. George's election to the mayoralty of New York Dr. McGlynn made earnest and effective speeches. It was evident from his utterances, that Dr. McGlynn not only supported Henry George as a man but indorsed his opinions. Now, the Pope and the Propaganda hold such principles as those of Mr. George, especially those of a Socialistic character, in detestation and abhorrence, and, therefore Dr. McGlynn was called upon by his bishop to dissociate himself from Mr. George's canvass, and to cease advocating Socialism. He thought fit to disregard this order, whereupon his disobedience was reported to Rome. Dr. McGlynn was summoned to appear there and explain himself, but again he disobeyed. The result has been that he has been deposed from his pulpit in St. Stephen's and is threatened with expulsion from the priesthood.

Students of prophecy, as we pointed out last week, perceive that the attitude of the Pope will eventually cause him or his successor some embarrassment. It will involve the disagreeable result known to politicians as "eating crow." The prophecies clearly show that the Roman Catholic Church will in the last days become Socialistic, and will advocate the doctrines which Dr. McGlynn is now punished for holding.

Dr. McGlynn is fifty years of age, having been born in New York in 1837. He acquired the rudiments of education in a public school and after his course there, was sent to Rome, Italy, to study in the college of the Propaganda. He afterward became acting Vice-President of the American College in Rome. In 1860 he returned to America and became military chaplain of the Central Park Hospital. On the death of Dr. Cummings he was promoted to the priesthood of St. Stephen's, where he remained until his deposition a few days ago.

A MAN ARRESTED FOR A NICKEL.

A WRANGLE at an elevated railroad station in New York caused some excitement on January 18th. Boxes are placed on the platforms, and passengers are required to purchase tickets in the station, and drop them in the box as they go to the train. On Tuesday night a passenger handed the ticket clerk a dime, receiving back his ticket and a nickel. In going to the platform, he dropped the nickel into the box instead of his ticket. The gateman told him to drop his ticket into the box, too; but the passenger refused. He said five cents was the proper fare, and as he had dropped the nickel into the box, that was sufficient, and he would keep the ticket for another ride. The gateman refused to let the man pass, and took off his coat, preparatory to throwing him down-stairs. The passenger dared him to lay hands upon him, and drew his revolver to defend himself. A policeman was then sent for, and the passenger was arrested. He will probably be taught that in travelling by the Elevated Road exact and implicit obedience to the rules is the only way to avoid trouble. That lesson applies equally to the journey of life. The tendency is very common to evade God's laws and ordinances, and to do something else which the doer thinks is just as good or better. Cain tried that plan when he offered fruit in sacrifice instead of a lamb, but God rebuked His perversity (1 Sam. 15 : 22).

A FOOLHARDY SAILOR.

AN experiment with sharks has been attended by fatal results at Key West, Fla. A local journal states that an English sailor who visited that place recently "scouted the idea of sharks biting a man, and to prove that they never did bite one he set out to swim across the bay and back. He had not gone two hundred feet when he was dragged under, and he hasn't reappeared yet to continue the argument." The sailor gave the best possible proof of the sincerity of his belief, but he must have bitterly regretted for a few brief moments that he had not been better informed. There is reason to fear that a doctrinal error now much in fashion may be similarly but infinitely more disastrous. It is a noteworthy fact that the men who are the most zealous opponents of the doctrine of eternal punishment are the men most in danger of ascertaining in their own persons what its duration really is. When Christian men deny the existence of a world of hopelessness the result is not so deplorable as it is when it is denied by men who will test the matter personally (Matt. 25 : 46.)

THE PRIZE-FIGHTER'S DIAMOND RING.

A CITY missionary in London, whose work was principally among the liquor saloons in the East End, on one occasion entered a house much frequented by members of the prize ring. As he entered, the landlord told him there was a large number of P.R's. in the large room upstairs, and advised him not to go up. But as he thought it his duty not to miss an opportunity, he walked into the room. At first he felt at a loss how to proceed, but recovering himself, he commenced distributing tracts. This seemed rather a good joke to the assembled "bruisers," who rolled them up into pellets, and pelted each other with them. The missionary was about to retire, when he noticed sitting slightly apart an oldish-looking man, with a badly disfigured face, drinking liquor from a silver prize cup; but what struck him most was a large diamond ring which he wore. The missionary, as he was passing his table, bent down, and said, "What a beautiful diamond, isn't it?" The man (who was an ex-champion) responded, "I got it from Lord —— when I beat the 'Slasher;' he had £1000 on me, and I won it for him, and he gave me this by way of gratitude. Isn't it a beauty? worth £100 at least." By this time the greater part of the occupants of the room had gathered round, and the missionary looking up, said, "Friends, I have to tell you of a gem of greater value than that, a pearl of great price that may be yours for the accepting," and taking out of his pocket his Bible, he preached the Gospel to them. He did not see any effect of his work then, but the landlord told him afterward that they had been quieter that day than ever before, and that on leaving each one smoothed out his tract and took it with him.

THE CLOSED DOORS OF A CLUB.

AN admission into the Century Club of New York is being so eagerly sought at the present time that a prominent journal of the city endeavored last week to save its readers from disappointment and unavailing trouble, by publishing an article, describing its rules and methods. It states that the club, as its name implies, was originally composed of one hundred members. Its circle was enlarged some years ago to six hundred. That list has long been complete, and there is always a numerous list of candidates who have for years been waiting the vacancy that is only occasioned by death or resignation. It is seldom, comparatively, that there is a resignation, for the reason that the membership is considered valuable, on account of its difficult attainment. In times of depression this club does not suffer from loss of members by resignation, because every effort is made to maintain his membership by the unfortunate, as he is aware that the vacancy will be immediately filled, and he can hope for no chance of reinstatement, except by re-election, after weary waiting for a vacancy to occur. What a blessing it is that the same rules do not apply to the household of Christ! The highly esteemed privileges of the Century Club sink into nothingness beside those of Christ's true church, yet all are invited to membership and "still there is room" (Luke 14 : 22, 23).

666 IN BOULANGER'S NAME.

IT is not unreasonable to expect that active participators in the political revolutionary movements of the Final Crisis, out of which the Great Antichrist's ten kingdoms are to be developed and confederated, may themselves, or at least some of them, have the prophetic number 666 contained more or less exactly in their own names, inasmuch as the Great Antichrist's name is emphatically to contain it in Greek (Rev. xiii., 18). Thus while Ναπολεοντι, the dative, inscriptive form of the future Antichrist's name, Napoleon, will be the principal fulfilment of 666, it is nevertheless singular that a subordinate and collateral fulfilment seems to exist in Gladstone's name in Greek: for Γ3 λ30 α1 δ4 σ200 τ300 ο70 ν50 η8 = 666.

In Britain one of the ten prophetic kingdoms Mr. Gladstone has done more than any other man to transfer power from "the Classes to the Masses," and has been the cause of far-reaching political agitation, and changes tending to separate Ireland from England, which is prophetically necessary to the development of the ten kingdoms. His friends and foes will alike admit that his introduction of the Disestablishment of the Irish Church and Home Rule proposals have caused the greatest political excitement that this generation in England has known. Similarly it is observable that in the Greek letters of General Ernest Boulanger's name 666 can be found, if E, the initial of his Christian name, Ernest, be prefixed to his surname as follows:

Ε5 β2 ο70 υ400 λ30 α1 ν50 γ3 ε5 ρ100 = 666.

There may be a hidden intimation and secret suggestion intended to be conveyed to us in this fact that General Boulanger is a man of destiny, fated to be a great factor in the conflicts and revolutionary changes in the map of Europe, which are to issue in the formation of the ten prophetic kingdoms prefigured by the ten toes of Daniel's symbolic Image, and the ten horns of the apocalyptic wild beast, which are eventually to "give their power and strength to the Napoleonic Antichrist during the final 3½ years from 1897 to 1900."

It is superfluous to remark that as the Greek and Hebrew languages in which all the letters of their alphabets have a numerical value, and especially as Greek is the language of the Apocalypse in which the prophecy of the number 666 is given, therefore the letters of the name must be changed into Greek letters as in the foregoing instances.

A MISSIONARY NEAR A BATTLEFIELD.

IN a letter from the East Central African Mission field, published in the Missionary Herald, Mr. Ousley relates the perils that threaten him and his work. He says that he received warning in October last that the tyrant King Umzila was coming with an army of ten thousand men, and all white men would do well to fly. He writes: "After prayers I went to the large kraal near by, and found the people preparing to flee to the Bay at once. So we decided that we had better leave for Mongwe with all possible haste. Gathering together a few changes, etc., only what four boys could well carry, we proceeded to Mongwe. Though advised by a Portuguese not to return to Kambini, I went back the next afternoon, having left Mrs. Ousley at Mongwe. I was told that there had been a skirmish between the two armies, and that there would be a battle later in the day. I was also told that the enemy were only a few hours from our station.

"Just as we were retiring to rest the news came that a battle had been fought. Mr. Richards and I went down to the landing and saw several soldiers, who confirmed the report. Two men had just crossed who were wounded in the battle. Whether our mission stations will be spared we cannot yet say. If they are we can only rejoice and return thanks to the Preserver of our lives. We can hardly make ourselves believe that He whose servants we are will allow the work already begun here in the interests of Christ's kingdom to be so soon ended. We need your prayers that we may be daily guided of our Father above."

A GRATEFUL MINISTER.

AN extract from a letter recently received from a friend in Georgia, has given so much encouragement to ourselves, that we publish it in the hope that it may encourage others who are working for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Our friend writes of a clergyman to whom he introduced the paper some years ago, and whose subscription is renewed: "Dr. H—— says that he cannot under hardly any circumstances allow his copy to cease coming. He declares most earnestly, that through my inducing him to take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD five or six years ago, he and his family have received more benefit religiously than from all other causes combined, and that the paper has been a source of great comfort and sunshine."

Speaking for himself, our friend says: "Next to my Bible I had rather be without any work in my family library than THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. To my own knowledge many persons, and, among them, preachers of the Gospel, have testified that their prospects and powers of usefulness have been greatly enlarged by the paper. It is doing, and I have an abiding faith that it will continue to do, a most glorious work in opening the eyes of many a household, as it has done in the past. May God's Spirit attend it." To which we most devoutly add "Amen."

A SUFFERER FROM INSOMNIA CURED.

AN interesting testimony from a lady who suffered from that most distressing malady—insomnia, which generally culminates in lunacy, is published in the current number of Thy Healer. The lady—Mrs. Reeve, of Mayford, says: "You may remember the distress of mind, arising out of sleeplessness, which I suffered twelve months ago; but God was so good to me that I praise Him now for the bitter tears and restless nights—yes, for every one of them.

"The Lord healed me. You made arrangements for me to stay a week, but I could not, for I was so restless I was afraid I should disturb everybody in the house. I then made a resolution to throw myself under the train, but never had the courage to do it. And now I praise God for the deliverance He gave me. I don't think I knew what a wink of sleep was for six or seven weeks, and yet there was sometimes a peace in thinking of that Psalm about the Lord giving His beloved sleep, and I thought it would come, but thought again, 'Yes, but I am not His beloved,' and I was miserable. I was worse after getting home; but one night we went to bed as usual—perhaps it was about a fortnight after my return—and I slept. When I woke, my husband said, 'You have been to sleep?' 'Yes,' I answered, 'praise the Lord.' After that I got better, for which I thank God."

THE COMING ANTICHRIST FORESHADOWED BY NAPOLEON THE GREAT.

[Being the closing remarks of an address at the Chicago Conference by Professor Morehead, of Xenia University, Ohio.]

St. Paul's "Hindering Power" that Restrains Antichrist's Development is the Civil Power of the State—Antichrist will Arise out of the Social Disorganization of the Civil State Like Napoleon Bonaparte out of the former French Revolution, when Atheism was Enthroned in Notre Dame—Social Chaos Already Commencing—Antichrist to Sit in the Temple at Jerusalem—Designs of Napoleon the Great to Conquer Syria and Restore the Jews to Jerusalem.

When shall Antichrist appear? Not until a something that now "restraineth" be removed. Already in Paul's day the mystery of lawlessness was working. Already the germs of a wide defection were planted—germs of continuous and unsuspected growth, whose huge development should be the revelation of the man of sin. The fatal process marked by the apostle is this: The mystery of lawlessness working forward into apostacy, and apostacy culminating at length in the Antichrist. But an unseen power lays its hand upon the process. There is a time appointed for his manifestation, a time neither to be antedated nor postponed. The restraining power, whatever it is, is in God's hand, and not until His set time is come can the malignant break upon the world. For the apostle assures us that the check holds "until he who restraineth now be taken out of the way."

To the query, What is the restraining power, two answers are returned. One is, that it is the Holy Spirit in the Church, an opinion which has a scriptural basis, but which does not fall within the limits of the present discussion. The other is, that it is the fabric of human policy, the moral and civil order of society, divinely constituted authority, in short, THE STATE. This view does not antagonize the other just mentioned; it is, in fact, its correlative and counterpart. The name given to the Antichrist seems to justify this opinion. He is the "Lawless One" in whom all law is discarded, all moral order is dethroned. The German commentator, Luthardt, says: "When the unseen yet withholding influence of the civil power with its moral and divine order of things is powerless to restrain increasing lawlessness, then the end is near, is come." Upon the ruins of shattered States and kingdoms the vast empire of Antichrist is built. The revolutionary condition of society out of which the Antichrist and his dominion arise is clearly indicated by Daniel, vii., 2, who says that the four winds of heaven brake forth upon the great sea, and the beasts arose. Out of the same unstable and agitated element the beast of the Apocalypse issues forth. The sea, t ɔn by the winds, is the graphic image of nations and peoples in Commotion and Revolution.

And this disrupted state of human society plainly hints at the withdrawal of the check, the overthrow of the dam which holds back the antichristian flood. History affords at least one illustrious example of the malignant process through which the world will travel to the man of sin—the French revolution. There was first the preparatory stage, in which widespread attacks were made on religious faith and existing political institutions; the revolution followed which overthrew Church and State, society and religion, royalty, nobility, clergy, laws, customs, everything, and then and his empire, with the conquered subordinate and confederate kingdoms of Westphalia, Naples, and Rome. We have but to imagine this revolutionary condition spread over the whole "prophetic earth" to have an exact picture of the times when the hindrance is taken away, and Antichrist's road is ready, and the great Kaiser shall come!

Out of this Social Chaos Came Napoleon

Is this to be the final outcome of the boasted progress and civilization of our modern era? The science, discoveries, "culture;" the energy, activity, and splendid achievements of the age, are they all to terminate in worldwide godlessness and the man of sin? Pessimism, this view is called, and pessimists, they who advocate it. One whose love for men is deathless, whose power is matchless, has said: "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the days of the Son of Man." How was it in the days of Noah? The whole world in revolt against God, and true piety reduced to a family of eight souls. Impossible to be realized in our enlightened times, is it said? We have but to remember that less than one hundred years ago, in the most highly cultivated and intellectual country of Europe, in France, society was so wrecked and chaotic, and to such a height of proud impiety, that the world witnessed the audacious spectacle of a prostitute enthroned on the high altar of Nôtre Dame, saluted and worshipped under the title of the "Goddess of Reason." We have but to remember that at this very time there resides in the city of Rome a man whom one half of Christendom itself honors and adores as the vicar of Christ, the vicegerent of God, infallible, and sole possessor of the keys of the kingdom of heaven—a man who is borne along "in solemn procession on the shoulders of consecrated priests, while sacred incense fumes before him, and blest peacocks' feathers full of eyes wave beside his moving throne, and every mortal near uncovers, kneels, and silently adores." We have but to remember that even now there exists a positivist calendar in which each day is appointed for the "cultus" of some man distinguished in art, literature, or philosophy.

There are principles now at work in our modern society which, if left unchecked, will soon make the advent of the Antichrist not only possible, but certain. The lawless drift is already on us, precursor of worse to come.

Who does not perceive that the forces are already loose in the world that tend to the disintegration of the whole social fabric? Who does not perceive that the ax is already aimed at the chief hoops which bind together the staves of the civil polity? Socialism, nihilism, anarchy, naturalism, materialism, humanitarianism, spiritualism—restlessness and discontent everywhere—is it any wonder that already men's hearts are failing them for fear, and for looking for the things about to come upon the earth? We have only to suppose the portentous movements of the time grow and gather head until the hindrance is gone, the barrier thrown down, and then? Yes, what then? Then cometh the Antichrist, the devastator of the world! The Lord help us to watch and be sober!

I conclude my remarks on this subject with the following three observations: 1. That the Fathers regarded the Antichrist as a single person, and as associated with Satan in some mysterious way, is susceptible of demonstration. Besides those named in the preceding essay, the following may be mentioned: Tertullian, Cyprian, Victorinus, Cyril of Jerusalem, Jerome, Chrysostom, Hillary of Poictiers, Ambrose, Ephrem Syrus, Andreas of Cæsarea, John Damascene, Abbot Joachim. The same opinion is encountered in the following writings: Epistle of Barnabas, Apostolic Constitutions, second of the Clementine Homilies, De Consummatione Mundi, Disputation of Archelaus and Manes, Recognitions of Clement. The "Noble Lesson" of the Waldenses, of the twelfth century, contains the like belief of a future personal Antichrist.

2. What is meant by the Man of Sin sitting in the "temple" of God? In Josephus, Philo, the Septuagint, and the New Testament, a distinction is made between hieron and naos. The former (hieron) is the name commonly given to the cluster of buildings on Mt. Moriah. The latter (naos) designates the temple proper, the sanctuary where the Divine Presence dwelt. Into this most sacred part of God's dwelling-place does this proud oppressor thrust himself as if he were its divine occupant

But what is meant by this naos, this "temple of God?" The term may be used figuratively for the church (1 Cor. iii., 16, 17; vi., 19; Eph. ii., 21, 22). In these ethical passages, describing spiritual privilege, blessing, and destiny the body of Christ, the invisible church indwelt by the Spirit of God, is undoubtedly the subject. But how the Antichrist who is a man and not an abstraction, can in any proper sense be said to take his seat in this temple does not appear. Wherever the word naos is applied to a material structure in the New Testament the reference uniformly is either to or to some heathen shrine, like the temple of Diana—never in a single instance to a place of Christian worship, such as St. Peter's at Rome (Matt. xxiii., 16, 17; Luke i., 9; Acts xix., 24, etc.). The Scripture usage of the word would lead us to the conclusion that either it is the Jewish Temple to be restored in the future and rededicated to God, or some pre-eminently sacred place like it, in which the Antichrist is to take his seat. The connection of the Adversary with Israel in the last times, as Daniel and John appear to indicate, seems to favor this view. Time alone will tell.

3. Is the Antichrist to be a Jew? So many think, basing their opinion on Gen. xlix., 17; Jer. vii., 16; Dan. xi., 47, 37, etc. These passages, however, are by no means decisive, and may be satisfactorily explained as relating to another subject altogether.

The argument that the Antichrist must be a Jew in order to be received by the Jews has little weight. History records one instance at least when they hailed a great Gentile soldier as their deliverer, and sang his praises in the loftiest strains. In 1806, Napoleon made overtures to the Jews, and took them to some extent under his protection. He invited them to hold their Sanhedrim in Paris, and in March, 1807, seventy-one doctors and leading men of the nation assembled in that city and formed themselves into a national council, the like of which had not been held for more than seventeen hundred years—not indeed since the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. (See "Forty Coming Wonders," pp. 86, 87). Drumont in his recent book on the Jews in France alludes to the same fact.

As Napoleon had vast designs touching the founding of an Eastern empire, the part which the Jews were to take in his schemes, and Jerusalem and Palestine likewise, may appear from the following: "Bonaparte made an appeal to the Asiatic and African Jews to rally to his banner, and promised to give them the Holy Land, and restore Jerusalem in its ancient splendor." Groetz, "History of the Jews."

The Moniteur, published in Constantinople in 1799, said: "Bonaparte has caused a proclamation to be published, in which he invites all the Jews of Asia and of Africa to assemble themselves under his flag, in order to re-establish the ancient city of Jerusalem. But it is not only to give the Jews their Jerusalem that Bonaparte has conquered Syria. He has larger designs. He aims to conquer Constantinople!" Mon. 1799, p. 187. The time was not yet come, and so Napoleon failed. ONE IS COMING, HOWEVER, WHO WILL NOT FAIL; UNDER WHOM ISRAEL WILL COME INTO THE TRIBULATION, AND BE SAVED AT LENGTH BY THE PERSONAL APPEARING OF THE LORD JESUS.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Innovation in the Methods of the House in dealing with important measures was witnessed on Thursday, when the River and Harbor Bill came up for final action. The Committee of the Whole had recommended instead of the bill the passing of a substitute introduced by Mr. Nelson, of Minnesota, proposing to apply a gross sum of seven and a half millions to the purposes of the bill. This prevented the discussion of the various items of the original bill. Then the House rejected the substitute and passed the bill as it stood. This was a dexterous plan to avoid submitting the items to separate votes, and the motive will be clearly understood by the people.

Senator Blair's Motion Proposing to Add an amendment to the Constitution, giving the suffrage to women, was before the Senate on January 25th. This motion has been set aside by so many Congresses without a direct vote on its merits, that the National Woman Suffrage Association now holding its annual Convention in Washington was elated on learning that the Senate had voted to discuss it. Its disappointment was proportionately great when, instead of the two thirds vote necessary to send the joint resolution on its way, only sixteen Senators voted for it, and thirty-four cast their votes against it. The record of pairs and absentees shows that twenty-four Senators are in favor of woman suffrage, and forty-one against it.

The Retaliation Bill Against Canada Described in these columns last week passed the Senate on January 24th, with only one dissenting vote—that of Mr. Riddleberger. Its character was explained by Mr. Ingalls, who said "that the measure was distinctly one of retaliation. It was an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a fish for a fish, an insult for an insult, a wrong for a wrong. It was a declaration to Great Britain that she would continue these practices at her peril, and that if they were persisted in they must be enforced by war. England had always been a ruffian, a coward, and a bully among the nations of the earth; insolent to the weak, tyrannical to the feeble, and cringing and obsequious to the strong. Her history for centuries has been a record of crimes against the human race in Ireland, in Scotland, in Wales, against the Roman Catholics, against the Boers of South Africa, against the Hindoos, and the Chinese. Wherever there has been a feeble, a weak, a helpless nation, Great Britain has been there for the purpose of rapacity and plunder and conquest." When such expressions fall from the lips of a United States Senator, they excite contempt for him and sympathy for the citizens of Kansas, who sent him to Washington. Surely that great Western State must have among its people some man who has read history, who has studied the Bible, and who has enough patriotism to refrain from language that disgraces his country. It is a pity that such a man was not sent to the United States Senate instead of Ingalls.

The Death of General Charles P. Stone, which occurred on January 24th, removes one of our most remarkable men. He was conspicuous in the Civil War, having previously served with distinction in the Mexican War. He was a daring and brilliant soldier, but his recklessness led to disaster to the army and disgrace to himself. His blunder in risking a battle at Balls Bluff in October, 1861, in which the Union troops were defeated was punished by a long imprisonment in Fort Lafayette. On his release he returned to the army, and continued to serve until September, 1864, when he resigned on account of illness. He subsequently entered the service of the Khedive of Egypt who made him a Pasha. In that position he detected the designs of Arabi Pasha, and foresaw the trouble they would bring upon the country. He warned the Khedive against him, and with his usual impetuosity offered to shoot Arabi. He returned to America four years ago. His latest work was in superintending the erection of the Bartholdi Statue in New York Bay. General Stone was sixty-four years old when he died.

Trade was Paralyzed in New York and the adjacent cities last week by the enormous strikes in operation. Beside the coal-handlers' strike, the longshoremen's strike was injuriously affecting business. Owing to a dispute with the Old Dominion Steamship Company, nearly twenty thousand longshoremen working for other lines went on strike. These men have no quarrel with their employers, but have left their work to show their sympathy with their brethren on the Old Dominion dock, and by practically putting an end to all the carrying business of the water-freight companies to force the Old Dominion Line to concede the demands of their employés. This is a logical outcome of the motto of the Knights of Labor: "An injury to one is the concern of all." The laborers claim that they know their own business better than any one else can do, but to outsiders it appears that their principle is being pushed to an extreme suicidal to their cause. Their present action is not unlikely to unite the capitalists against them, to lead fair-dealing employers to the conclusion that they are just as liable to suffer from strikes as are harsh and unjust employers, and, more than all, to lose them the sympathy of the public. On the other hand, it would seem that the best way for the laborers who have no grievance to manifest their sympathy with their brethren would be not to quit work, but to do extra work that they may be able to contribute to the support of those who are on strike.

The British Parliament was Opened on Thursday last. The Queen's speech, which was read by the Lord Chancellor in the Queen's absence, referred in ominous words to Irish affairs. It implied a resort to coercion. The speech said: "The condition of Ireland still requires your anxious attention. Grave crimes in that country have happily been rarer in the last few months than during the similar period of the preceding year, but the relations between the owners and occupiers of the land, which in the early autumn exhibited signs of improvement, have since been seriously disturbed in some districts by organized attempts to incite the latter class to combine against the fulfilment of their legal obligations. The efforts of the Government to cope with this evil have been seriously impeded by the difficulties incident to the method at present prescribed by statute for dealing with such offences. Your early attention will be called to proposals for the reform of legal procedure, which seem necessary to secure prompt and efficient administration of the criminal law." Mr. Gladstone, in criticising the speech, referred in forcible words to the recent evictions. He said "that he greatly lamented the fact that the Queen had not expressed regret at the recent lamentable evictions in Kerry. The poor people thus treated were unable to pay their rents, and the attempt made at the last session to relieve such cases had been frustrated by the Government, although Sir Michael Hicks-Beach had been exercising pressure upon the landlords with the view of modifying the proceedings in cases of necessity. But despite this evictions have continued, and nobody can tell how many more are in store." A significant fact indicating the state of public opinion on the Irish question was that Mr. Goschen, the Liberal politician, who has separated from Mr. Gladstone on account of the Irish policy, and has accepted office under Lord Salisbury, was rejected by the people of Liverpool, where he tried to get elected as Member of Parliament. He is now without a seat in the House, and some one will have to resign to make room for him.

A General European War was Impending in December last. The fact was disclosed on Thursday last when Lord Randolph Churchill explained to the British House of Commons his reasons for resigning the important office he held in the Cabinet. Lord Randolph said the Government's naval and military expenditures exceeded one hundred and fifty-five million dollars without counting the large supplementary estimates. He resigned because he was unable to acquiesce in the Government's extravagance, having pledged himself to a policy of retrenchment and economy. Then he added: "I also objected to the Government's policy of useless interference in the affairs of other nations. The policy of this country should be peaceful everywhere. The Government's estimates were too great for a time of peace." When Lord Randolph wrote to the Premier protesting against the heavy expenditures and intimating his intention of resigning if they were not reduced, Lord Salisbury explicitly defended the estimates on the ground that war was probable. He wrote: "The outlook on the Continent is so very black that it is not too much to say that the chances are in favor of a war at an early date. When once it has broken out we will not be secure from being involved. Therefore we cannot accept the responsibility of refusing supplies which the War and Navy Ministers have declared necessary." This letter was dated December 22d, 1886, and being addressed to a confidential colleague may be regarded as an accurate presentation of the Premier's view of the situation at that time. Lord Randolph said that after receiving that letter, he wrote his resignation, and he added, "I have seen no reason since to regret the step I took."

Prince Bismarck Made a Frank Speech to the Prussian Diet last week. Speaking of his recent defeat in the Reichstag, he said "that the different federal governments of Germany had, by the Constitution, transferred an essential portion of their rights to the Emperor. The Emperor, the Chancellor said, was not in a position to relinquish any of these rights to the Reichstag, especially not to a Reichstag which showed so little confidence in the federal governments as the body lately dissolved had manifested." The Chancellor has given an emphatic denial to the statement of the London Daily News, that the relations of Germany and France are strained, and that the two nations are on the verge of war. General Boulanger also contradicted it. The Bourses of Europe, however, showed that the rumor was widely credited, despite the denials. Possibly the financiers paid more attention to the enormous purchases of war material by the two governments than to the pacific utterances of the statesmen.

Rev. M. Baxter will Preach Next Sunday morning, afternoon, and evening in Library Hall, Newark, N. J., upon: "Coming wars and earthquakes during thirteen years before the year 1900, great religious revivals, second advent of Christ, and resurrection and ascension of Christians without dying; England's loss of Ireland and India, and conquest of Germany by France in 1887–89, changing twenty-three kingdoms into Daniel's predicted Franco-Roman Confederacy of ten kingdoms prior to the Napoleonic Antichrist's seven years' covenant with the Jews (Daniel 7:24, and 9:27); the spread of socialism, communism, nihilism, anarchy, spiritualism, culminating in the great tribulation and Antichrist's massacre of myriads of Christians during three and a half years, and then the millennium of one thousand years."

The Thirty-fourth Annual Report of the Y. M. C. A. of New York has been issued and shows remarkable progress. It is a marvellous record of usefulness for the past year. There are now eight buildings in various parts of the city occupied by branches of the Association, besides the large Central Building, where this work is prosecuted, the same general plan being followed in each. During the past year 7728 young men have been connected with the Association and its branches as members, and 5297 now hold membership tickets. The current expenses at all the points was $46,708.40, of which the members' fees paid $17,961.91. Income from rents and $32,352.09 contributed by older members and friends made up the balance of outlay.

An Attempt to Aid Discharged Female Prisoners desiring to reform is being made in New York. A meeting was held last week in Grace Chapel, East Fourteenth Street, to organize the work. It is proposed to open a lodging house on or very near the East River, in the vicinity of Twenty-sixth Street, and to give temporary shelter to every woman coming from the islands who will come to them. The managers also propose to open a laundry and a sewing-room in the house, to give employment to the women. The women will receive wages for their work, and out of their earnings will pay a small price for their board and lodging, and as soon as practicable they will be sent to permanent situations. The name of the new home is to be the Riverside Rest, and is to have a capacity of fifty beds. It is estimated that $7000 will cover the expenses of the house for the first year, and of this amount enough has already been guaranteed to warrant the managers in beginning work at once.

A Daughter Pronounced Dead by her Physicians was marvellously restored recently in answer to prayer. A sea captain, speaking last week at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, said: "For your encouragement I want to tell you about my daughter. Last time I was here I asked your prayers for her. She was near death when I came here. While praying here she sank very low. Her pulse stopped. The doctors at her bedside said she was dead. But God saw fit to spare her. He raised her up. She is now restored, and to-day goes home to her family. Brethren, I have talked loud about trusting in God, but I have never had such a lesson along that line as in this trial. Brethren, I thank God for this meeting. It has been a blessed place for me."

A Man's Hat Cost a Life in Brooklyn, N. Y., on January 25th. A group of people were standing on a pier at the Columbia Docks, when a sudden gust of wind blowing from the land carried the hat from a man's head into the East River. The man instantly plunged into the water after it and was able to swim for a few minutes, but the cold water soon chilled him and a heavy block of ice struck his head, and he sank. The captain of a tug brought his boat up to the drowning man and succeeded in getting him aboard. But he was chilled to the heart, and before the tug reached the South Ferry the man was dead. It seems a marvellous thing that any man should be so foolish as to imperil his life for the sake of a hat, but his folly was trivial compared with that of men who endanger their immortal souls in their race for wealth (Mark 8 : 36).

Two Days on a Barren Rock without Food or shelter were passed by a shipwrecked crew recently. On January 15th the schooner Charles Graham sailed from Bermuda for Halifax, N. S., with five men beside the captain on board. On approaching the Canadian coast the schooner was enveloped in an impenetrable fog and no observations were possible. To make matters worse a furious gale began to blow, and the schooner ran before it with all sails close reefed. Suddenly the cry of "breakers ahead" was raised, and before the ship's course could be changed she crashed upon them with a terrific shock. Looking up, the crew saw towering one hundred feet above them the rock called Dover Castle, about a quarter of a mile from shore. In the crash the masts had broken and the foremast fell over against the rock. This made a bridge over which the crew crept to a ledge half way up the rock. After resting there for breath they climbed to the summit of the crag. The captain was the only man missing. When last seen he was going to his cabin to try to save something and begged the crew not to leave him, but they paid no attention to his appeal. Had they remained they would have gone down, for no sooner had they made good their escape than they saw the ship fall to pieces and sink. A pitiless hail was falling and the men walked about on that bleak rock, fearing to go to sleep, from Monday night to Wednesday morning. By that time the sea had calmed a little and they were rescued by boats from the land. The incident may be commended to the notice of all in danger of spiritual wreck. Those who were saved owe their safety to making prompt use of the means providentially and most wondrously provided. The lost man missed the opportunity through concern about his property (Heb. 2 : 3).

A Startling Revelation of the Camera is Recorded in a photographic journal. It states that a photographer recently took a photograph of a child that was seemingly in good health and with a clear skin. The negative showed the face to be thickly covered with an eruption. Three days afterward the child was covered with spots due to prickly heat. "The camera had seen and photographed the eruption three days before it was visible to the naked eye." Another case of a similar kind is recorded, where a child showed spots on his portrait which were invisible on his face a fortnight previous to an attack of small-pox. In neither case was there any suspicion that disease was present until the camera revealed it. So many a man who considered himself morally and spiritually sound has been appalled when he has seen his state as revealed in God's Word (Rom. 7 : 7).

A Fight was Stopped by a Bishop a few Days ago in Fargo, Dak. Ter. A gentleman staying in the leading hotel of that town says, that on a recent evening a loud noise in the lobby caused him to leave his room hastily to investigate. He found a large crowd collected, in the middle of which were two men fighting like tigers. No one interfered and the blows fell rapidly. Just as the struggle was at its height a gentleman entered the lobby. No sooner did he realize what was going on than he dropped his satchel and overcoat and rushed single-handed into the scuffle. He seized one of the maddened men by the shoulders and dragged him struggling out of the crowd, receiving, as he did so, several heavy blows. Emboldened by this courageous act the crowd seized the other man, and both were held until peace was declared. Then the man who had carried off the first pugilist was recognized as Dr. Walker, the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of North Dakota. The bishop at no slight risk to himself had earned the blessing pronounced by his Master on peacemakers (Matt. 5 : 9).

A Banker was Held as a Hostage by Miners at Helena, M. T., last week. The company in New York, which works the Gregory Mine near Helena, telegraphed the manager to close the works, as the treasury was empty. He with a young man who was visiting him, and who is the son and partner of a banker interested in the mine, went to the works and notified the miners. The latter learning that the treasure was empty became concerned about the two months' wages then due them. After consultation they seized the banker and informed him that he would be held as a hostage until the wages were paid. There were over three hundred men there and the two men were powerless. Eight men were detailed to watch him by day and another eight by night, and he was kept a close prisoner. He telegraphed to his father in New York announcing his detention and asking that the wages, amounting to seventy-five thousand dollars, be sent, or the consequences to himself might be serious. Though the banker had but a small share in the mine he promptly advanced the money, and his son was released. The act causes no surprise. The surprise would have been if, having the means of rescuing him, he did not use them. We should have wondered what motive more powerful than parental affection could have influenced him. Thus the world has reason to wonder that the Almighty God suffered His Son to agonize and die, and the motive is still more marvellous "He so loved the world" that He spared Him not (John 3 : 16).

A Surprising Legal Decision Affecting Thousands of families was rendered last week by Judge Spencer of Buchanan County, Mo. He declared that minor children of naturalized American citizens are not made citizens of the United States by the naturalization of their fathers. The decision has created great excitement throughout the State, and particularly in St. Louis, where thousands of such persons have exercised the elective franchise. If the decision stands they are aliens and will have to declare their intentions and wait five years before exercising the rights and privileges of citizens. The decision will, however, probably be reversed and the status of the father will settle the status of his children as heretofore. As the question is an important one, the persons affected by it will doubtless press for an authoritative decision. In Christ's kingdom there is no doubt about the law of the case. The children of parents who are members of it do not inherit membership; each one must come himself and seek admission through Christ (John 8 : 33–36).

BRIEF NOTES.

MRS. C. S. WHITNEY, during the last few months, has held very successful meetings in villages in the vicinity of the Hudson, and in Tioga County, New York State. In one place she gave three addresses on a single Sunday.

The Hospital Saturday and Sunday Collections in New York so far reported amount to about $48,000, and there are over twenty churches yet to be heard from. The total is expected to be $52,000.

The Young Women's Christian Association of New York has now taken possession of its new and handsome building at 7 East Fifteenth Street, a picture of which was published in this journal on December 31st, 1885. It has the gratification of entering upon the new premises unburdened by debt.

A Convention of Christian workers for Bible study and conference commenced on Monday last at the City Temple, East Eighty-six Street, between First and Second avenues, New York. The meetings are held at 3 o'clock and 7.45 P.M., each day. Rev. A. B. Simpson, Dr. John E. Cookman, and Rev. Halsey Moore are among the speakers. Special evangelistic services will be held next week.

Mr. D. L. Moody will be fifty years of age on Saturday next. It is proposed to celebrate the jubilee by raising a testimonial among his friends here and in Great Britain, which shall be made an endowment fund for his schools at Northfield. A letter from the committee describing the project in detail was received too late for insertion this week. The treasurer of the fund is Mr. James Talcott, 108 Franklin Street, New York. Subscriptions may be sent at any time during the current year.

Rev. J. D. Re Qua, of Rochester, N. Y., has been holding union meetings at Brasher Falls, N. Y. The Presbyterian and Methodist churches joined in the work. Much good has been done. In eight days there were over ninety seekers at the altar, and many made a profession of faith. At the concluding meeting, notwithstanding a heavy snowfall, large numbers of persons attended, and testified to the benefits received. Mr. Re Qua has returned to his home at 182 Meigs Street, Rochester, N. Y., but the work at Brasher Falls is being continued by the pastors.

A Report of the Addresses Delivered at the Recent Prophetic Conference, at Chicago, with portraits of some of the speakers, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York. It contains 216 pages. Fifty cents in paper covers; Seventy-five cents bound in cloth.

Clergymen and Evangelists who will Allow Copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be placed in the seats of churches, or who will have them distributed at the doors, will be supplied with assorted parcels of back numbers if they will write to the Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

Canvassers Wanted to Sell, from House to House, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Any man, woman, or youth may easily add to their income every week by selling the paper in their spare hours in their own neighborhood. Any one who sells five hundred copies may thus earn five dollars weekly. One man has sold one hundred copies on a Saturday. Address Manager of CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

THE BEST BREAD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I am that bread of life."—JOHN 6 : 48.

Jesus the Tree of Life—Bread Useless in the Tomb—The Bread that will Make the Dead Live—Jesus the Living Bread—I. Meets the Wants of the New Life—Ideal Bread—Sufficient—Special Sweetness—II. Must be Received—Theories not Nutritious—Augustine's Child Teacher—III. Death from not Feeding—IV. Those who Feed Blessed—Doctrines for Swine.

YOU will observe that our Lord here speaks concerning Himself. He speaks not of His words merely, nor of His offices, nor of His work, but of Himself. "I am that bread of life." And herein He teaches us all to fix our eye mainly upon His blessed person, and to think of Himself first and foremost. He is the centre and soul of all. There is a tendency about us all to get away from Jesus, and to look rather to the streams than to the Fountain-head. Why are we more taken up with bits of glass that sparkle in the light than with the sun himself? That tree of life, in the midst of the Paradise of God—we forget to eat of that; and we wander to the borders of the garden, to pluck the fruit of the forbidden tree of the knowledge of good and evil. I wish that our ministry—that mine especially—might be tied and Tethered to the Cross.

It was Himself, my brethren, that our Lord set before His hearers as the bread of life; He did not mention anything of doctrine, or of precept, or of ordinance, but Himself. He says, "I am that bread of life." Of Him, therefore, let us think.

But now, when I have to preach upon a subject like this, I find it necessary to begin a little way from the text. "I am that bread of life." Bread, brethren—bread is for living men and women, but bread is of no use in the tomb. And so, at the opening of my discourse, some of you might say, "Bread is it is for men and women who are quickened. How can we feed upon Christ, for we are dead in trespasses and sins?" You speak most truly; but yet I have a marvel to relate which meets the case. Hearken! That would be a strange kind of bread, would it not, which being put into a dead man's mouth, would make him live? Yet such is the bread that came down from heaven, whereof if a man eat he shall live forever.

The Lord Jesus Christ is living bread. Bread such as we get from the baker is in itself dead; and if you put it to dead lips, there are two dead things together, and nothing can come of the contact. But our Lord Jesus Christ is living bread; and when He touches the dead lip of an unregenerate sinner, life comes into it. He brings life even to those who are dead in sin. He says, "Young man, arise," and he sits up upon the bier. He takes a little girl by her hand, and says, "Talitha cumi—Maid, arise," and she sits up in her bed. He calls to Lazarus, who by this time stinketh, and He says, "Lazarus, come forth," and he comes forth, wearing his grave-clothes. Oh, what a wonderful Christ this is, who is not only bread for the living, but life for the dead! Pray, you who can pray, that He would come here just now, and be life to those who are in the darkness of the Valley of the Shadow of Death, that they may live.

I. With that to start with, I now make the first observation upon the text itself, which is this—Jesus Christ exactly meets all

The Wants of the New Life.

When a man is born again to God, and gets a new life, he has new wants, new desires, new pains, new longings. He enters upon a novel condition, full of new needs and cravings; the Lord Jesus Christ exactly meets the new case. As the key fits the wards of the lock, so does Christ fit the new heart and the right spirit. He knows how to touch the secrets of our soul, and supply our most mysterious necessities.

According to the text, the Lord Jesus Christ is the ideal bread—the ideal supply of man's soul-hunger. There are different theories of what we ought to eat. One person tells us that, if anybody suffers from rheumatism, he must eat so many pounds of meat in a day. Other doctors have vehemently said, "You must not touch meat. It will heat you if you do. You must keep to a strictly vegetable diet." I believe that these learned persons know one as much as the other about it; and probably the whole of them put together know so little that a very small round nought might encompass all their certain knowledge as to health and disease. But there is one thing we do know, that the bread which the Israelites ate in the wilderness, the manna, was

The Best Sort of Food.

It was God's own invention; and He who created man best knew what nutriment he would require. Well now, what that manna was to their bodies—the ideal food of man, which had nothing in it injurious—that our Lord Jesus is to the soul. In Him is life for men, and no disease or death. In the manna there was no adulteration, it was a perfectly pure food; such food is the Lord Jesus Christ to the spiritual life. He is the bread that came down from heaven, He is the true meat. If our souls live upon Christ, and nothing else but Christ, He will breed no disease within the heart; He will not distort the judgment; He will not inflame the imagination; He will not excite the passions. As certain silk-worms have their silk colored by the leaves on which they feed, so if we were to feed on Christ, and nothing else but Christ, we should become pure, holy, lowly, meek, gentle, humble; in a word, we should be perfect even as He is. What wonderful meat this must be!

The Lord Jesus Christ is not only the ideal bread, but He is in Himself

A Sufficient Bread.

That manna which the Israelites ate in the wilderness was all that they really wanted. They called the manna "light bread;" but what should the food be for those who were always on the march but light, and easy of digestion? Our Lord Jesus is simple in doctrine; but what else do we wish for, even we who are wayfaring men, and all too apt to err? My brethren, if we do but get a hold of Jesus Christ, and feed on Him, He is sufficient for us—sufficient for gigantic labors, sufficient for anguish, and grief, and sorrow. If you feed on Him, He will build you up, not in one direction only, but in all ways; for ye are complete in Him—thoroughly furnished unto all necessities. Christ Jesus meets all the wants of all His people with a divine sufficiency.

And then there is in Christ what there is in manna—a sweetness all its own. I cannot tell you exactly how the manna tasted. Some of them said that it tasted like wafers made with honey. The Jewish notion is that it tasted according to every man's own taste; so that, if he preferred this flavor or that, the manna had that flavor to him, and thus it was to each one a personal and peculiar delicacy. This I know—that there is a sweetness about my Lord which is precisely that which delights me. I cannot communicate it to you, for you for himself. When Jesus said, "I am that bread of life," He meant, "I am that choice bread, that satisfying bread, that delicious bread, the like of which was never found elsewhere."

Furthermore, it was bread suitable for the wilderness. When they were in the wilderness, it was much better for the tribes to eat what they called "light bread" than for them to be filled with the meat that they had in Egypt, or even the old corn which they enjoyed when they came into Canaan. Manna was suitable food for the climate, and for their condition; and the Lord knew it. So the most suitable meat for us in this vale of tears is Christ Jesus. Jesus is all the bread that you need while you are on your way to heaven and God.

What I have to say on this point further is—try it, dear friends. I would be very practical on this point, and say earnestly, taste and test. If you wish to know this bread that came down from heaven, and how satisfying, how suitable, how sweet it is—try it. Poor sinner, if you can eat this bread you will not be hungry any more! Feeding upon the glorious doctrine of the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, you will find that His flesh is meat indeed, and His blood is drink indeed.

II. But, secondly, in order that Jesus may meet all our soul's wants, we Must Receive Him.

Bread cannot possibly sustain the body unless it be eaten. You know, dear friends, you might be hungry to-night, and hear about bread, and then be doomed to wait till to-morrow evening without having any of it to eat; that would be a tantalizing business, would it not? Suppose that you should go to a baker's window, and stand there for an hour, and stare at the bread, I do not think that the sight would fill you much. No, you must eat, or else there might be tons of bread within reach, and yet you would die of famine. You might be buried in a grave of bread, and it would be of no use to you. Even manna would not nourish you unless you ate it. You must receive food into yourself, or it is not food to you. The Saviour Himself, if you do not receive Him by faith, will be no Saviour to you. Mark that.

Here is a brother who never eats bread, but instead of eating he studies the theory of nutrition, and he is ready to discuss with any one the whole system of digestion and assimilation. He has a theory that bread should always be baked in a certain way, and he feels bound to discuss, and discuss, and discuss, till all is mouldy.

Here comes in the inquiry—

How Do We Receive Christ

into us as we take bread into our bodies? First, by believing everything that is revealed about Him. The Father's witness, and the Holy Ghost's witness, and His own witness concerning Himself—we have all these in God's most holy Word. Take the Book, and read it. Augustine, after years of tossing to and fro, found peace with God by hearing a little child say, "Take, and read." I suppose that the child was singing to itself, and hardly knew what it was saying as it repeated to itself the two words—"Tolle, lege; tolle, lege; tolle, lege." "Take up, and read." That voice struck the ear of the perplexed thinker as though it were the voice of God, and he took the Scripture, and read the Scripture, and no sooner had he read it than he found Christ. I would entreat each one of you to do this, in order that you may find rest for your soul.

Then, next, trust Him for yourself. That is the point—the hinge of the whole business. He is a Saviour. I believe that; but I go further, and resolve—He shall be my Saviour. May I say that? Yes, for I am permitted to do so, inasmuch as He says, "Him that cometh to Me I will in nowise cast out." Scripture saith that He is exalted on high to give repentance unto Israel, and remission of sins. Therefore, I look to Him to give me repentance and remission of sins. I trust to Him in that respect, and He is mine. He has said, "It is finished." The atonement is finished, and I believe that it is finished for me. A prominent point about the offering under the old law was that the person who came with the sacrifice and said, "This is mine." You must do the same with Jesus. Lay your hands on Him, and say, "This is mine. This sacrificial death is for me."

"Oh, but," says one, "suppose He is not mine. What if I were to take Him to myself without warrant?" Suppose such a thing for one moment; yet He would be yours. If I was hungry, and I ate a bit of bread, and after I had eaten it somebody said, "It is not yours," I should reply, "Perhaps not, but how will you take it from me? It has nourished me, and refreshed me; it is mine, and none can deprive me of it." There is the point, you see; if you take Christ Jesus into yourself, the devil himself may say you had no right to Him, but he cannot take away that which you have eaten. They say that possession is nine points of the law; and I should think in the case of eating that it is the whole ten points, or any other number of points, for there is no getting re-possession of that which a man has actually eaten. Get Christ, and Christ is yours—yours by a kind of possession, which will never be disputed before the courts of heaven.

Furthermore, to feed upon Christ means to meditate much upon Him—to think much of Him. But time flies so quickly that I cannot dwell upon these points as they deserve to be dwelt upon. Oh, live near the cross! Build your house on Calvary! Frequent Gethsemane! Listen to the groans of your pleading Lord! Be much with a dying Christ. Be much with a risen Christ. Be much with a reigning Christ. Be much in anticipation of a coming Christ. For the more you are with Him, the more will your soul be filled with satisfaction, and influenced to sanctification.

III. Now, thirdly—and this shall be but a word or two—notice this solemn fact: not to feed upon Christ is the sure mark of death.

A Terrible Fact!

The Lord Jesus Christ has said it—"Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you." A great preacher, but he does not feed on Christ! You have no life in you. A forward professor, but he does not feed on Christ! You have no life in you. A very knowing theologian, and a clever controversialist; but he does not feed upon the incarnate God! There is no life in you. A daring speculator in modern thought, but he does not care, he says, for the blood of Christ; he even sneers at the mention of it! You have no life in you.

If anybody were to say to me, "I have a man at home who stands in my hall, and has stood there for years, but he has never eaten a mouthful of bread all the time, nor cost me a penny for food," I should say to myself, "Oh, yes, that is a bronze man, I know, or a plaster cast of a man. He has no life in him, I am sure; for if he had life in him, he would have needed bread." If we could live without eating, it would be a cheap method of existence; but I have never found out the secret, and I do not mean to make experiments. If you are trying it, and have succeeded in it so far that you can live without Christ, the bread of life, I fear your life is not that of God's people.

Oh, my dear hearer, once a professor, once a church-member, if you have given up Christ, and you get on well without Him, you have no life in you! The dead can do without bread, but the living cannot. Jesus tells us, "I am that bread of life," and if you are doing without Him you are doing without the bread of life, and the reason is that you are without life itself.

IV. Next, and the fourth head, shall be with equal brevity—upon Christ are supremely blessed. They shall never hunger. They shall hunger after more of Jesus, but not after anything else besides Jesus. I was greatly pleased some time ago to hear a gentleman say, who had tried to preach another doctrine, that a certain neighborhood which he spoke of was so impregnated with what was called "the Gospel" that he could not succeed with his speculations. He said that if men once drank this Gospel doctrine it made them so bigoted in their love for it that the most clever person could not get them out of it. I thought to myself, "This witness is true." An enemy declared it, and it was therefore all the more striking.

The subtlest deceivers may try as long as they please, but when we have once fed upon Christ they cannot get us off from Him. They call us away from Him; they proffer us all manner of novelties; but in vain: "Try our thought! Try our science! Try our purgatory! Try our larger hope!" But we hear the pails rattle, and we hear the swine clamoring, and we are not anxious to taste the mixture, or unite in the festival. We are not so selfish as to steal this new wash from those whom it delights. Let those have it who can feed on it; but as for ourselves, we mean to feed on

The Bread of Heaven.

The Gospel is to us such satisfying bread that all the rest is draff. Every true child of God is so far a bigot that he prefers the bread of his Father's house to the husks of the far country. He cannot give up the Gospel, and he will not, for it satisfies his whole being. What more does he want? Why should he make a change?

Brethren, feeding upon Jesus we have an immortal blessedness; we shall never die. If we have fed on Christ, we shall fall asleep, but it will be in Jesus. Some whom we love have lately fallen asleep; they will awake with Him in the morning. But we shall never die. We shall only pass into a higher stage of life; for that food on which we feed shall be in us the pledge of an immortality equal to the immortality of the Christ who has become our bread.

V. I had much more to say to you, but the time has gone. All that I will say further is this. If any of you desire to have Christ, you may depend upon it that you may have Him, because bread is Meant to be Eaten;

Jesus is provided to be received. What is the use of bread if it is never eaten? If you go to the Orphanage, you will see a large batch of bread there kept upon the shelves. It must not be eaten the first day, you know, it would go too fast, and would not be very wholesome for the youngsters. It must get rather staler by being kept a little while. Now, suppose that I were to go down there, and say to the baker, "Lock that door; I want to keep that bread. I am going away to Mentone, and I shall take the key with me, that I may save that bread." Suppose I were to do so, and come back in a couple of months' time. Should I say to myself, "I have saved that batch of bread"? I am afraid that it would turn out to be very bad economy. Let us go and look at the loaves which we have kept from use! Come away at once! The sight is not pleasant. Decay and corruption have fallen upon what we have hoarded. It would be a poor matter for the bread.

Why, it is the very end of bread, the object of bread, the portion of bread, to be eaten. It is honored in being eaten; it would be degraded by being left to grow stale and mouldy. Now, the Lord Jesus Christ is never so famous a Christ as when sinners come and feed upon Him. This precious bread must be eaten, or it has not answered its design.

I know a brother here who wanted to take a certain shop in a wide street, but his wiser friends said, "Do not take that shop for a baker's. It is not in

A Good Eating Locality.

You must open a shop in one of the streets where there are plenty of poor people, who will buy the bread every morning. Make it good and cheap, and it will not stop long on the shelves." I noticed in the newspaper that a certain drink-shop was "in a good drinking locality." I am sorry that there are such localities. But, assuredly, a good eating locality must be the very place for vending bread. I think that this Tabernacle stands in a good eating locality. Many are here now who are hungry after Christ, and it is a blessed fact that they may have Him, and feed upon Him without stint.

And what is the price? The price? The difficulty with all other traders is to get you up to their price; but my difficulty is to get you down to mine—for the bread of heaven is without price. Even if you offer a farthing, I cannot take your bid. You may have all for nothing, and have it at once; but not a penny can be accepted from you. The Gospel provides a full Christ for empty sinners, pardon on earth and bliss in heaven, and all for nothing. Take it as a free gift, and it is yours. What would you pay? What could you pay? Did Israel pay for the manna? It would have been an insult to God to imagine it. Go your way, and bless the name of the Lord, for this is the Gospel—"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

AN OX-LIKE MAN.*

ROBERT OWEN on one occasion visited a gentleman who was a believer. In walking out they came to the gentleman's family grave; Owen, addressing him, said, "There is one advantage I have over Christians, I am not afraid to die. Most Christians are afraid to die; but if some of my business were settled, I should be perfectly willing to die at any moment." "Well," said his companion, "you say you have no fear in death; have you any hope in death?" After a long pause, he answered "No!" "Then," replied the gentleman, pointing to an ox standing near, "you are on a level with that brute; he has fed till he is satisfied, and stands in the shade whisking off the flies, and has neither hope nor fear" (II Sam. 3 : 33).

Restored Jewels.

Rabbi Meir was from home, and during his absence his two sons died. His wife laid them upon the bed, and spread a white covering over their bodies. On her husband's return she thus addressed him, "Rabbi, I would fain ask thee one question. Some time ago a Person intrusted some jewels to my custody, and now He demands them back again; should I give them to Him?" "That is a question," said Rabbi Meir, "which you should not have thought it necessary to ask. Wouldst thou hesitate or be reluctant to restore to every one his own?" "No," she replied; "but yet I thought it best when restoring them to acquaint you therewith." She then led him to the bedside, and took off the covering from the bodies. "Ah! my sons, the light of mine eyes," he said, "I was your father, but you were my teachers." The mother, too, wept bitterly. At length she said, "Rabbi, we must not be reluctant to restore that which was intrusted to our keeping. See, the Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; and blessed be the name of the Lord" (Job 1 : 21).

The Living Concordance of the Senate.

Daniel Webster, when a mere a lad, read with such power and expression that the passing teamsters who stopped to bait their horses, used to get "Webster's boy" to come out under the trees and read the Bible to them. Those who heard Mr. Webster, in later life, recite passages from the prophets and Psalms, say that he held them spellbound, while each passage, even the most familiar, came home to them with a new meaning. It was from his mother's training that Webster derived this love for and familiarity with the Scriptures. She observed another old fashion of New England in training her son. She encouraged him to memorize such scriptural passages as impressed him. The boy's retentive memory and his sensitiveness to Bible metaphors and the rhythm of the English version stored his mind with Scripture passages. So conspicuous was this trait of his character that when he was in the United States Senate his colleagues nicknamed him "The Concordance."

A Captive Eagle Set Free.

An eagle had been confined under cover for many years, and no one had seen it even attempt to escape. Perfectly subdued, apparently unconscious of its native power, it remained inactive, and, to all appearance, contented. But its owner was about to leave for a far country, never to return. He could not take the eagle with him. "I will do one act of kindness before I go," said he, and unloosed the chain from the captive bird. The bird continued to walk the usual round which had been the length of its chain, unconscious that it was free. Neighbors and children looked on in surprise and pity. The discovery came in a few moments. The slow rustling of a wing was heard. It was stretched, and then folded. Anon it was stretched to its full extent, and then softly folded again. Then, slowly and cautiously, the eagle expanded both wings and looked up into the sky. One effort to mount, then another, and the wings have found their lost cunning; and upward, higher and speedier he mounted, until he soared right out of sight. Hast thou, O child of God, been pinioned long to the cares and toils of earth, so that thy wings of faith and love have lost their power to rise? Thou mayest soar again, "His grace is sufficient for thee."

A CLERGYMAN'S TWO HEARERS.

Standing one Sunday in summer near an old church in the country I watched the dispersion of the congregation. I was interested in noticing the friendly feeling that pervaded the little flock in which every one seemed to know the others, and to take a brotherly interest in them. It was so different in the city where the worshippers, on leaving the door, went their several ways without a sign of acquaintance with each other. The faces, too, of the gathering were worthy of study. There was in most cases an absence of the eager, anxious, hunted expression which those wear who walk paved streets.

Only one really moody, saturnine face did I notice in the whole crowd, and, strangely enough, the man to whom it belonged was the best-dressed person there. A big, portly man he was with a heavy watch-chain and a general look about him of wealth and prosperity. Yet he was evidently depressed and discontented. In striking contrast to him was a man behind who was making slow progress, with the aid of a stick and his wife's arm. The man was clearly suffering pain — rheumatic pain, I judged, by the twinges which each step produced. But, apart from the pain, his countenance almost shone with the light that proceeds from a soul that draws its sustenance from above.

"A good man, that," said my friend the clergyman, as he joined me. "One of the Lord's poor, rich in faith, and an heir of the kingdom."

"Yes," I said, "I inferred that from the expression of his face. I was noticing the contrast between his appearance and that of a man who passed me a few moments ago."

"Ah, the squire you mean! Yes, there is a contrast, and as great a one in their characters. It depresses me to hear the squire talk. He is a thoroughly discontented man, yet he is surrounded with luxury. I sometimes think that the best thing that could come to him would be financial ruin. But he is in the Lord's hands and He will do what is best."

"And the other man, what of him?"

"You shall see. We will call on him this afternoon. I should like you to see what religion can do for a man. It is everything to him; he has scarcely anything else yet he and his wife are thoroughly happy. I tell you God can satisfy a man without worldly aid. There are days when there is not a dollar in the house, and, I believe, nothing to eat but bread, but I never hear him repine. His is a life of faith and peace and joy."

We went to the little cottage that afternoon. It was very poor as my friend had said. The broken floor and the absence of ordinary furniture showed that the man could not be much poorer. He said he could do but little work now, but God was very good to him, and he was thankful for many mercies. We found him seated near his wife who was reading to him about their Father's house in which there are many mansions, and I could see that he was rejoicing in the certainty of the glory to be revealed. It was a lesson never to be forgotten. Since then I have often thought of the two cases—the one whom earthly good could not satisfy, and the other who was abundantly satisfied with heavenly gifts.

"There is no hope for him anyway, and if he did live he would have to live in State's prison," said an angry man, as he stood looking at the mangled form of a human being, laid on a hospital table, to the surgeon who was making an examination. "You see he was caught in his own trap. He was my clerk, and he knew there was a lot of money in the safe. He made up his mind to have it, and he got it, but it has cost him his life. He must have found out the combination, and got the safe open, planted the money somewhere, and then tried to cover up his tracks by blowing up the safe, to make it look like a burglary. It needs a professional hand to work that trick successfully. This man blundered, and he has blown himself to pieces. If I knew where he had put the money I should not care if he died. It serves him right."

"That is not the way to talk now, sir," said the surgeon. "I shall do my best for this man, whether he is a criminal or not. If I can patch him together I shall be glad; if you want to prosecute him when he is well, you must do it. That is no affair of mine."

"Oh, I'll prosecute him fast enough. He has got nearly ten thousand dollars hid away somewhere. It was a cunning trick, but it will not pay with me. I suspected him right away, and the police agree with me. I hope you will bring him through that I may make him unload."

The surgeon went on with his almost hopeless task, and Mr. Carter went away. He was, as he often boasted, a self-made man, having risen from nothing until he could write his cheque for a million and have it honored. He could forgive any wrong-doing except robbery. The man who stole a quarter of a dollar from him he would pursue with savage vindictiveness, which nothing but the most severe punishment of the thief could appease. Those who knew him best did not dispute his assertion that he was "a self-made man," and hinted behind his back that the finished work did no credit to the maker. Kindness, benevolence, and mercy had been left out of the man, they said, and the less he boasted the better.

To the surprise of every one in the hospital, the patient, battered and mangled as he was, showed signs of recovery, and, after a critical period, when death semed very near to him, he became conscious and spoke feebly. The surgeon expressed his conviction that he would get well now if all went satisfactorily, and there were no relapse. He had said nothing in the hospital about the robbery, and the suspicions entertained against the patient, but he insisted on his being kept quiet, and forbade any one being admitted to see him.

One day, however, while the surgeon was absent and his assistant, who knew nothing of the circumstances, was on duty, Mr. Carter called. He had been there several times before, but had not been permitted to see the patient. This time he was so persistent, and the sufferer was so much better, that he was allowed to go to his bedside. Not till then did the sick man know that he was suspected of the robbery. His story was clear enough. He said that "passing late at night the office in which he was employed he saw men, evidently burglars, moving around. He made his way in through a door that he found open, but the men had concealed themselves; he was groping around for matches to light the gas when an explosion occurred, and he knew no more until he came to himself in the hospital. If there had been a robbery it must have been done by the men whom he saw, and who returned after he was hurt."

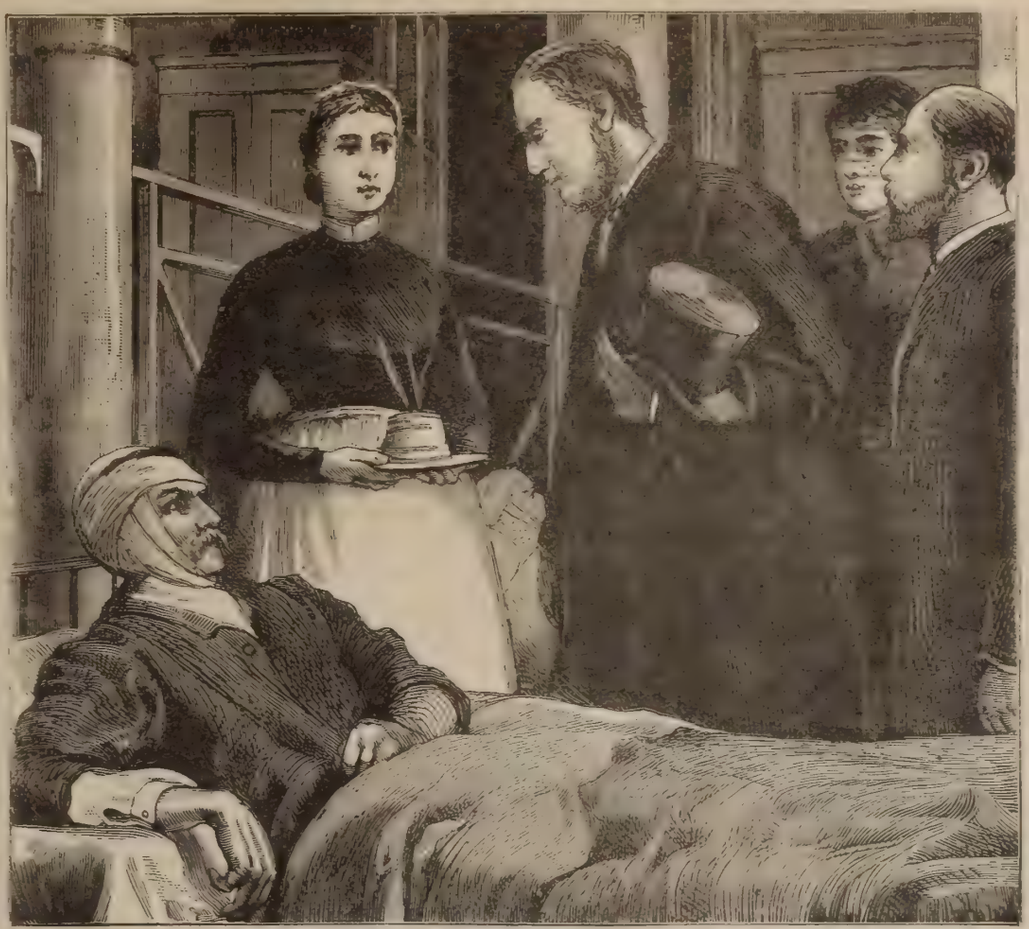
"And you expect me to believe that, do you, Whatmore?" said Mr. Carter. "No, sir! I have lived too long in the world for that. You've got to tell me where that money is, and then I may let you down lightly. If not, we'll see what a term in State's prison will do."



The Clergyman's Good News for a Hospital Patient.

The man's agitation was extreme. That night his life was despaired of. The surgeon on his return found him raving wildly, and heard from the nurse what had occurred. Somehow, he could not believe the man to be guilty, and felt a sympathy for him. The next day he called on a clergyman with whom he was well acquainted, and, telling him the story, begged him to visit Whatmore if he should recover again sufficiently to talk. There was a marvellous vitality in the patient which in this crisis stood him in good stead. In a few days he was able to converse again, and the clergyman was sent for. He listened to the story and was convinced of Whatmore's innocence.

"I believe you are right," he said to the surgeon, as he went out. "The man does not talk like a guilty man. I will see what can be done. His distress is terrible."

The days passed, and Whatmore's case was a continued source of anxiety to the surgeon. The patient had relapse after relapse. No sooner did his physical condition improve than his mind reverted to the charge against him, and he sank into delirium, and his wounds became inflamed.

"It is of no use," said the surgeon, as he stood at the bedside one day. "I am not having a fair chance. This man will surely die or go demented."

"He was delirious all night," said the nurse who stood near with an inkstand in her hand while the surgeon made his usual record. "He is talking all the time about the money, and praying that God will either clear him or take his life. It is pitiful."

At that moment the clergyman who had visited Whatmore before was seen making his way to his bedside. He was accompanied by his wife, who looked compassionately on the sufferers as she passed through the ward. There was an eager expression on the clergyman's face which the surgeon noticed, and instinctively he stood aside to let him approach the patient.

"I have brought you good news, Whatmore," he said. "You are cleared. Even Carter admits that he was wrong. The burglars tried to pass some of the stolen money and were arrested. It is a clear case. You have nothing to do but to get well."

As he spoke every eye was turned upon him. The nurse and the surgeon listened with delight. But Whatmore seeemed scarcely able to realize it. Raising himself with difficulty on his elbow he looked intently in the clergyman's face.

"Is it really true, sir?" he asked. "I am not dreaming, am I? I have dreamed it sometimes while I have been lying here, and have waked up disappointed."

"Oh, no; it is quite true! Now, I will just kneel down and thank God with you for the vindication."

"Do, sir," said Whatmore: "I have prayed for this when I have been able, but I almost despaired at last. It is many years now since I put my trust in Him, and I could not understand this. Thank God He has not let me be put to shame. He is 'a Friend that sticketh closer than a brother.'"

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

Tim the Cobbler.

IN a small cottage, not far from the gates of Aspen Chase, dwelt an odd character known throughout the whole of Aspendale as Tim the Cobbler. The cottage itself was built so that the gable end abutted on the main road, which ran through the centre of the village. On the lower floor was a large window extending almost from side to side of the cottage. In this were placed a number of bootlaces, heel and toe plates of various sizes, strips of leather, and other matters connected with Tim's calling, together with a few boots, shoes, and slippers, more or less the worse for wear, and which had been brought by the villagers for repairs.

A long, broad window shutter was suspended by hinges from the outer sill of Tim's cottage. It was not allowed, however, to fall into a perpendicular position against the wall, for Tim's wife, being, like John Gilpin's, of a thrifty turn of mind, had persuaded her spouse to supply it with a couple of legs, also fastened by hinges. By the aid of these the broad shutter, fixed in a horizontal position, did duty as a table or stall, on which were spread sundry small articles for sale. These were of a very miscellaneous character, and included nuts, fruits, flowers, vegetables, bottles of lemonade and ginger beer, and an assortment of candies. Among the rest were scattered such small matters connected with her husband's time-honored craft as shoestrings, buttons, buckles, and whatnot. Sally Crouch was not at all particular as to her stock in trade, so long as she could "turn an honest penny," to quote a favorite phrase of her own.

"Poor fooaks," she used to say, "mun live, an' Tim an' his lapstun' can't allus manage to keep the wolf from the dooar." Tim Crouch was a great politician. Though he had not the "gift of tongues," he certainly had a gift of tongue, and he put that to such constant use that there was evidently no reason why, like Tennyson's brook, his "chatter, chatter, chatter," should not "go on forever." Tim's shop was a sort of rendezvous for such of the villagers as had any spare time on their hands; and when Jacob Benson, the gamekeeper, Peter Prout, the miller, who did not belong to any political party, and Sam Vause, the blacksmith, whose politics were always on the side on which "the chance of beer did most preponderate," got together for argument, the cobbler's shop became a perfect pandemonium. It must be said, however, that, owing to his eloquent "gift of the gab," Tim generally came off triumphant. On those rare occasions when he was fairly driven into a corner, so that his tongue could no further avail him, he used to seize his lapstone, place a thick piece of leather on it, and hammer away at such a rate that his antagonists were literally beaten out of the field. The defeated trio would retire in a huff, and then the victor would drop his hammer, rub his stubbly black hair, which could scarcely have been cropped any closer, and say with a contemptuous smile of superiority, "Tim Crouch is a great deal more than a match for all on 'em put together."

Hither to the cobbler's shop, one raw and misty winter night, came Jacob Benson. "Hollo!" said Tim, as the gamekeeper stepped inside, "ah thowt 'at yo' weren't cummin' ageean, 'keeper." It must be explained that on the very last occasion of Jacob's visit, the lapstone logic had prevailed, and Jacob had retired in a passion, declaring that he would never come within earshot of the "thumping wind-bag" any more. "Sit yo' doon," continued Tim. "What's the news?"

"News!" said Jacob, in serious tones, "I've news that'll mak' your hair stand on end. Leastwise it would do if it was long anuff ever to lay doon." So saying the gamekeeper placed a small cutting-board across a pail that stood near the stove, in which certain balls of wax were floating to keep them moist for use, and sat down.

"I declare I've had quite a turn," he continued. "You know that stiff bit o' coppice just behind Aspen Garth, at the corner o' the larch plantation? Well, I've been watchin' that spot a good while. There's been a good deal of poachin' goin' on there lately. Last night I saw Nick Ste'enson, Chivey, you know, at least I could ha' sworn it was him, creep into the coppice, an' mak' for the wood side. Whether he got scent o' me or not, I can't say. I missed him an' went home in a bit of a temper."

"A big bit, I expect, if t' truth was known, size of a lump o' chalk," put in Tim with a laugh.

"We ain't got a worse poacher i' this neighborhood than he is," persisted Jacob. "Says I to myself, I'll nab yo' next tahme, my man, as sure as a gun. So to-night I went an' hid myself in a thorn-bush just by the hedge between t' coppice an' t' paddock. Well, I waited aboot an hour or so, an' began to think I'd ha' missed him. Then I hears somebody speakin' quietly to a dog. Lookin' through my bush, I saw as well as the mist would let me, a man peering through the hedge into the paddock. I was sure o' my man, cock sure.

"'Yis, Maister Chivey,' says I; 'you're in for it this tahme as sure as my name's Jake Benson. I'll mak' yo' stop if I ha' to wing yo' for it.' I rushes out meanin' to seize him by the collar, when the rascal clubbed his gun an' aimed a cracker at me that would ha' made me see stars if it had hit me. I ducked, an' down I fell all my length on the slippery grass. Then he jumps the hedge an' runs for it, an' I efter him. We crossed the paddock as though we were runnin' for t' Doncaster cup. Then I lost him. The mist was settlin' doon, an' I lost scent. Thinks I, he's gotten into t' stack-yard, an' will be dodgin' among t' stacks. Suddenly I popped round a hay-stack partly cut, an' in the corner I saw a man crouchin' down. Just as I stooped to seize him he jumps up, looks me straight i' the face, wi' such a pale pitiful look, an' says, 'Benson! for heaven's sake, let me go!' 'I couldn't ha' held a week-old rabbit, an' off he went into the darkness like a shot. Whoever do you think it was?'"

"Why, Chivey, to be sure!" said Tim with a grin; "an' he's chiveyed you ageean an' no mistak'."

"Tim Crouch! as sure as I'm a livin' sinner, it was no other than Alfred Atheling! Him as is wanted for forgerin', 'bezzlement, an' half murderin' a p'liceman!"

From this it will be seen that Madam Rumor, true to her lying tongue, had as usual added largely to the poor boy's offences, and was likely enough, by and by, to lay wholesale murder to his charge.

"Well, I am blowed!" said Cobbler Tim, speaking under his breath. Then, as if the odd expletive had exhausted his powers of speech, he sat with his arms extended and the wax-thread taut between, and looked at the gamekeeper in dumb surprise.

"To think that he should ha' ta'en to poachin'!" said Benson, in a tone that indicated his opinion that there was positively no deeper depth into which humanity could fall. "I shouldn't ha' thowt it possible. I allus took him to be a good sort of a lad, barrin' bein' a bit wild, but this caps all."

"Poachin'!" said Tim, contemptuously. "Not he. He hez ten thoosan' tahmes mair sense. You're not on it there, 'keeper. Ah see ezac'ly hoo it was. Chivey Ste'enson was the man you saw fost. It was Chivey that tried to club yo' wi' his gun. It was Chivey that gat ower t' paddock hedge an' ran. Then you missed him. Depend on it, he nivver went near t' stackyard; he wadn't be sitch a dodderin' idiot. It wad be runnin' inte t' roondhoose. He gav' yo' the slip, 'keeper, an' i' seekin' him, you com' slap on to young Atheling. But what was he aboot? Ah reckon he was home-sick, an' com' to have a look at t' owd Garth ageean. Poor beggar! He's browt his pigs to a fine market an' no mistak'."

It will be seen from this that Tim was not without a good deal of shrewd discernment, and the tone in which he said "poor beggar," betokened true feeling, though the expression was anything but complimentary.

Benson was much impressed by Tim's expression of opinion, and now that Alfred was relieved from the crowning odium of being a poacher, the gamekeeper began to think of him with some favor.

"Mebbe that is it," he said. "I'll warrant it is, poor lad. Tim, what had I better do?"

"Do?" said Tim, who, as a thorough-paced Radical as became his craft, had a natural antipathy to the law as represented by constables, policemen, magistrates, etc., "why, keep your tongue still, to be sure, old fellow, an' let the poor lad go."

"Why, I'd rather do that," said Benson. "He was a very nice young fellow. His brother Robert's one of a thoosand; and his mother—right you are, Tim, you an' me 'll niver give her more heartaches than she's gotten already. We'll keep a still tongue aboot it, as you say. Silly lad! noo that I know he hezn't been poachin', I seems to pity him. It's enough to mak' one agree wi' Simon Holmes, as it's a pity the lad ain't a religious character."

"A religious character!" said the cobbler, in sarcastic tones. "Ah don't knoa se mitch aboot that. All isn't gold that glitters. There's characters as is religious, an' there's characters as isn't; an' ah'll tell yo' what it is, ah'll finnd yo' them as isn't, that's a precious lot better than them as is. That's all ah've gotten to say on that subject. I ain't mitch opinion on 'em myself."

Strange to say, the gamekeeper, who as we have seen rather prided himself on being heterodox, was inclined to take up cudgels for the orthodox belief. "Why, as for that, Tim, I hain't so sure," he said. "If I was asked who I think to be the best characters in Aspendale, I should say Simon an' Becca Holmes, Mrs. Atheling, and Mr. Robert, an' some others, an' if my owd mother had been alive, I should ha' putten her i' the list, an' they're all religious fooaks. What do yo' say to that?"

"Say? why I says this," said Tim, preparing for the fray. "Look at Crimpley the grocer. He goes ivery Sunday to a chapel at Chilworth, 'cause Thorpe Aspen Church isn't good anuff for him; an' he hez prayers in his oan hoose, an' makes a deal to do aboot religion in his talk, and yet—Sally! come here!"

Sally came from her kitchen in answer to this call—her hands all white with flour; she was in the first stage of preparing the household bread. "Noo, Tim, what d'yo' want? Don't keep me botherin' here." "What was amiss wi' them corran's you got at Crimpley's t'other day?" he asked. "Short weight by nearly two ounces," quoth Sally, "but I took good care he had 'em back." "What did yo' finnd i' your tea-caddy, when I complained 'at the tea was like drinkin' senna, owd lass?" he further inquired. "Sloe leaves," said Sally. "Old Crimpley's a limb o' Satan, for all he's a chapel-goer. Thorpe Aspen Church is good anuff for me, an' a lahtle o' that goes a long way—but there, I hain't religious." There was a strong distillation of satire in the last words, and thereupon Sally went back to her breadmaking.

"There's a religious character for yo', Jacob," said Tim, triumphantly. "They're all alike!" As if to give prompt denial to his words, the door opened at that instant, and Simon Holmes appeared with a pair of boots in his hand that needed repairs.

"What's all alike, Tim?" said the carpenter, with a smile. "Not your boots, it's to be hoped, for these ha' com' off the welts before they're half worn."

The cobbler was taken aback; but as he did not by any means lack courage, and would not show the white feather before Jacob Benson, he said boldly enough, "Why, religious fooaks. We've been talking about Jonas Crimpley."

"Why, he isn't religious fooaks, is he, Tim? He only weears one hat," said Simon.

"Yis," retorted Tim, quickly, "but he weears two feeaces under it."

"Still he isn't religious fooaks, Tim, he's nobbut one, though he may hev' as many feeaces as a chotch clock," replied Simon, keeping Tim to the mark.

"Why, I was just mentionin' him as a specimen, yo' knoa," quoth the cobbler, "just to give t' 'keeper a idea o' what my opinion is aboot 'em—nut that there isn't exceptions, an' mebbe ah sudn't ha' te go far te finnd yan."

Simon was proof against the implied compliment. "Oh, that's it!" said he, innocently. "You pick oot one that you knoa, or think, at ony rate," said he, checking himself, "isn't up to the mark, an' then say that none of 'em are. I've heeard fooaks talk aboot bad logic, and I fancy that's a specimen, whether Jonas Crimpley is or no. But that's neither here nor there," he said, changing his tone, as if he was tired of the subject. "Ha' yo' gotten ony apples i' your apple-chaim'er?"

"Yis, a few bushels," replied the cobbler; "what mak's yo' ax?" "Why, I was wonderin', noo, if you had a chance o' sellin' 'em, whether you can warrant 'em soond an' sweet." Cobbler Tim began to hope that Simon Holmes had been deputed to make a bid for the apples, which he wished to sell in readiness for his Christmas rent.

"Oh, they're all right!" said he, "ah'll warrant there isn't monny weeasters among 'em."

"Is there one, Tim? Is there one?" said Simon, seriously. "Why, yis, it's varry likely there may be one, mebbe two, but that's neeather here nor there."

"Isn't it?" replied the carpenter. "Tak' my advice, Tim. Empty the lot into the pig-tub, for if there's a rotten red streak among 'em, they're a bad lot. I'se sorry for yo'. I doot yo' can't spare 'em ower weel."

"What i' the wo'ld are yo' talkin' aboot, Simon?" said the cobbler. "Ah tell yo', that spite o' one or two bad 'uns the lot is as sweet an' as soond as if they were still upo' t' trees."

"I'se glad to hear it, Tim, an' I'll try to get yo' a customer for 'em. Noo don't forget that 'religious fooaks' may be soond an' sweet in a general way, even when yo' kno' that there's a sprinklin' o' rotten 'uns. But I did think you had mair sense, Tim, than to pick up a rotten apple and say, 'They're all alike. You mustn't tell fooaks so, or you'll fail to sell your stock."

"That's a good un!" said Jacob Benson, who had not at first caught the carpenter's drift. "That's upset your apple-cart, Tim, an' no mistake," and the gamekeeper laughed heartily.

This was more than Tim could well stand; he looked round for his lapstone, afraid that he might be driven to that last resort: but resolved on a desperate effort to regain lost ground. "Why, you can't deny," said he, "that there's a good monny precious specimens o' the sooart ah meean all aboot. If you do, you're walkin' through the wo'ld wi' your eyes shut. They're as common as toadstools an' a'most as poisonous," and the cobbler made a wry face to express his disgust.

"I nivver denied it," said Simon. "There's ower monny that is not what they owt to be, more's the pity. But talkin' aboot toadstools. Will yo' nivver eat mushrooms 'cause some are so plaguey like 'em? Look here," he continued, pointing to a bad half-crown that the cobbler had nailed to his window-sill. "There's a good few o' these aboot, but if I was to offer you a half crown oot o' my pocket, an' say, 'Here, Tim, here's something for yo',' I reckon yo' wouldn't say, 'No, thank yo', they're all alike.' Coonterfeit coin, neighbor, is a proof that there's some of the genuine article aboot somewhere. An' then what aboot these boots? Surely there's them that can cobble better than you, for if they 'are all alike,' then accordin' to present appearances, we shall hev' to go barefoot." Here he lifted up the defaulting pair. "Tim," he continued, seriously, "you are too shrewd a man to believe such nonsense, and like ninety-nine oot o' ivery hundred talkers agin religion, you know you don't mean what you say."

Before Simon Holmes had finished, Tim Crouch had rubbed his stubbly hair, had seized his hammer and lapstone, and as Simon Holmes and the gamekeeper traversed the darkened road together, they could hear the sharp rap-tap of the cobbler's strokes on the victimized leather. As the two parted at Simon's gate, the gamekeeper said, "Tim's at it yet, Simon."

"Ay, Jacob," said he, "lapstone logic is a thing you can hammer out for ony length o' time; but I expect he'll spoil the sole."

GOD'S COVENANT WITH ABRAHAM.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 13, Gen. 15 : 5-21. Golden Text, ver. 1.

Lot Captured in War—His Deliverance—A Neglected Opportunity—Abram Rejects the Spoils—Money that Bears the Mark of the Beast—Abram's Trouble—Laid before God—The Reiterated Promise — Abram Trusting against Appearances—The Faith that Pleases God—A Sign Given—Sarai's Plan to Help the Promises Along—Thirteen Years of Silence—Communion Renewed.

WHILE Lot increased in riches, and doubtless also in prestige with the abominable men of Sodom, Abram grew in his acquaintance with God. Lot, from having pitched his tent toward Sodom, forsook his tent and his pilgrim life, and came to dwell in Sodom (Gen. 14 : 12). He thus became involved in the troubles of the city. War broke out, and Lot was taken prisoner. When this news came to Abram he lost no time, but "armed his trained servants" and went to the rescue. God watched over him and his possessions; he had no quarrels of his own to avenge, and thus was out of their difficulties. God was with him, and he recovered Lot and all that he possessed. This would have been a good opportunity for Lot to renounce his worldly associations, sacrifice his business prospects, and return to Abram's tent. But the love of the world had too great a hold on Lot. What would people think if he were to abandon the style in which he lived; would he not lessen any influence for good which his position gave him? Such are the arguments which worldly believers use nowadays, and, no doubt, Lot had some such thoughts in his heart some thirty-eight hundred years ago. The fact is, rich men like to be rich, and men of position like to be somebody, and the idea of pressing this position into God's service is but an excuse to keep what they do not want to part with. So Lot returned to his unblest possessions, while Abram met with Melchizedek, "the priest of the Most High God," and was blessed in the name of the Lord.

The King of Sodom offered Abram all the spoils which he had taken from the enemy, but he found the uncle a man of very different spirit from the nephew. Lot accepted what the world could give him in Sodom; Abram would "not take from a thread even to a shoelatchet," that the King of Sodom might not have it to say, "I have made Abram rich." Some religious societies are not very particular as to how they get money for their churches, halls, preachers, etc. Begging, raffling at church bazaars, concerts, even dances are got up to enrich the funds of religious societies. Is this done in the name of Christ? Shall the world say, "I have made Christ's cause rich"? Not more than one five hundredth of our national income goes to missions, so that there is not much ground to say that the world is enriching the cause of Christ. But the money obtained by such means as we have mentioned is best kept in the world, for the mark of the beast is upon it.

While Abram lived thus before God, God's communion with him and his with God was constant. "The Word of the Lord came unto Abram in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram: I am thy Shield, and thy exceeding great Reward."

Abram was at Home with God.

A question had long been occupying his mind, and now, just when God had been speaking to him, he presented his difficulty to Him. "Lord God, what wilt Thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus? . . . Behold, to me Thou hast given no seed: and, lo, one born in mine house is mine heir." There are times when God's children question Him without first making sure that they are in full communion with Him, and then no light comes upon them, and they are tried and disheartened. God is always willing to set His children at rest, but they must not come to Him like pettish children, demanding to be satisfied, but with a spirit which rests in Him and in the confidence that all He does is well, recognizing that all difficulty comes from their lack of understanding Him. Three times already had God made promises to Abram which touched his descendants (Gen. 12 : 2, 3, 7; 13 : 14-17), and yet, although some years had elapsed since the promise was first made, he had no child, and he and his wife were growing old. God was about to show him that He is

Thus, year after year had passed by, and the fulfilment of the promise had become, from a human point of view, absolutely impossible. God's answer to Abram's question was but a reiteration of His former promises; there was nothing more for sense to rest upon than before. God said: "This [i.e., Eliezer] shall not be thine heir; but he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir. And he brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them. . . . So shall thy seed be." God had before spoken of Abram's seed as the dust of the earth—numerous, but earthly; now He spoke of a shining light giving seed which was to be as heaven upon earth. "They which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham; . . . they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham" (Gal. 3 : 7, 9). "Abraham believed God; and He counted it to him for righteousness." Three times in the New Testament are these words repeated (Rom. 4 : 3, 6; Gal. 3 : 6; James 2 : 23), which shows how God prizes a heart which will trust Him against all appearances. It is easy to trust God when we see some probability of the accomplishment of His promises; but to go steadily on trusting that our "house" shall be saved (Acts 16 : 31), while every day some of the members of that house are going further away from God; trusting on for blessing in Christian work, while we see in that work so many things which need to be altered, and do not see that alteration taking place, though we have trusted the thing over into God's hands—this is faith, and this pleases God. Yet faith is not a rash self-assertion. There are some who, without any balance, or renunciation of themselves, think that God is pledged to support them in their views of things, and who get grievously disappointed when what they have thought faith seems to be unresponded to. We are not to pioneer Him or bring Him into ours.

A fourth time God assured Abram of His promise regarding the land, and Abram asked, "Whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?" God prescribed a sacrifice, and Abram took a heifer, a she-goat, and a ram, each three years old, and a turtle-dove and a young pigeon. Each of these, except the birds, he divided, in the midst. Nothing happened, but Abram waited on. It was with God he was dealing, and it was not for him to hurry God. Would that we all could learn this lesson! As the day wore away the birds of prey which had attempted to interfere with the sacrifice ceased to trouble Abram. When we take a position of faith, then is the time that the enemy tries to harass us, especially if our faith is long tried. As the sun went down Abram fell into a deep sleep, and "an horror of great darkness fell upon him;" it was a sleep from outward things, but not too deep for him to hear the voice of God, who explained to him the future of his descendants and the reason of His delay in giving him the land—because the iniquity of the Amorites, the present possessors, was "not yet full." But this was not all; Abram's long waiting time was not in vain, "a burning lamp passed between those pieces," the sign he had desired was given him; and "the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram" to give the land to his seed.

To those who have not known what it is to tread out upon the promises of God and to find themselves alone there without support from the faith of others, it will occasion no surprise that Abram's him. His wife had not the same simple confidence in God which he had, and to her it seemed the most sensible thing to do something toward the fulfilment of God's promises. She had no hope in herself that she could bear a child, her husband was about eighty-five years old, and so she cast about to find out what was the best thing to do. It was no uncommon thing among the tribes around for the kings and princes to have concubines from among their servants. This was not the law of God, but in spite of that, Sarai suggested to Abram that he should thus take Hagar, her Egyptian maid.

Abram Did Not Ask God;

he took for granted that if Sarai, the chief party concerned, could suggest such a thing, there could not be much harm in it, and he thought it might be that in this way a son should be born to him. God needed no such help from Abram. True, a son was born, but family trouble and disagreement broke out, Hagar and Sarai both suffered, and, worst of all, Abram himself, by this act of unbelief, instead of expediting matters, just retarded the fulfilment of God's promise, and for thirteen years we hear no more of God's communing with him. Thirteen years' silence on the part of God was indeed a severe reproof. Oh, how it teaches us to keep our place with God, and not to meddle with the fulfilment of His promises!

At the end of thirteen years God once more spoke to Abram (the renewal of communion always begins on the God side). He said, "I am the Almighty God," as though to imply, "There is no need to help Me;" "walk before Me"—"not before Sarai, nor before your own judgment, but before Me"—"and be thou perfect"—"there will be no slips while you are dealing with Me." And then God gave to Abram the covenant of circumcision, a covenant which admitted of

Something on Abram's Side

—he and his descendants were to be marked in their flesh as God's; and there came, with the covenant of God, a wealth of promise to Abraham, and the new name "Abraham," instead of "Abram." "I will make My covenant between Me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly, . . . and thou shalt be a father of many nations," etc. (Gen. 17 : 2-14, 19-21). God keeps covenant, God is to be depended upon, God binds Himself to keep His Word.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may now be obtained for seventy-five cents from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company. This reduction in price is made to encourage the study of this important subject.

"COME UNTO ME."

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." — Matt. xi., 28.

Jesus is waiting to welcome the weary,
Worn with the world's fruitless striving for peace,
Tired with a night-watch that knoweth no morning,
Sick with a heart-ache that earth cannot ease.

Jesus is waiting—He standeth and knocketh,
Calling in love upon each one oppressed—
"Come unto Me, sinner, weary and laden,
I will refresh you and give you My rest.

"Long have you striven to find it without Me,
Sought it in feelings, emotional, vain;
These have all failed you, and still you are restless,
Seeking to purchase what nought can obtain.

"Will you not come? You need no preparation:
Stay not to think, but come just as you are;
Bring nothing with you, for love giveth freely,
Peace—perfect peace—that no sorrow can mar.

"Doubting and troubled one, can you not trust Me?
Able to save you from every ill,
Able to lead you through conflict to glory,
Able to say to life's storm, 'Peace, be still!'

"Oh! I am yearning to see you unburdened,
Death did I suffer that you might be free;
Will you not come? and by life-consecration
Try to win others, and bring them to Me?"

PRINCE BISMARCK, the German Chancellor—Scenes in his Life.

PRINCE BISMARCK.

Ancestry — His Mother—School-life—University Career—Enters Court Circles in 1835—Military Services, and Election to the Diet in 1847—His Political Power — Installed Ambassador to Frankfort in 1851, St. Petersburg in 1859, and Paris in 1862 — Forms a Cabinet — Attitude toward Austria—The Victory at Sadowa in 1866—War Declared by France in 1870—The Great Victory of Sedan—King William Proclaimed Emperor—An Attempt on Bismarck's Life in 1874.

Among the statesmen of Europe there is no figure more conspicuous than that of the Chancellor of the German Empire, whose portrait appears on the first page of this number. During the past two decades his influence has exercised a power in European affairs greater than that of any other man. Nor has it diminished; at the present moment, when all Europe is vaguely apprehensive of war, and a solemn hush of expectancy seems to have fallen upon the nations like that which weighs upon nature before the bursting of a thunderstorm, all eyes are turned upon him with the consciousness that on the course he may take during the next few months hangs the issue of peace or war. He is an extraordinary man whose life and character well repay study.

The Bismarck Family

was known in Stendal more than six hundred years ago, but the first Bismarck of note was Rudolf von Bismarck, who, though distinguished as a member of the Guild of Tailors, took a prominent part in the management of matters political and social affecting his native town, and, having quarrelled with the clerical authorities, died under the ban of excommunication.

In the sixteenth century the Bismarck estates at Burgstall, adjoining Stendal were coveted by the Margrave John George, who was passionately fond of hunting, and complained that the family's rights over the forest interfered with his convenience, so that finally the Bismarcks were compelled to exchange their ancestral seat for other properties granted to different branches—the branch to which the Chancellor belongs, receiving Schönhausen, the agreement being signed in 1562. There, from that time, fathers and sons have successively lived, some distinguishing themselves in war, others in diplomacy, and others again leading the quiet, unexciting life of plain country gentlemen. There lived Carl Wilhelm Ferdinand von Bismarck, an ex-captain of the Prussian Body Guard, and his wife, Louise Wilhelmina Menken, the daughter of a highly-reputable Privy Councillor, and there on April 1st, 1815, was born their third son, Otto Edward Leopold von Bismarck, whose portrait is given on our frontispiece, and who is now in the seventy-second year of his age.

was a very superior woman. She combined a rare proficiency in the accomplishments and refinements of the highest society with an equally rare proficiency in every branch of domestic economy; and, more than this, she was a Christian woman, full of zeal, but free from bigotry. She exercised a powerful influence upon the formation of the mind and principles of Otto in the earliest and most plastic period of the boy's life.

His early years were not passed in his ancestral home as Schönhausen, but at Kniephof, Pomerania, where his father possessed a second estate, to which he removed shortly after the boy's birth. Numerous reminiscences have been published of Bismarck's many of which show that the traits which have made the man remarkable were present in the boy. One of these was his restlessness; he could never bear to sit quiet at meals, and was eventually relegated by his parents to a side-table which he had all to himself.

One day in 1820, an officer, Major von Schineling, was dining with his father and mother, and having been wounded in a recent campaign, still wore his arm in a sling. The little boy gazed at him earnestly for some time, looking alternately at the Iron Cross on his breast and his bandaged arm, and suddenly jumping off his seat, planted himself before the officer, with his legs wide apart, and his hands on his hips, and asked abruptly, "Was it a shot from a cannon ball?" (See Illustration No. 1 on first page.)

When he was six years old the little Otto was sent to school at Berlin, where his elder brother was already studying. There he remained until his seventeenth year, when he was sent to Gottingen University, where he presented himself in 1832 in company with some young Mecklemburg noblemen, with whom he had just taken a pedestrian tour in the Harz Mountains. The party celebrated their arrival by a wine supper in Bismarck's new quarters. During the evening a bottle was thrown out of the window, for which offence Bismarck was summoned to appear before the Dean. He immediately obeyed, walking through the streets in his dressing-gown, and accompanied by a huge English hound. The Dean, astonished at such an apparition, and alarmed by the dog, who had sprung forward to protect his master, asked, "What do you want, sir?" Bismarck answered, "I don't want anything; what do you want with me?" showing the citation which he held in his hand. (See Illustration No. 2.)

Bismarck was first ordered to put the dog out of the room, next fined five thalers for illegally keeping the animal, and then mulcted still further for the affair of the bottle.

In 1838 Bismarck served a year of military service, and, during that period, as in his student days, distinguished himself by the wildness of his living, and the rough character of his practical jokes, rather than by earnest application to work. In 1839 his mother died, and from that time Bismarck appears to have chiefly lived in the country with his father. However, he did not neglect his military duties, serving both with the Landwehr Cavalry and the Uhlans, and taking occasional holiday trips to France, and even to England, though for true enjoyment he seems to have preferred the desolate shores of the North Sea. In 1845 his father died, and Bismarck received as his portion Schönhausen, in addition to Kniephof and Jarchelin, which had fallen to his share when he Pomeranian estates were divided on his brother's marriage four years earlier. Two years later he married Fraulein Johanna von Puttkamer, a lady nine years younger than himself, whom he loved devotedly. It is a curious fact that her family objected to the match on the ground that the future Chancellor was a madman.

Bismarck now began to take part in public life, became a Dyke Inspector, was subsequently elected a Deputy in the Saxon Diet, and had a seat

In the First United Diet.

Once launched on the stormy seas of political life, Bismarck showed himself a fearless speaker, denouncing the opinions of those who differed with him in a bold and hectoring manner, which astonished the Deputies, who winced under his biting irony. He was soon recognized as one of the ablest leaders of the Conservative Party, and fought sturdily against the Democrats, joining to his stanch loyalty a rigid Prussian particularism, which led him to vigorously combat that very union of Germany which he has been since so instrumental in achieving. It was not at that time the unity of Germany that he disliked, but union under Austria, which would in those days have been the only unity possible.

His talents were next tested in a diplomatic sphere. In the year 1851, he was installed as Ambassador to Frankfort.

He mainly devoted his energies against Austrian influence, using to counteract it his social, as well as his political, influence, and, loyally aided by his gifted wife, made his house one of the most hospitable in Frankfort.

It was in 1857, during a brief visit to Paris, that Bismarck first met Napoleon III., and formed the acquaintance which was destined to end so fatally for the Emperor. His letters to his wife at this date showed that he was unfavorably impressed by the French capital, the Emperor, and the people. Two years later he was appointed minister to Russia, which post he held until 1862, to the satisfaction alike of the Berlin Government and the Czar. At this time his opposition to Austria was the cardinal feature of his policy, and he strongly advocated an alliance between Prussia, Russia, and France against her. It was with this idea in his mind that, in May, 1862, he sought and received permission to transfer his services from St. Petersburg to Paris. He remained there until September, 1862, when he was summoned to Berlin to become

Prime Minister.

Bismarck now had in his hands the power which he had long coveted, and set himself to the task of raising Prussia to the first rank among European nations. Then began the strife between the Cabinet and the Parliament, one of the most remarkable political struggles which have ever occurred in history.

Suddenly, in January, 1864, a long-continued feud with Denmark regarding the sovereignty of broke out afresh, and, to the astonishment of Europe, Prussia, and Austria, joined forces to crush the unfortunate Dane. The result of the war showed clearly how efficient was the military organization for which King and minister had fought so strenuously, and people began to think that the minister might be successful, after all. When the peace preliminaries were signed, in August, 1864, Bismarck went with the King to Vienna, and after a brief holiday returned with renewed vigor to his Parliamentary conflict. The Deputies once more rejected his army bills, and declining to vote the Budget containing the expenses of the Danish war, once more Parliament was prorogued, and he declared that he would govern without it.

The time had now arrived for

for the first place in Germany. Bismarck recognized the fact, and shrewdly and promptly chose his time. The Dane had been forced to relinquish his hold on the duchies by his two powerful foes. He now could sit still and see those foes grapple with each other in a struggle for the plunder. In June, 1866, Prussian troops, in defiance of Austria, occupied the Duchy of Holstein, and Austria found herself braved by Prussia on one side and attacked by Italy on another. On June 15th war was declared with Austria and her allies, Hanover and Saxony, and Prussia struck hard and sharp. Moltke, under Bismarck's inspiration, had been long preparing for this life-and-death struggle, and had brought the army into a condition of perfect machine-like discipline. The campaign was short and decisive. On July 3d Bismarck, sitting on his horse on the battle-field of Sadowa, saw in the retreating legions of Austria the realization of the hopes and aspirations of fifteen years of toil and struggle. Peace was signed on July 26th, 1866, and henceforth Prussia's supremacy in Germany was recognized.

Bismarck lost no time in gathering the fruits of Sadowa, and while taking part in the triumphal festivities at Berlin, in which he was now regarded as a popular hero, he was busily completing his scheme for the reorganization of Germany, which attained its fulfilment in the formation of the North German Confederation, with Prussia as its recognized head. Hanover, Hesse-Cassel, and other disobedient Principalities were annexed, while offensive and defensive treaties were concluded with Bavaria, Wurtemburg, and Baden, and Bismarck devoted himself afresh to the great work of consolidating the numerous Teutonic fractions into one homogeneous whole.

War with France.

was an inevitable result of this consolidation. Already that fact had been foreseen by the Prussian statesman, and preparation made for it. Napoleon III. had missed his opportunity. If when war was declared between Austria and Prussia he had gone to Austria's assistance there would have been no Sedan. But Bismarck's skilful diplomacy had precluded this alliance, which would have been fatal to his policy. Seeing that the way of Prussia involved a conflict both with Austria and France, he had carefully laid his plans to engage his two foes separately. Napoleon was outwitted as well as outfought. He realized his mistake too late, and attempted to retrieve it before German unity was achieved. His opportunity came in 1870. Prussia had nominated a Hohenzollern prince for the throne of Spain, and, in deference to French remonstrances, had withdrawn him. France wanted now a virtual apology in addition. This King William refused, and on July 13th turned his back on M. Benedetti at Ems. Two days later Napoleon III. declared war.

The events of the campaign which followed are too fresh in the memory of this generation to need recapitulation here. On September 1st, after a series of crushing defeats, the French army was surrounded at Sedan, and Bismarck, from his post near the King on the field of battle, saw the last obstacle to German unity removed. (See illustration No. 3.) On the following day Napoleon himself craved an interview with his victorious foe, and Bismarck hurried from the field to meet him. They met in the high road, and Bismarck greeted the fallen monarch with the respect of a magnanimous enemy (*see illustration No.*4), just as though he were in St, Cloud. Napoleon bade him be covered, and asked for the King, and then inquired whether any quiet place could be found. A cottage was at last discovered, and in a room, ten feet square, with a deal table and two rush-bottom chairs, Bismarck and the Emperor sat for an hour, and the fate of the Third French Empire was sealed.

Napoleon hoped that his surrender would have ended the war, but it was not to be. The French people, maddened by disaster, refused to treat on terms satisfactory to the victor, and Paris was besieged. At Versailles Bismarck installed himself and his whole staff of Councillors and Staff in a villa, and there conducted both the internal and external affairs of his country, as calmly and coolly as though in his ministry at Berlin. On January 18th, 1871, the topmost stone was placed upon the edifice of German unity which Bismarck had built up with so much care when in the Galérie des Glaces of the Grand Monarque, the took place, and King William of Prussia became Emperor of Germany, amid the deafening Hochs of his victorious army, and Bismarck's long and arduous labors were crowned with success.

The man and the father, however, were not wholly absorbed in the statesman. Bismarck's son Herbert was lying wounded at Mars-la-Tour, and thither the illustrious statesman hurried to visit him. (See illustration No. 5.)

It was not to a life of ease and inactivity that Bismarck returned after his triumph over France. His conflict with the Romish Church and with the socialists have kept his life in continual turmoil. Nor was personal danger over for him when he had quitted the field of battle. One such danger was escaped on July 13th, 1874, when, while staying at Kissingen, a man named Kullman shot at him, and Bismarck narrowly escaped death. That the German people, however discontented they might be, did not approve of assassination, was manifested by the ovation he received when it was seen that the diabolical attempt to kill him had failed. (See illustration No. 6.)

It is gratifying to learn, on the authority of a writer who claims to have personal knowledge of Prince Bismarck's private life, that the great chancellor is a man of piety. He and his beloved wife are most careful in the religious training of their family, and on several occasions Bismarck has broken his usual reticence to express his implicit faith and dependence on God and his profound conviction of the truth of Christianity.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Expecting Christ's Return.—A Worker, speaking at a recent meeting of the imminent Second Coming of Christ, said: "There is an aged minister living in Glasgow, who, though he is very old, thinks that Christ may come again before he dies, and every night before going to bed he draws up his window-blinds that he may, should Christ come that night, catch the first sight of Him as He descends through the air accompanied by His angels. 'Blessed are they whom the Lord shall find watching.'"

No Time to Argue With Satan.—Mr. Calder remarked: "An aged man was once tempted to do a certain piece of very sinful work, but by God's help he was able to overcome the temptation. Still Satan tempted him, and tried to persuade him to sin, but the old workman said, 'No, Satan, I'll not do it; and I have no time to argue with you, so just leave me alone as I have another job to attend to.' But yet Satan would not let him go, but continued to tempt him; then the man lost patience, and cried, 'Get ye gone, Satan; I am going to have a feast with my Father,' and he knelt down and prayed to God. Then the temptation was completely removed from him, and he was enabled to go about his customary work. Now, whenever that old man is tempted, he goes right to Jesus, his Almighty Friend, and has the temptation taken away at once."

A Stolen Jug of Beer.—A Temperance Advocate observed: "Not long ago a boy was arrested for stealing a jug of beer. He had not drunk it himself, but had run off home with it. When inquiries were made, it was discovered that he had stolen the drink for his father, who lay at home helplessly intoxicated. He was a clever mechanic, and earned good wages, but he spent them all on strong drink. His wife, who had been a clean, tidy, good, moral young woman previous to her marriage, had been so influenced by her husband's example that she, too, had taken to drink, and was now a worse drunkard than her husband, and when some friends went to look for her, they found her in one of those drinking saloons in company with five of the worst women in the city. How could a boy brought up in such a moral atmosphere fail to be depraved? Accustomed from his earliest days to such scenes, he formed mistaken ideas of right and wrong. That man by his selfish passion for drink ruined for time and eternity not only himself but his wife and his child, and one day before the great white throne their blood shall be required of him."

Crossing a Swollen Stream.—The Rev. Mr. Ross said: "I know a minister who tells the following story about himself: 'When I was a very little boy I had occasion to make a journey of some length in company with my father. We lived in the Highlands, and the journey lay over a stream which came down from the hills. On setting out we crossed this stream, stepping from stone to stone, and so got over almost dry-shod; but when we were returning we found the stream greatly swollen, there having been rain in the interval, and what had in the morning been a small stream was now a roaring torrent. At first my father hesitated to attempt to ford it; but, gathering courage, he took me by the hand, and we stepped into the stream. As we advanced, the water gradually rose to my knees, to my waist, to my neck; we were then in the middle of the stream, and as I looked round and saw the water on every side, my heart failed me, my strength gave way, and I felt myself losing my feet. Just then my father looked down, and seeing my state, said, "Johnnie, do you see that white mark over there?" "Yes," I said. "Then keep your eyes on it, and don't look from it." I did as I was told, and soon, under the careful guidance of my father, I reached the other side in safety. And is it not much the same with the Christian? Though we in a way trust in Christ, yet when we look around us and see the cares, trials, and temptations of this life, we are apt to be troubled and lose our footing—our faith. But just then the voice of our Father comes, saying, "Fix your eyes on the mark in front—on the blessed Lord Jesus," and walking in faith, looking unto Jesus, and with our Father's tender care, we shall soon reach the other side in safety.'"

A Conference of Rats.—An Earnest Worker related a fable: "I once heard a temperance fable, and I think I can't do better than give it to you. Once the rats all met in solemn conclave to decide how to get the bait out of the trap without injury to themselves. They had lost so many of their number by heedlessly rushing into the trap tempted by the bait, that they had come to the conclusion that some plan must be devised that would allow them to obtain the cheese with greater safety to themselves. At first, all were nonplussed, but at length an old gray rat rose, and suggested that one paw should be used to hold down the spring, while the other scraped out the bait. This device rather pleased the majority, and was about to be adopted when there hopped forward a rat with only three legs. 'One moment,' said he, 'that plan has been tried already, and though for some time it may succeed, yet by familiarity one becomes careless, and sooner or later snap goes the spring. Then are you indeed fortunate if you escape even as I am. Suppose,' continued he, 'that you try leaving it alone, and you will find you can get on well enough without it.' That is the only safe way to deal with sin."

Some Children Nearly Poisoned.—Some Years ago there was a party of young children, and the people who gave the party had a fine large garden full of gooseberry bushes and other fruit bushes. The children got liberty to take as much fruit as they wanted; but they were specially warned against eating any of the fruit of a large laburnum tree which grew in the garden, being told that it was extremely poisonous. All the children promised obedience, but no sooner were the adults out of sight than four or five left the fruit bushes and stood looking up into the tree. Nor did they stop there; they climbed up, got of the poisonous fruit, and did eat. Yes, although it had a most disagreeable taste, yet because it had been forbidden them, they thought there must be something peculiarly good about it, and that the older people wished to keep it all to themselves. But they soon found out that they had done wrong, for they were very sick and some just escaped death. So when we get Christ's commands in the Bible, we should obey them, and not begin to reason as to whether it will be for our benefit or not. God knows best, and if we are His then He will order all things for our good. And if we do forsake God and follow our own judgment, we shall find when too late our sad mistake."

Mary, the Miner's Daughter.—Mr. Williamson observed: "Some time ago a miner with his little girl was passing an open-air meeting, where the Gospel was being declared. A word from the speaker's lips touched his heart that had long been closed against the Sun of Righteousness. He tried, as many do, to banish the solemn thoughts, but failing to do so, at a late hour he went to his little girl's bedside, and, waking her gently, he said, 'Mary, will you pray for your drunken father?' When the little one was fairly aroused from her slumber, she sat up in bed, and putting both her tiny hands together, she prayed in childish words that the Lord would save him. 'Now, father,' she said, 'give me my Bible, and I will read a bit for you.' She opened the Bible, and read, 'For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' 'What does it mean by whosoever, Mary?' he asked. 'My teacher told me that it meant everybody who likes. I know it means me at any rate, father, and I am sure it must mean you, too.' 'Go to sleep, Mary,' he said; 'I understand it now.' There that rough collier, kneeling by the bedside of his little Mary, who seemed to him a God-sent messenger, asked forgiveness, and received the pardon of all his sins."

PILLARS OF SMOKE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Feb. 6, 1887.

"Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke?"—CANTICLES 3 : 6.

The Wonderful Architecture of Smoke—Bible References to It—Typical of the Church—The Smoke of Martyrdom—Persecutors not all Catholics—Bancroft's Indictment of Protestant Persecutors—Historical Massacres—The Evangelist and the Gamblers at Ashtabula—The Complaint from the Theatres—Smoke a Symbol of Beauty—Spires of Churches as Moral Thermometers—A Beatific Institution—Perfumed Smoke—President Lincoln's Calculation—The Arbiter of Nations—A Symbol of Speed—That Last Universal Blaze.

THE architecture of the smoke is wondrous, whether God with His finger curls it into a cloud or rounds it into a dome, or points it in a spire, or spreads it in a wing, or, as in the text, hoists it in a pillar. Watch it winding up from the country farmhouse in the early morning, showing that the pastoral industries have begun; or, see it ascending from the chimneys of the city, telling of the homes fed, the factories turning out valuable fabric, the printing-presses preparing book and newspaper, and all the ten thousand wheels of work in motion. On a clear day this vapor spoken of mounts with such buoyancy, and spreads such a delicate veil across the sky, and traces such graceful lines of circle and semicircle, and waves and tosses and sinks and soars and scatters with such affluence of shape and color and suggestiveness that, if you have never noticed it, you are like a man who has all his life lived in Paris, and yet never seen the Luxembourg, or all his life in Rome and never seen the Vatican, or all his life at Lockport and never seen Niagara. Forty-four times the Bible speaks of the smoke, and it is about time that somebody preached a sermon recognizing this strange, weird, beautiful, elastic, charming, Terrific and Fascinating Vapor.

Across the Bible sky floats the smoke of Sinai, the smoke of Sodom, the smoke of Ai, the smoke of the pit, the smoke of the volcanic hills when God touches them, and in my text the glorious Church of God coming up out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke.

In the first place, these pillars of smoke in my text indicate the suffering the Church of God has endured. What do I mean by the Church? I mean not a building, not a sect, but those who, in all ages, and all lands, and of all beliefs, love God, and are trying to do right. For many centuries the heavens have been black with

The Smoke of Martyrdom.

If set side by side you could girdle the earth with the fires of persecution. Rowland Taylor burned at Hadleigh; Latimer burned at Oxford; John Rogers burned at Smithfield; John Hooper burned at Gloucester; John Huss burned at Constance; Lawrence Saunders burned at Coventry; Joan of Arc burned at Rouen.

Protestants have represented Catholics as having a monopoly of persecutors, but both Protestant and Catholic have practised infamous cruelties. The Catholics, during the reign of Hunneric, were by Protestants put to the worst tortures stripped of their clothing, hoisted in the air by pulleys with weights suspended from their feet, then let down, and ears and eyes, nose and tongue were amputated, and red-hot plates of iron were put against the tenderest part of their bodies.

George Bancroft, the historian, says of the State of Maryland: "In the land which Catholics had opened to Protestants mass might not be said publicly; no Catholic priest or bishop might utter his faith in a voice of persuasion; no Catholic might teach the young. If a wayward child of a Papist would but become an apostate, the law wrested for him from his parents a share of their property. Such were the methods adopted to prevent the growth of Popery."

Catholicism as well as Protestantism has had its martyrs. It does seem as if when any one sect got complete dominancy in any land, the devil of persecution and cruelty took possession of that sect. Then see the Catholics after the Huguenots. See the Gentiles after the Jews in Touraine, where a great pit was dug and fire lighted at the bottom of the pit, and one hundred and sixty Jewish victims were consumed. See the Presbyterian Parliament of England, more tyrannical in their treatment of opponents than had been the criminal courts. Persecution against the Baptists by Pedo-Baptists. Persecution of the Established Church against the Methodist Church. Persecution against the Quakers. Persecution against the Presbyterians. Under Emperor Diocletian one hundred and forty-four thousand Christians were massacred, and seven hundred thousand more of them died from banishment and exposure.

Witness the sufferings of the Waldenses, of the Albigenses, of the Nestorians. Witness St. Bartholomew's massacre. Witness the Duke of Alva driving out of life eighteen thousand Christians. Witness Herod, and Nero, and Decius, and Hildebrand, and Torquemada, and Earl of Montfort, and Lord Claverhouse, who when told that he must give account for his cruelties, said, "I have no need to account to man, and as for God I will take Him in my own hands." A red line runs through the Church history of nineteen hundred years, a line of blood. Not by the hundreds of thousands, but by the millions must we count those slain for Christ's sake. No wonder John Milton put the groans of the martyrs to an immortal tune, writing:

"Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold."

The smoke of martyrs' homes and martyrs' bodies if rolling up all at once would have eclipsed the noonday sun, and turned the brightest day the world ever saw into a midnight. "Who is she that cometh up out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke?"

Has Persecution Ceased?

Ask that young man who is trying to be a Christian in a store or factory, where from morning to night he is the butt of all the mean witticisms of unbelieving employés. Ask that wife whose husband makes her fondness for the house of God, and even her kneeling prayer by the bedside a derision, and is no more fit for her holy companionship than a filthy crow would be fit companion for a robin or a golden oriole. Compromise with the world and surrender to its conventionalities and it may let you alone, but all who will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution. Be a theatre-going, card-playing, wine-drinking, round-dancing Christian, and you may escape criticism and social pressure. But be an up and down, out and out follower of Christ, and worldling will wink to worldling as he speaks your name, and you will be put in many a doggerel, and snubbed by those not worthy to blacken your oldest shoes. When broke, and let down the most of the carload of passengers to instant death, Mr. P. P. Bliss was seated on one side of the aisle of the car writing down a Christian song which he was composing, and on the other side a group of men were playing cards. Whose landing-place in eternity would you prefer—that of P. P. Bliss, the Gospel singer, or of the card-players?

High Hats at Theatres

A great complaint comes from the theatres about the ladies' high hats, because they obstruct the view of the stage, and a lady reporter asked me the other day what I thought about it, and I told her that if the indecent pictures of actresses in the show windows of Brooklyn and New York were accurate pictures of what goes on in many of the theatres, night by night, then it would be well if the ladies' hats were a mile high, so as to completely obstruct the vision. If professed Christians go to such places during the week, no one will ever persecute them for their religion, for they have none, and they are the joke of hell. But let them live a consecrated and Christian life and they will soon run against sneering opposition.

For a compromise Christian character an easy time now, but for consecrated behavior, grimace and caricature. For the body, thanks to the God of free America, there are now no swords or fiery stakes, but for the souls of thousands of the good, in a figurative sense, rack and gibbet and Torquemada. The symbol of the domestic and social and private and public suffering of a great multitude of God's dear children, pillars of smoke. What when, during the Sepoy rebellion, a regiment of Highlanders came up and found the dead body of one of General Wheeler's daughters, who had been insulted and mauled and slain by the Sepoys. So great was the wrath against these murderers that the Scotch regiment sat down, and, cutting off the hair of this dead daughter of General Wheeler, they divided it among them, and each one counted the number of the hairs given him, and each took an oath, which was executed, that for each hair of the murdered daughter they would dash out the life of a bestial Sepoy. But as we look over the story of those who in all ages have suffered for the truth, while we leave vengeance to the Lord, let us band together in one solemn vow, one tremendous oath, after having counted the host of the martyrs, that for each one of those glorious men and women who died for the truth an immortal soul shall live, live with God and live forever.

But as I already hinted in the first sentence of this sermon, nothing can be more beautiful than the figures of smoke on a clear sky. You can see what you will in the contour of this volatile vapor, now enchanted castles, now troops of horsemen, now bannered procession, now winged couriers, now a black angel of wrath under a spear of the sunshine turned to an angel of light, and now from horizon to horizon the air is a picture-gallery filled with masterpieces of which God is the artist, morning clouds of smoke born in the sunrise, and evening clouds of smoke laid in the burnished sepulchres of the sunset.

The beauty of the transfigured smoke is a divine of the Church. The fairest of all the fair is she. Do not call those persecutors of whom I spoke, the Church. They are the parasites of the Church, not the Church itself. Her mission is to cover the earth with a supernatural gladness, to open all the prison-doors, to balsam all the wounds, to moss all the graves, to burn up the night in the fireplace of a great morning, to change iron handcuffs into diamonded wristlets, to turn the whole race around, and whereas it faced death, commanding it, "Right about face for heaven!" According to the number of the spires of the churches in all our cities, towns, and neighborhoods, are the good homes, the worldly prosperities, and the pure morals, and the happy souls.

Meet me at any depot the world over, and with my eyes closed, take me by the hand, and lead me so that my feet will not stumble, and without my once looking down, or looking on the level, take me to some high roof or tower and let me see the tops of the churches, and I will tell you the proportion of suicides, of arsons, of murders, of thefts. According as the churches are numerous are the crimes few. According as the churches are few the crimes are numerous.

The Most Beautiful Organization

the world ever saw or ever will see is the much-maligned Church, the friend of all good, the foe of all evil, "fair as the moon and clear as the sun." Beautiful in her author, beautiful in her mission, the heroine of the centuries, the bride of Christ, the queen of the nations!

Men may desecrate it, as Cromwell when he stabled his cavalry horses in St. Paul's Cathedral; or break off the image of Christ, as did the iconoclasts in York Minster; or hurl against it august literary antipathies, as did Gibbon; or plot its overthrow, as do some in every community whose pride and hate and debauchery are reproved by the Ten Commandments which it thunders, and the Sermon on the Mount which it breathes. But it will stand as long as the earth stands, the same unique and and miraculous thing for which God decreed it. Small wits tax their brain to say things that will put her at disadvantage, but many of them will send for its condolence when dying, and their children will be gathered up under its benedictions after the parental curse has been removed. Through her gates will march all the influences for good that shall ever reach our world. Take her membership as a mass, not speaking of the acknowledged exceptions, they are the noblest, grandest, kindest, best men and women of the ages But for them the earth would long ago have been a burned-out volcano. They have been the salt that has kept the human race from putrefaction insufferable either to human or angelic olfactories.

You lying and hypocritical world, shut up those slanders about the Church of Christ, an institution which, far from being what it ought to be, and never pretending to be perfect, is five hundred times better than any other institution that the world ever saw or ever dreamt of. The highest honor I ever had, and the highest honor I shall ever receive, and the highest honor I ever want is to have my name on her records as a member. At her altars I repented. At her sacraments I believed. In her service let me die. From her doors let me be buried. O Church of God! Thou home of the righteous! Thou harbor from tempest! Thou refuge for the weary! Thou lighthouse of many nations! Thou type of heaven! I could kiss thy very dust with ecstasy of affection.

"For her my tears shall fall,
For her my prayers ascend,
To her my toils and cares be given Till toils and cares shall end."

"Perfumed Smoke,"

says Solomon, in the words following my text. Not like the fumes coughed up from the throat of a steam-pipe, or poisoned with the gases of chemical factories, or floating in black wrath from the conflagration of homesteads, or sulphurous from blazing batteries, but sweet as a burning grove of cinnamon or jungle of sassafras, or the odors of a temple censer. "Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense?" Hear it, men and women everywhere, that the advance of the genuine Church of Christ means peace for all nations.

Victor Hugo, in his book entitled "Ninety-three," says, "Nothing calmer than smoke, but nothing more startling. There are peaceful smokes, and there are evil ones. The thickness and color of a line of smoke make the whole difference between war and peace, between fraternity and hatred. The whole happiness of man or his complete misery is sometimes expressed in this thin vapor which the wind scatters at will." The great Frenchman was right, but I go further, and say that as the kingdom of God advances like pillars of smoke, the black volumes belching from batteries of war and pouring out from portholes of ships will vanish.

Lincoln's Calculation.

A distinguished general of the late war told me recently that Abraham Lincoln proposed to avoid our civil conflict by purchase of all the slaves of the South and setting them free. He calculated what would be a reasonable price for them, and, when the number of millions of dollars that would be required for such a purpose was announced, the proposition was scouted, and the North would not have made the offer, and the South would not have accepted it if made. "But," said my military friend, "the war went on, and just the number of millions of dollars that Mr. Lincoln calculated would have been enough to make a reasonable purchase of all the slaves, were spent in war, besides all the precious lives that were hurled away in the two hundred and fifty battles." In other words, there ought to be some other way for men to settle their controversies without butchery.

The Church of God will yet become

The Arbiter of Nations

If the world would allow it, it could to-day step in between Germany and France and settle the trouble about Alsace and Lorraine, and between Russia and Bulgaria, and between England and her antagonists, and between all the other nations that are flying at each other's throats, and command peace and disband armies, and harness for the plough the war horses now being hitched to ammunition wagons, or saddled for cavalry charge. That time must come, or, through the increased facility for shooting men and blowing up cities and whelming hosts to instant death, so that we can kill a regiment easier than we could once kill a company, and kill a brigade easier than we could once kill a regiment, the patent offices of the world more busy than ever in recognizing new enginery of destruction, the human race will, after awhile, go fighting with one arm, and hobbling with one foot, and stumbling along with one eye, and some ingenious inventor inspired of the archangel of all mischief, will contrive a machine that will bore a hole to the earth's centre, and some desperate nation will throw into that hole enough dynamite to blow this hulk of a planet into fragments, dropping like meteoric stones on surrounding stellar habitations.

But this shall not be, for whatever I let go,

I Hang On To My Bible, which tells me that the blacksmith's shop shall yet come to its grandest use when the warrior and the husbandman shall enter it side by side, and the soldier shall throw into its bank of fires his sword, and the farmer shall pick it up a ploughshare, and the straightest spear shall be bent into a crook at each end, and then cut in two, and what was one spear shall be two pruning-hooks. Down with Moloch and up with Christ! Let no more war-horses eat out of the manger where Jesus was born.

Peace! Forever roll off the sky the black pillars of smoke from the Marengos, and Salamancas, and Borodinos, and Sedans, and Gettysburgs of earth! And right after them, roll into the heavens the peaceful vapors from the chimneys of farmhouses and asylums and churches and capitals of Christian nations, and, as the sunlight strikes through these vapors they will write in letters of jet and gold all over the sky from horizon to zenith: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill to men!"

While thinking of these things I looked out from my window, and the wind was violently blowing. And I saw from many chimneys the smoke tossed in the air, and whirled in great velocity, volume after volume, fold after fold, and carried on the swift wind were the great pillars of smoke. And helped by Solomon in the text I saw symbolized. Do you realize the momentum the Church of God is under? Why, the smoke of a chimney on the top of Mount Washington, when the wind is blowing sixty miles the hour, is slow as compared with the celerity of good influences. For fifty-nine centuries the devil had it his own way among the nations. Nearly all the great missionary movements have been started within the century, and see what one century has done to recover the world from fifty-nine centuries of devastation. What great revivals! What mighty churches! What saved millions!

From the ruins of Babylon and Assyria and Nineveh, and the valleys of the Nile, confirmations have been exhumed proving to all fair-minded men that the Bible is

The Truest Book Ever Written.

The mythologies of Egypt were found to have embodied in them the knowledge of man's expulsion from Paradise, and the sacrifice of a great emancipator. Moses' account of the creation, corroborated by the hammer of Christian geologists; the oldest profane writers like Hiromus, Helanicus, and Berosus, confirming the Bible account of ancient longevity; Tacitus and Pliny confirming the Bible accounts of destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah; Tacitus and Porphyry telling the same story of Christ as Matthew and Luke told; Macrobius telling of the massacre of children in Bethlehem, and Phlegon sketching at the crucifixion.

It is demonstrated to all honest men that it is not so certain that William Cullen Bryant wrote "Thanatopsis," or Longfellow wrote "Hiawatha," as that God, by the hand of prophet and apostle, wrote the Bible. All the wise men in science and law and medicine and literature and merchandise are gradually coming to believe in Christianity, and soon there will be no people who disbelieve in it, expect those conspicuous for lack of brain or men with two families, who do not like the Bible, because it rebukes their swinish propensities.

The time is hastening when there will be no infidels left except libertines and harlots and murderers. Millions of Christians where once there were thousands, and thousands where once there were hundreds. What a bright evening this, the evening of the nineteenth century! and which will dawn in thirteen years from now, will, in my opinion, bring universal victory for Christ and the Church, that now is marching on with step double-quick, or, if you prefer the figure of the text, is being swept on in the mighty gales of blessing, imposing and grand and majestic and swift like pillars of smoke.

Oh, come into the Church through Christ the door, a door more glorious than that of the Temple of Hercules, which had two pillars, and one was gold, and the other emerald! Come in to-day! The world you leave behind is a poor world, and it will burn and pass off like pillars of smoke. Whether the final conflagration will start in the coal mines of Pennsylvania, which, in some places, have for many years been burning and eating into the heart of the mountains; or whether it shall begin near the California geysers, or whether from out the furnaces of Cotopaxi, and Vesuvius, and Stromboli, it shall burst forth upon the astonished nations, I make no prophecy; but all geologists tell us that we stand on the lid of a world, the heart of which is a raging, roaring, awful flame, and some day God will let the red monsters out of their imprisonment of centuries, and New York on fire in 1835, and Charleston on fire in 1865, and Chicago on fire in 1872, and Boston on fire in 1873, were only like one spark from a blacksmith's forge as compared with which will be seen in other worlds. But gradually the flames will lessen, and the world will become a great living coal, and that will take on ashen hue, and then our ruined planet will begin to smoke, and the mountains will smoke, and the valleys will smoke, and the islands will smoke, and the seas will smoke, and the cities will smoke, and the five continents will be five pillars of smoke. But the black vapors will begin to lessen in height and density, and then will become hardly visible to those who look upon it from the sky galleries, and after awhile from just one point there will curl up a thin solitary vapor, and then even that will vanish, and there will be nothing left except the charred ruins of a burned-out world, the corpse of a dead star, the ashes of an extinguished planet, a fallen pillar of smoke.

But that will not interfere with your investments if you have taken Christ as your Saviour. Secure heaven as your eternal home, you can look down upon a dismantled, disrupted, and demolished earth without any perturbation.

"When wrapped in fire the realms of ether glow,
And heaven's last thunder shake the earth below,
Thou, undismayed, shalt o'er the ruins smile,
And light thy torch at Nature's funeral pile."

A BOY DYING TO SAVE HIS FRIEND.

A SINGULAR drowning catastrophe occurred recently in Philadelphia. Two boys, playmates, aged respectively twelve and thirteen years, went to the Schuylkill River on January 22d. A park guard warned them that it was dangerous, but as the ice at the edge was three inches thick, and they saw many people there, they went forward. A boy who passed them shortly afterward heard one of the boys bantering the other, and daring him to cross to Belmont Island, a distance of about twenty-five feet. The second boy was unwilling to venture, though he could swim, while his companion could not. Finally, the first boy went forward, but before he had gone many steps the ice broke beneath him, and with one loud cry for help he fell in. Immediately his companion ran to his assistance and bravely plunged into the icy river. Neither of them was seen again until the next day when the river was dragged, and they were brought up dead locked in each other's arms. What the boys did not know was, that although at the edge of the river the ice was three inches thick, it was not one inch thick in the middle, owing to the action of the current having worn it away from below. It is a similar want of knowledge that leads to spiritual catastrophes. When Satan is tempting the young to their ruin, he shows them that the first steps are safe, and they do not know that the ground further on, which looks equally substantial, is undermined (Prov. 14 : 12).

AN UNRECOGNIZED BROTHER.

A ROMANTIC meeting took place in a convent in St. Louis, Mo., a few days ago. For some weeks a young man, twenty years of age, has been searching that city for a certain family. At length he found them and told a strange story. He said that fifteen years ago he and his sister, both young children, were living with their parents in Southern Illinois. His mother died, and his father, wishing to go to new scenes, broke up housekeeping and gave his two children away. The boy was given to a machinist in Alton, Ill. He did not know who had his sister, but after fifteen years he discovered that she had been given to this St. Louis family and now he demanded to see her. His request was denied at first, but after long pleading he was permitted to visit her at the convent, where she was being educated, on condition that he did not make himself known as her brother. He went and faithfully observed his promise. The girl talked to him as a stranger, while the young man yearned over her in a way she was unable to understand. He hoped that she would have recognized him, and her failing to do so caused him bitter disappointment. Recognition and reunion may come in time, and then the girl will grieve over her coldness at that meeting. It may be hoped that then both will be led by their experience to see the sin and ingratitude of all who fail to recognize in Christ their Elder Brother, and may give their hearts to Him who came to His own and they received Him not (John 1 : 11).

AGNES, THE DEFORMED TEACHER.

IN a letter, published in the Missionary Link, from Miss McLathrop, is the following description of the work of a zealous Hindoo convert : On visiting one of our schools in Allahabad, I noticed a poor working-girl, deformed from spinal disease. I knew from her dress, poor as it was, that she was a Christian child. She told me her name was Agnes, and that she was fourteen or fifteen years old ; but she was very small, and as ignorant as any of the Hindoo girls. I inquired about her, and found she belonged to so low a family that no church was willing to recognize her. This girl, hearing a school was opened within her reach, determined to attend it, although the teacher was a Hindoo girl. She was always present, and so diligent, that from knowing nothing, she made rapid progress and learned to love her Bible. Some weeks ago she asked me if she might open a school near her house, as many women and girls wished to learn. Some, she told me, she had been teaching ever since she knew enough to do so! Two days ago I went to see what progress she was making, and found thirty-three women and girls sitting outside on the ground, as their little mud hut would not hold so many. Agnes was moving among them like a queen, and evidently much beloved and respected. A sister is helping her. I do not know when I have felt more encouraged than in seeing what this young girl is now, remembering how short the time is since she was perfectly ignorant.

A MERCHANT'S ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

AT the anniversary of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York, celebrated on January 24th, the following testimony was given to the young men as an encouragement to renewed effort. It was from a well-known merchant in New England now retired from business :

To me the Association was a friend in need ; the turning of a new and bright page in life, the opening of a door of hospitality and welcome. I was a stranger, just from New England, come to take a clerkship in a dry-goods house. I was boarding at the Cortlandt Street Hotel, and had a small, cold room, on the top floor ; I was lonely in the midst of crowds ; the hotel and streets were teeming with beggars, and at night from Canal Street down Broadway was a dangerous place ; my predecessor (a book-keeper) had been ruined by gambling, and had appropriated the firm's money ; what new and strange temptations were around me and among them the voice of the siren !

The Association was a new world into which I was ushered, and friends, most helpful, welcomed me, and have remained true to this day. Some of them have largely shaped my course in life.

I there made acquaintances who were of service to me in many ways ; men whom I should probably never have met but for my connection there ; one gentleman, for instance, sought me out, and desired my services at a salary more than double that I was receiving.

The Association did a work which no other organization could do for young men. Certainly my career was influenced by it in a marked manner. The Boarding-House Committee afforded me a home more congenial than the hotel ; to this I invited a young member of the Association (also a clerk in a wholesale store) the first time we met ; the result was, he came, and also to the church I attended, was converted, and is to-day a Doctor of Divinity.

A MAN'S SEARCH FOR A NEIGHBOR.

AN uncle and nephew made an astonishing discovery in Brooklyn, N. Y., a few days ago. In 1867 an Englishman came to America to search for his brother, to whom he was deeply attached, but who had been lost sight of for some years after coming to America. The Englishman searched for him through New York and the Eastern and Middle States without success. He then dispaired of discovering him, but having conceived a liking for this country, he decided not to return to England, but to live here for the remainder of his life. Accordingly, in 1875, he bought a house and settled down in Sands Street, Brooklyn. A few days ago he had occasion to mail a letter to a friend in the same city, and wrote his name and address on the lower left-hand corner of the envelope. The inscription attracted the notice of the letter-carrier who delivered the letter, owing to the name, which was an uncommon one, being the same as his own. He communicated with the writer, and found that he was his uncle. The letter-carrier was the son of the Englishman's brother who had been so long and persistently sought for. The two men had been living for twelve years within two blocks of each other, and neither knew it. It is remarkable that so long a time should have passed without the discovery being made. That was probably due to the two men being so engrossed by their own affairs, as dwellers in cities necessarily are, that they had no opportunity of getting acquainted. It is a sad fact, however, that the two men might have attended the same Brooklyn church for the same length of time without discovering their relationship. The lawyer who asked Christ, "Who is my neighbor?" has left many descendants (Luke 10 : 29).

HOW GENERAL GORDON DIED.

A CHARACTERISTIC letter from the Mahdi, describing the capture of Khartoum and the death of General Gordon, which has fallen into the hands of the British Consul at Zanzibar, was published last week to the New York Herald. It is dated April 28th, 1885, and announces the taking of Khartoum on January 29th. In the course of his letter the Mahdi said, "Though thinking to obtain safety by entering their enclosures and shutting the doors, they (Gordon's troops) were met face to face and hewn with swords and stabbed with spears until their cries were terrible. They were cut in pieces at once there upon the ground. Then the troops of God fell upon the rest of the people, who had shut their doors, fearing a like fate. They were taken up and killed properly. None were left but little children and slaves. But as to the enemy of God, Gordon, though we had warned him and talked kindly to him, that he might return to God, yet he never did so, because his miserable state was foreordained by God. Because of his foolishness he was removed by God to the place of His wrath, which is a bad place to remain in. The end of this guilty people is that they were cut off, which—thanks be to God—befalls those who are to receive fire as their reward, while light is reserved for those who shall receive heaven as their dwelling-place."

A ZENANA LADY AT A BRAHMO SERVICE.

ONE of the devoted ladies who are working in the homes of the women of India has sent to the Indian Witness an interesting account of a religious service conducted by a Brahmin, which she recently attended. The following extracts from her narrative show the kind of teaching now given in India by the native preachers :

While we were teaching the daughters of a Brahmin, his wife came in with two garlands of fragrant white flowers which she put round our necks, inviting us at the same time to a prayer-meeting for women only, to be held at their house on the following Saturday. The service was held in the court-yard, under a canopy, two tall flags with Bengali texts on them flying on each side. The preacher, a grave, fatherly old man, was seated in front on a small carpet with a musical instrument, with but one string, lying by his side. There were fourteen women present, including five from his own family. Our pupil, Sharala, a fine-looking girl of seventeen, sat near us, from time to time replenishing the incense-cup. The solemn, ascetic-looking preacher, the earnest, expressive faces of the women, the smoke of the incense, the dismal sound of the cithar and conch and the monotonous voice of the officiating padri made it a strangely impressive scene.

The service commenced with a hymn, the preacher leading with the ektara, and his wife accompanying him on the cithar. In his prayer he mentioned the sinless life of Christ, and asked God to make us like Him, pure and holy. After the conclusion of the prayer, he said : "Let us withdraw our thoughts from the world and examine ourselves," and there was silence for five minutes. The drift of the sermon which followed was asceticism : 'we must strive to live the true Bairagi life, care for nothing in this world, give up all our earthly possessions, husbands, wives, children, houses, lands, etc. ; we must grind all these down to nourish our souls as wheat is ground in a mill to sustain our bodies. After the sermon, which was a very long one, with a good deal of repetition, the women were asked to pray. P——, one of our former pupils, was the first one. The preacher's wife prayed next, pleading for help and guidance, and there were a few others who prayed after her. At the close they said: "We offer these petitions bowing at Thy feet," and they all touched their foreheads to the ground. The preacher prayed for the two Christian sisters who, for the love of Christ, go about from house to house seeking to do good, and asked for a blessing on their work. The service concluded with the benediction very much like the form used in our churches. When the women arose, they bowed at each other's feet and kissed one another. We were wondering if we were going to have this ceremony performed on us, but they came and shook hands only.

A DISCHARGED NURSE.

IN a recent address Rev. Sam Jones said:

God save me and save you from the fatal mistake of thinking that I can do anything. The most severe tests and trials of an evangelist result from the fact that people will depend on him. Quit looking to me. Look to God. The good work of God is preceding any effort of yours. God is working ahead of us. Let us follow close after God and work in earnest.

Just a few years ago, one morning in our family room, I was sitting reading just after breakfast. There was a little nurse girl there, about sixteen years of age, and I heard my wife say to her, "Sally, you may go this morning, and tell your mother I don't want you any longer." I read along a minute or two, and then I looked. The girl was standing with the big tears running down her cheeks. She looked at my wife, and said, "Mrs. Jones," and the lip began to quiver. "Mrs. Jones, please, ma'am, don't turn me off. I know I'm the poorest servant you ever had, but let me stay with you and I'll try and do better." I got in to beg for the poor girl just as hard as I could, and I thought to myself if the Lord should come down here and say, "You may go; I don't want you any longer," I would do just like that poor girl—I would fall down at His feet, and say, "Please, Lord, don't turn me off; I know I'm the poorest servant you ever had; but please, Lord, I'll try to do better." Let me live and die in God's service. But God won't turn you off. Go to work; let's do what we can for the glory of God and for the good of our fellow-men.

THE SECOND ADVENT.

Fourteen Years Until the End of the Age.

The Preacher Predicts Wars, Earthquakes, Revolutions, Pestilence, Massacres and Other Terrible Things, and Describes in Graphic Terms How Christians Are to be Caught Up in the Air Amid Great Consternation in Society.

[The following report with the above heading appeared mainly in the Plaindealer daily newspaper of Cleveland, Ohio, on Nov. 15, 1886.]

THE Rev. M. Baxter, editor of the Christian Herald, London, England, delivered a series of discourses yesterday, morning, afternoon, and evening, in the Mission Church, on the corner of Ohio and Brownell streets. His subjects were: "Coming Great Judgments," "End of the Age," and "Coming of Christ." All quotations, biblical and otherwise, pertinent to his subject, he has on his tongue's end. His delivery is rapid though distinct, speaking with a broad English accent. He wears a full beard, slightly mixed with gray, and a thick growth of brown hair. Mr. Baxter is a thorough believer in Gabriel and his horn and according to his theory the good Christians will have to begin to make preparations for the ascension heavenward, as that event is likely to occur not later than fourteen years from date. Ascension, or any other kind of robes will not be required by the favored ones, the speaker claiming that inasmuch as Elijah dropped his mantle before he went to heaven, all earthly clothes will be left behind by the aërial excursionists.

The speaker predicted wars and revolutions of a colossal order during the next two or three years in Europe, resulting in the extension of France to the Rhine and its victory over Germany. In 1890 or '91, he said ten kingdoms will be formed out of the existing twenty-three, and he quoted some prophesies, found in Daniel 7: 24, and ii., 35, where the prophet saw that grew on the forehead of a strange beast: from these great horns a little horn will rise, little in regard to the kingdom it represents, but destined after a few years to become the monarch of the world. Three and a half years of cruelty and persecution will follow, and millions of Christian people will be massacred throughout the world. This he thinks will occur between 1897 and 1900. A test of the truth of his assertions he held, will come ten years before the final end, when the ten kingdoms referred to by Daniel as the ten horns must be formed. The little horn, he said, represents the Antichrist, who will be a Napoleon, and will form a covenant with the Jews, according to Daniel 9: 27, seven years before the End, and will lead them back to Palestine. He thought it rather strange that the Jews rejected the Messiah when he did come, after the overwhelming proofs in the prophecies that Christ was the true Messiah, but he explained it by saying that when the Jews called upon their chief priests and rulers of the synagogues, they merely explained Christ's coming by saying to their congregations: "You are getting beyond your depth; these are things you cannot understand."

"So it is," said the preacher, "that many mistakes have been made, and in the same way people neglect the prophecies now about Christ's second coming. People ask

How Do We Know These Things?"

He quoted as partial proof the second and third verses of chapter eleven of Revelation: "But the court which is without the temple leave out and measure it not, for it is given to the Gentiles; and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months. And I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophecy a thousand two hundred and threescore days clothed in sackcloth." The treading under foot of Jerusalem, by the Mahommedans, began in 637 of the Christian era. "A thousand two hundred and threescore days" means the same number of years, which refers to 1260 years of the Mahommedan Antichrist from 637 to 1897, and from thence the 3½ years' slaying of Christian witnesses until 1900. Then also the 1260 years of the Papal Antichrist were calculated by Matthew Henry, the great commentator, to be from 606 to 1866, with thirty years of troubles and wars culminating in 1896, leaving about 3½ years to finish the century with the massacre of the Christians. Before the ten kingdoms are properly formed by 1890–91 there must be great wars and revolutions in Europe, such as have never been known. The great powers after the war will unite in a ten-kingdomed confederacy — namely, Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, and Bulgaria-with-Roumania.

Then the Antichrist

will arise, and according to the 8th chapter of Daniel, we are to look for his coming in the East, and becoming king of Syria. At a later period when he becomes emperor of the ten kings of the ten kingdoms, Christianity will be unpopular, the Antichrist will decree its suppression, churches will be burned, and Bibles destroyed.

"Though the European wars have not yet begun," said the speaker, "you will all admit that when they shall begin, it will be a corroboration of what I predict; you will therein perceive a clear and striking sign that we are closing upon this dispensation, and when Antichrist shall enter into an agreement with the Jews, when that covenant is made, it will show that there are but seven years left to the end of the age. Then, the truth will strike everybody like a bombshell and like dynamite. This end of the age is to take place and Eve's days which is also at the end of three hundred and sixty years from Luther's reformation. We now stand in the most critical and momentous position on the chart of time. Wars, earthquakes, revolutions, and pestilence are near at hand; but there is a brighter side to all this gloom, the resurrection of the saints and the translation of the pure Christians." He then quoted from chapter 17 of Luke, dwelling particularly on the passages: "I tell you, in that night there shall be two men in one bed; the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left. Two women shall be grinding together, the one shall be taken and the other left. Two men shall be in the field, the one shall be taken, the other left. And they answered and said unto Him, where, Lord? And He said unto them, wheresoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together."

"The eagles referred to," said he, "are the Christians who are to be Taken to the Sky.

The Jews have always held that there are three heavens. The third is that wherein the heavenly throne of God is located, the second is the firmament of the stars, the sun and moon, and the first is the aërial heaven. Then it is the first or the lower heaven where the saints will be caught up in one meeting point, one rendezvous, from all parts of the earth, from the north, the south, the east, and the west. Christ will probably come in that part of the heaven above Jerusalem, where the people will meet him. Some of them being in different parts of the globe, will have to make an aërial journey of thousands of miles. The very prospect is awe-inspiring and thrilling. As the eagle is the king among birds, so will the translated Christians be kings among others."

Mr. Baxter then pictured the condition of society when the flight to heaven is to occur. He spoke of the consternation in households, where members of the family will be missed in the morning. How Mr. So-and-So will fail to come down to breakfast, how, after ineffectual efforts to awaken him by knocking at his door, others will fear that he has committed suicide, how they will force an entrance into the room, and find everything untouched, no signs of the missing man but his clothing, for no garments will be taken to heaven, as no earthly clothes will be required there. "That sort of thing," he said, "will happen in many homes. It will create

Great Confusion in Society.

Imagine a locomotive engineer being suddenly caught up to heaven; the engine rushes along at full speed without him, a collison following, and some passengers hurled headlong into eternity. Or it may be a pilot of a boat, or a driver of a vehicle, that is caught up to heaven; or a surgeon, just as he is cutting off the limb of a patient, leaving him on the table to bleed to death. The time is not distant, either; it will all come to pass in a few short years."

Mr. Baxter then discussed the question of the dead saints rising to heaven. "Will they be seen by human eyes?" asked he. "Will the tombstone be cast aside? Will there be a disarrangement of the grave or sod, or will they rise unperceived?" He quoted 1st Thessalonians iv. to the effect that the dead Christians will be raised before the living ones are caught up to meet Christ in the air. "Few people are Really Longing for It.

They are not ready to go at once, and it will require a Christian of great faith who will declare himself ready to take his flight to the skies."

He pictured a cold, wintry night, with hail, rain, and snow falling, dwelling on the fortitude and self-resignation required to take a journey to heaven in such weather. "This," said he, "is just where the faith comes in, and 144,000 wise virgins will be waiting with beaming countenances ready and willing to be caught up to heaven."

Mr. Baxter seemed to impress his congregation with the truth of his remarks. The hymn, "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," was sung with a will, and at its close all knelt down for fervent prayer.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Two Earthquake Shocks Were Felt on Sunday morning about four o'clock in several cities of Indiana and Illinois. They caused considerable alarm, but did no damage to life or property. At Terre Haute the shocks were accompanied by a heavy rumbling sound. Houses were shaken severely, causing the windows to rattle and chandeliers to sway perceptibly. Similar experiences are reported from Evansville, Ind., Springfield, Centralia, and Hillsboro, Ill. The disturbance was noticed at St. Louis, Mo., and Louisville, Ky., but the shocks were so slight there as to be barely perceptible. Persons in high buildings and those walking in the streets felt them distinctly, and recognized the cause.

The President Signed the Inter-State Commerce Bill on Friday last. It is understood that the delay in affixing his signature was not due to any opposition on his part to legislation of that character, but to doubts about the constitutionality of some of its clauses. Apparently those doubts have been set at rest. The five commissioners who are to regulate its operation were not chosen last week, but they will be nominated in time for the Senate to confirm them before it adjourns. It may be hoped that the right men will be chosen. Hundreds are pressing for a nomination, but it may be doubted whether there are more than a score of men in the United States qualified for the position. It will be a grievous thing if the capacity of the bill for the national benefit should be neutralized by the incapacity or perversity of the men who will apply it. The measure is of so elastic a character, and so much is left to the discretion of the commissioners, that their selection is one of the most responsible duties the President has had committed to his hands.

The Attempt to Prevent Senators and Representatives taking payment as lawyers from corporations interested in Congressional votes, which was made by Mr. Beck, failed in the Senate on Friday. A silly and innocuous substitute offered by Mr. Hoar was passed in its place, to save appearances. It simply prohibits any legislator appearing for a railroad against the United States, if such member shall have reasonable cause to believe that measures specially affecting the interests of such railroad are pending before Congress or about to be so pending during his term of office. Mr. Hoar must have a poor opinion of his fellow-legislators if he thinks that legislation is necessary to prevent their accepting counsel fees in such circumstances.

The Divergence of Opinion in the Democratic Party on the subject of the tariff found expression last week in a letter from Speaker Carlisle to Mr. Randall, on the bill introduced by that gentleman for dealing with the surplus. The letter, though couched in friendly terms, states explicitly that the section of the party to which the Speaker belongs will oppose the bill, but is prepared to treat for a compromise. A large number of instances are pointed out by Mr. Carlisle in which the duties would be positively increased by the bill. In the matter of internal revenue the Randall proposals are still more objectionable to the Morrison Democrats. They are, however, willing to vote for a reduction of the duties on tobacco and fruit-brandies in certain cases. It is evident, however, that the Speaker and his friends would prefer having the tariff remain in its present state than to have Mr. Randall's bill passed.

An Appalling Railroad Accident Occurred on Saturday on the Vermont Central Railroad. The express train to Montreal, which was crowded with passengers tempted by reduced rates to attend the ice carnival, was approaching the Woodstock Bridge, which crosses the White River near West Hartford, Vt., when four coaches left the track. This, it is supposed, must have been caused by a rail being broken through the intense cold. The coupling with the forward part of the train broke, and the four cars fell into the gorge, fifty feet below. The stoves ignited the cars, and the flames soon spread to the bridge, which was consumed. Over forty persons are believed to have been burned to death and about thirty were injured, some, it is feared, fatally. The scene of the burning cars, with their living inmates, whom it was impossible to save, was heartrending.

The Gigantic Strike in New York and the adjacent cities of 'longshoremen and freight handlers was maintained last week without any sign of yielding on either side. Over forty thousand—report says sixty thousand—men are now idle, and the circle is widening. The Old Dominion Company, whose action precipitated the strike, must have already lost a sum compared with which the two and a half cents they were anxious to save is contemptible. What the men have lost in wages it is grievous to think of. The folly of continuing the strike becomes more evident daily. The directors of the company are naturally unable to realize how much difference so small a sum as that in dispute makes to the life of their employés, and the men whose obstinacy is so bitterly condemned have been so long treated as mere brutes, that now they are showing the disposition of brutes. The injury to business and the suffering entailed on the poor, who are now unable to obtain coal, are so serious that arbitration ought to be insisted upon in the public interest.

Burning Cities and a Destroyed Civilization are among the possibilities of the future, according to Mr. Henry George; and in expressing the opinion, he confirms the belief long ago arrived at by students of prophecy. The Rev. M. Baxter and other commentators have explicitly declared that prophecy indicates as one of the most terrible features of the general convulsion which is now near at hand, the uprising of communism and socialism overturning the order of society and producing anarchy. Henry George from his standpoint perceives the same event. He said in his journal last Thursday, in reference to the strike: "I think it a fight in the dark, the blind push of men squeezed past endurance. I think it the first passive form of a civil war, which steel-clad forts and armor-plated ships cannot guard us against—the kindling of passions and the arraying of forces that, roused to full energy, may give cities to the flames and destroy our very civilization itself." There are in all our cities numbers of men who not only perceive that the event is coming, but wish for it. At a large meeting held in New York last week one of the speakers was loudly applauded when he expressed the hope that such a tremendous crisis would soon come upon this country that social revolution must follow, and the now mute hatred of the people would make itself heard in no unmistakable terms. The platform of the meeting was "No Henry George, no Powderly, no Knights of Labor—nothing but downright revolution, social as well as political, with steady, bloody strife." Whether men go to their newspapers or to prophecy to learn what is coming on the earth, they arrive at the same conclusion.

War Rumors Produced a Panic in Financial circles in Europe on Thursday last, which has not been equalled since Black Friday. The scenes in the Bourses of Paris, Berlin, and London are described as of the most intense excitement. Every one holding securities made a mad rush to sell, and prices fell with astonishing rapidity. On the surface there appeared little reason for the panic. War rumors have been in circulation for a long time, and there was reason to believe that Bismarck would encourage them just now, for the purpose of influencing the elections to the Reichstag. In spite, however, of this explanation, the eagerness to sell could be explained only on the ground that moneyed men believed that war was imminent. The immediate cause of the panic was a report that within eight days an imperative demand would be made by Germany upon France, which the latter nation could not concede with honor. Pacific assurances came from illustrious personages, but they were not credited.

An Appeal to General Boulanger to Resign voluntarily was made last week by a section of the French press. The plea was based upon the fact that Germany dislikes Boulanger, dreads his influence, and may make his prominence a pretext for war. That there is reason for this attitude is evident from a letter published a few days ago by a friend of Boulanger's, in which the writer said: "He believes the time has come and that France is able now to vanquish Germany. He sees himself at the head of France, winning back her glory, and nothing but the satisfaction of reversing the scene of Sedan and of taking a sword from the head of the German army will ever content him." An observation made by M. de Freycinet, the ex-Premier of France, is equally significant. That statesman said: "Whatever opinion may be entertained of General Boulanger's character, it is no longer time to discuss his influence. It is absolutely necessary to stand by him and support him."

Another Wholesale Massacre is Reported from the Soudan. By an arrangement with England an Italian garrison was sent to occupy Massowah, with the object of holding the surrounding country. On Tuesday of last week the Italian Prime Minister informed the Chamber of Deputies that a large part of the force had been annihilated, and re-enforcements must be promptly sent out. He described the disaster as the result of an attack by hostile Arabs on a combined force of Italians and Abyssinians. Later reports, however, aver that it was the Abyssinians who fell upon the Italians and massacred them. Of the five hundred Italians engaged, less than fifty wounded men were all that escaped, and Massowah itself is threatened with capture.

Rev. M. Baxter Expects to Preach Next Sunday morning and afternoon in Cooper Institute, New York City. His subject will be: "Coming great wars and earthquakes during the next thirteen years before the year 1900, great religious revivals, second advent of Christ, and resurrection and ascension of Christians without dying; England's loss of Ireland and India, and conquest of Germany by France in 1887–89, changing twenty-three kingdoms into Daniel's predicted Franco-Roman Confederacy of ten kingdoms prior to the Napoleonic Antichrist's seven years' covenant with the Jews (Daniel 7:24 and 9:27); the spread of socialism, communism, nihilism, anarchy, spiritualism, culminating in the great tribulation and Antichrist's massacre of myriads of Christians during three and a half years, and then the millennium of one thousand years." Last Sunday Mr. Baxter preached in Library Hall, Newark, N. J., where he had large audiences.

The Gospel Union (or Gospel Army, as it has been styled in some places), of which the Rev. M. Baxter is President, has now mission stations in America in the following cities: Philadelphia, Pa.; Warsaw and Peru, Ind.; St. Paul, Minn.; Omaha and Lincoln, Neb.; Orangeville and Ottawa and St. Andrew, N. B.; and Charlottetown, P. E. I., in the Dominion of Canada, besides more than seventy mission stations in Britain. Evangelistic Gospel meetings are held at these stations generally every week evening and Sundays in halls rented permanently by evangelists, and many sinners are being converted by this Gospel work. Contributions, which are urgently needed for carrying on and extending the movement, should be sent to Rev. M. Baxter, 63 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $25.50. They are as follows: Philadelphia, Pa., $1; Stayner, Ontario, Canada, $1; Salem, Mass., $1; Providence, R. I., $1; Seaward, Me., $2; St. Catherine, Ontario, Canada, $1.50; Golden Lake, Ontario, Canada, $3; Bridgton, Me., $1; East Saugatuck, Mich., 50 cents; Detroit, Mich., 50 cents; Philadelphia, Pa., 50 cents; Dundas, Ontario, Canada, $5; Lakeville, Cal., $6; Edom, Va., 50 cents; Black Creek, Ontario, Canada, 50 cents; Homer, Ill., 50 cents. Many applications endorsed by friends of this journal in whom we have confidence have been received during the past week or two from colored ministers, who say how much they need such a journal as this, to take the place of the library they are unable to obtain. These applications, though we are unable to comply with them now, are preserved, and will not be overlooked if funds to cover the expense should be sent to us.

Dr. Talmage Conversed with Two Murderers in the condemned cells of the Tombs last week. An evening contemporary says: "Dr. T. De Witt Talmage visited the Tombs to-day. He talked with Smith and Driscoll, both under sentence of death. He was listened to attentively, and after he was through speaking, he took his handkerchief from his coat pocket and wiped his eyes. Some of those who had heard him did likewise." An effort is being made to induce Dr. Talmage to remove to Chicago, where the pulpit recently occupied by Dr. Scudder is offered to him. Those who know Dr. Talmage best believe that there is little probability of his quitting the Presbyterian Church, or of his leaving Brooklyn. The services now being held by Dr. Munhall and Professor Towner in the Brooklyn Tabernacle are being much blessed, especially among the young people.

A Deeply Interesting Religious Centenary was celebrated in London on Saturday last. It was exactly one hundred years ago on that day that the Rev. Samuel Provoost, Rector of Trinity Church, New York, and the Rev. William White, Rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia, were consecrated by the Archbishop of Canterbury Bishops of the American Church. It was that same Provoost who as bishop received George Washington after his inauguration as President in New York, and it was he who conducted then the solemn services of prayer and thanksgiving. The centennial service last week was held in the same chapel of Lambeth Palace in which Bishops Provoost and White were consecrated a century ago. Bishop Henry C. Potter, of New York, while participating in the celebration, stood where Provoost had once stood. This was Dr. Potter's first public appearance as a bishop since his full accession to that rank. Bishop Lyman, of North Carolina, also taking part in the service, stood where Bishop White had knelt when he was consecrated. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops of London, Durham, St. Albans, and Rochester also took part in the celebration. The name of the President of the United States was inserted in the usual prayer for the Queen by the archbishop.

The Captain and Crew of a Wrecked Ship owe their lives to the heroism of one of the sailors. On January 27th the schooner Johnson, laden with iron from New York for Stonington, was struck by a storm and driven on the rocks near Plum Island. She was leaking badly, and the men were unable to free her. The sea broke over her continually, deluging the sailors with water, which froze upon them. At last only one man was able to move, and all gave themselves up for lost. Then James Butler, one of the crew, bravely determined to risk his own life in the effort to secure rescue for his companions. Plunging into the sea, he swam for Plum Island, reaching shore with considerable difficulty. Then managing to creep to the lighthouse, he secured assistance, and all the men were taken off the wreck and taken to New London, where they were carefully treated in hospital. It would have been incredible that any of the men in that perilous position should have failed to avail themselves of the help which their companion had secured at the risk of his life; yet that is precisely what is being done by sinners who neglect the salvation which Christ purchased by His blood (Heb. 2 : 3).

A Clergyman in Deshabille was Extricated from his embarrassment at the last moment recently in Connecticut. The Times of Hartford, Conn., says that on Sunday, January 30th, a prominent clergyman, whose fits of abstraction have frequently brought him into trouble, had just entered his pulpit when, to his utter astonishment, he discovered that he was minus the regulation collar and tie. He had forgotten to put them on before leaving home. It would never do to stand up before his congregation and expose his bare neck, neither would it be just the thing to deliver his discourse with coat collar turned up to his ears. Just then a messenger stepped up to the desk with a Sunday notice to be read. A happy thought struck the parson. His mishap was explained, the messenger kindly loaned his neck gear, and the services proceeded. The clergyman's vexation was natural, but he would have had better reason for distress if his attire had been immaculate and his sermon slovenly. That has happened with some preachers, and they cannot be rescued by a chance messenger. Such men show a lamentable disregard of the apostolic injunction (1 Tim. 4 : 15, 16).

A Chicago Bank Clerk is Having a Holiday under very delightful circumstances. He has been at his desk regularly for several years without relief, his position in the bank being one of great responsibility. Two weeks ago his cousin, who has inherited an enormous fortune, called in to see him, and found him showing unmistakable signs of overwork—his head between his hands, and looking very pale. "Come and take a trip with me to Europe; I will pay your expenses," said the millionaire. The poor fagged clerk admitted that he would enjoy it, and that he needed rest and recuperation, but he knew that he could not get leave of absence, and he could not afford to resign. He therefore reluctantly declined the tempting offer, and being pressed, stated his reasons. His millionaire cousin said nothing, and left the bank. A few hours later he returned, and placed in the hands of the clerk a deed of gift, which he had just recorded, endowing him with a block of real estate on Adams Street, worth $120,000. The clerk's resignation was promptly handed in, and on January 31st the two cousins started for Europe. There was this difference between the bank clerk and those devoted Christians who resign positions of emolument to devote themselves to the Lord's service, that the former was put in possession of a fortune, while the latter rely on the Lord's promise that He will supply all their need. Whatever the world may think, his future is not so safe as theirs (Mark 10 : 29, 30).

A Marriage by Proxy is Reported in Chicago journals as having taken place on January 29th. Some time ago Miss Nina Van Zandt expressed her intention of being married to August Spies, who is lying in prison under sentence of death, for his connection with the Anarchist murders. The sheriff forbade the match, and gave orders that the lady should not be admitted to the prison. It is now stated that the marriage has been performed by proxy. A party of his friends called upon the condemned man on January 28th, and witnessed his signature to a document, giving authority to his brother, Henry Spies to act for him. Outside the prison Miss Van Zandt joined the party, and they repaired to the house of Justice Engelhardt, under whose advice they were acting, and who performed the ceremony. Henry Spies answered to the name of August Spies, and under this name was married to Miss Van Zandt. As marriages made by letter or telephone are valid, possibly a marriage by proxy may be so, but it would be decidedly unsatisfactory to have such arrangements come into vogue. The solemn promises of the marriage service should be made by the persons who are to fulfil them, and the fulfilment cannot be done on either side by proxy. This fact appears to be forgotten by many who, in making a profession of faith, avow their belief that they have become members of Christ's bride. Neither gifts of money, nor observance of ordinances, nor priestly mediation can relieve them of actual personal service (Ps. 49 : 6, 7).

A Joyful Farewell to a Citizen of Wellsburg, N. Y., was accorded by the community a few days ago. A man who held an important office in the village appears to have succeeded to a truly marvellous degree in rendering himself unpopular. By a series of acts, some of which seem to be wanton outrages on public feeling, he excited the indignation of his neighbors. It became known that at last he was contemplating removal to another place, and general satisfaction was manifested at the news. A meeting was called, which unanimously agreed on a resolution respecting it. The preamble recited the facts and proceeded: "And whereas the said —— proposes to remove from our village, resolved, that we are heartily glad of it, and hereby tender a vote of thanks and sympathy to the community that accepts him as a resident." On the day of his departure the village bells were rung, and there was a general holiday. It may be supposed that if the citizens could have expelled the man they would not have waited for his voluntary departure. But they had no such power, so they had to wait. It is not so with the man who is troubled by the presence of Satan in his heart. He can be expelled by any man who sincerely wishes to be rid of him and calls upon Christ for aid (Luke 10 : 17, 18).

BRIEF NOTES.

BEN HOGAN, the converted pugilist, is laboring at Woodland, Yolo County, Cal. The Yolo Democrat describes the meetings as extremely interesting. Much good appears to attend the work. Professor Chase, of San Francisco, is assisting Hogan.

Rev. George C. Needham conducted services last week in Cleveland, O. The meetings were held in Music Hall Chapel, which was densely crowded. An afternoon Bible reading was held on Sunday in the Christian Association Building. The attendance was large, every seat in the room being occupied.

A weekly meeting of Christian workers for prayer and conference has been commenced in New York by the Committee of the Cooper Union Evangelistic Services. The meetings are held every Thursday at four P.M. in the parlor of the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church, corner of Twenty-second Street. All Christian workers are invited.

The annual meeting of the Young Men's Christian Associations of New York State is to be held at Utica, February 17th–20th. Professor J. C. Little, D.D., Syracuse University; E. B. Monroe, New York, and Russell Sturgis, Jr., Boston, are some of the speakers. Mr. Ira D. Sankey is to lead the singing. Further information can be secured from Rev. George A. Hall, State Secretary, Y. M. C. A. Building, New York City.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey is anxious to increase the library established by him at his native place, New Castle, Pa., in the handsome Y. M. C. A. building which he has erected and presented to the town. He will be very glad if his friends in this country are as kind and generous in this matter as some of his friends in England. Without a word of solicitation, upon simply hearing of the need of books, such friends as Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Lady Cairns, wife of the late Lord Chancellor, Lord Kinnaird, Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, and the London Tract Society sent valuable donations of books. Should any friends in the Eastern States desire to help in this good work they may send the books to 76 East Ninth Street, New York, where they will be properly marked with the donor's name, and forwarded to New Castle, Pa.

A Report of the Addresses Delivered at the Recent Prophetic Conference, at Chicago, with portraits of some of the speakers, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York. It contains 216 pages. Fifty cents in paper covers; Seventy-five cents bound in cloth.

Canvassers Wanted to Sell, from House to House, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Any man, woman, or youth may easily add to their income every week by selling the paper in their spare hours in their own neighborhood. THE UNKEPT VINEYARD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"They made me the keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept."—SONG OF SOLOMON I: 6.

Salubrious Sorrow—A Personal Complaint—I. Christians Forgetting their Heavenly Calling—Not Idlers—Unconsecrated Labor—The Work Neglected—The Rivals of the Bible—The Exchange Trenching on the Closet—The Vineyard of a Wicked City—A Discontented Preacher—Opportunities Entail Responsibility—The Remedy—A Happy Change—II. Christians Taking Other Work—The Plots Neglected—The Heart—The Family—A Preacher's Vicious Sons—When Men Should not be Made Keepers—The Neighbors.

THE text is spoken in the first person singular; "They made me." Therefore let the preaching to-night be personal to you, dear friends: personal to the preacher first, and then to each one of this mixed multitude. May we at this hour think less of others than of ourselves! May the sermon be of practical value to our own hearts! I do not suppose that it will be a pleasing sermon: on the other hand it may be a saddening one. I may bring unhappy memories before you; but let us not be afraid of that holy to the soul. The text is the language of complaint. We are all pretty ready at complaining, especially of other people. Not much good comes of picking holes in other men's characters; and yet many spend hours in that unprofitable occupation. It will be well for us, at this time, to let our complaint, like that of the text, deal with ourselves. If there is something wrong at home, let the father blame himself; if there is something ill with the children, let the mother look to her own personal conduct as their instructor. Do not let us lend out our ears, but let us keep them at home for our own use.

Let us make the text practical. Do not let us be satisfied to have uttered the language of complaint; but let us get rid of the evils which we deplore. If we have been wrong, let us labor to be right. If we have neglected our own vineyard, let us confess it with due humiliation; but let us not continue to neglect it. Let us ask of God that holy results may flow out of our self-lamentations, so that before many days we may begin to keep our own vineyards carefully by the grace of God; and then we shall better carry out the office of keeper of the vineyards of others, if we are called to such an employment.

I. First, then, let me begin with his high and heavenly calling. In the day when you and I were born again, my brethren, we were born for God. In the day when we saw that Christ died for us, we were bound henceforth to be dead to the world. In the day when we were quickened by the Holy Ghost into newness of life, that life was bound to be a consecrated one. For a thousand reasons it is true that, "Ye are not your own: ye are bought with a price." The ideal Christian is one who has been made alive with a life which he lives for God. This you will not deny. Christian friends, you admit that you have a high, holy, and heavenly calling!

Now let us look back. We have not spent our life idly: we have been forced to be keepers of the vineyards. I hope I am not addressing anybody here who has tried to live without employment and labor of some kind. No, we have worked, and we have worked hard. Most men speak of their wages as "hard-earned," and I believe that in many cases they speak the bare truth. Many hours in the day have to be spent upon our occupations. We wake up in the morning, and think of what we have to do. We go to bed wearied at night by what we have done. This is as it should be, for God did not make us that we might sport and play, like leviathan in the deep. Even in Paradise man was bidden to dress the garden. There is something to be done by each man, and specially by each Christian man.

Come back to what I began with. In the day when we were born again, as many of us as are new creatures in Christ Jesus, to God, and not to ourselves. Have we carried out that life? We have worked, we have even worked hard; but the question comes to us—What have we worked for? Who has been our master? With what object have we toiled? Of course, if I have been true to my profession as a Christian, I have lived and worked for God, for Christ, for the kingdom of heaven. But has it been so? And is it so now? Many are working very hard for wealth, which means, of course, for self, that they may be enriched. Some are working simply for a competence, which means, if it goes no further, still for self. Others work for their families, a motive good enough in its way, but still only an enlargement, after all, of self. To the Christian there must always be a far higher, deeper, purer, truer motive than self in its widest sense; or else the day must come when he will look back upon his life, and say, "They made me the keeper of the vineyards, but mine own vineyard"—that is, the service of Christ, the glory of Him that bought me with His blood—"have I not kept."

We Began To Live

It seems to me to be

to have to look back on twenty years, and say, "What have I done in all those twenty years for Christ? I have had talents: how many of those talents have been used for Him who gave them to me? I have had wealth, or I have had influence. How much of that money have I spent distinctly for my Lord? How much of that influence have I used for the promotion of His kingdom?" You have been busy with this notion, and that motive, and the other endeavor; but have you so acted that you will then judge yourself to have well lived when your Lord and Master shall come to call you to account? Ask yourself, "Am I an earnest laborer together with God, or am I, after all, only a laborious trifler, an industrious doer of nothing, working hard to accomplish no purpose of the sort for which I ought to work, since I ought to live unto my Lord alone?" I invite all my fellow-servants to take a retrospect, and just to see whether they have kept their own vineyards. I suppose that they have worked hard. I only put the question—Have they kept their own vineyards? Have they served the Lord in all things?

I am half afraid to go a step further. To a very large degree we have not been true to our own professions; our highest we have not kept our own vineyards. In looking back, how little time has been spent by us in communion with God! We say that it is "heaven below" to commune with Christ; but do we do it? We profess that there is no place like the mercy-seat. How much are we at that mercy-seat. We often say that the Word of God is precious—that every page of it glows with a heavenly light. Do we study it? Friends, how much time do you spend upon it? I venture to say that the bulk of Christians spend more time in reading the newspaper than they do in reading the Word of God. I trust that I am too severe in this statement, but I am afraid, greatly afraid, that I am not. The last new book, perhaps the last sentimental story, will win attentive reading, when the divine, mysterious, unutterable depths of heavenly knowledge are disregarded by us. Alas, my brethren, too many eat the unripe fruit of the vineyards of Satan, and the fruits of the Lord's vines they utterly despise!

Think of our neglect of our God, and see whether it is not true that we have treated Him very ill. We have been in the shop, we have been on the exchange, we have been at the markets, we have been in the fields, we have been in the public libraries, we have been in the lecture-room, we have been in the forum of debate; but our own closets and studies, our walk with God, and our fellowship with Jesus, we have far too much neglected,

Moreover, the vineyard of holy service for God we have too much left to go to ruin. I would ask you—How about the work your God has called you to do? Men are dying; are you saving them? This great city is like a seething caldron, boiling and bubbling up with infamous iniquity; are we doing anything by way of antidote to the hell-broth concocted in That Caldron?

Are we indeed a power working toward righteousness? How much good have we done? What have I done to pluck brands from the burning? What have I done to find the lost sheep for whom my Saviour laid down His life? Come, put the questions, and answer them honestly! Nay, do not back out, and say, "I have no ability." I fear you have more ability than you will give an account of with joy at the last great day.

I remember a young man who complained that the little church over which he presided was so small. He said, "I cannot do much good. I have not above two hundred hearers." An older man replied, "Two hundred hearers are a great many to have to give an account of at the last great day." As I came in at yonder door this evening, and looked into these thousands of faces, I could not help trembling. How shall I answer for this solemn charge, for this enormous flock, in that last great day?

You Have All a Flock of some kind, larger or smaller. You have all, as Christian people, somebody for whom you will have to answer. Have you done your Master's work in reference to those intrusted to you? O men and women, have you sought to save others from going down into the pit? You have the divine remedy; have you handed it out to these sick and dying ones? You have the heavenly word which can deliver them from destruction; have you spoken it in their ears, praying all the while that God might bless it to their souls. Might not many a man among you say to himself, "I have been a tailor," or "I have been a shop-keeper," or "I have been a mechanic," or "I have been a merchant," or "I have been a physician, and I have attended to these callings; but mine own vineyard, which was my Master's which I was bound to look to first of all, I have not kept?"

Well, now, what is

for this? We need not talk of our fault any more; let us make each one his own personal confession, and then seek amendment. I believe the remedy is a very sweet one. It is not often that medicine is pleasant, but at this time I prescribe for you a charming potion. It is that you follow up the next verse to my text. Read it—"Mine own vineyard have I not kept. Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest, where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon; for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?" Get to your Lord, and in Him you will find recovery from your neglects. Ask Him where He feeds His flock, and go with Him. They have warm hearts who commune with Christ. They are prompt in duty who enjoy His fellowship.

Hasten to your Lord, and you will soon begin to keep your vineyard; for in the Song you will see a happy change effected. The spouse began to keep her vineyard directly, and to do it in the best fashion. Within a very short time you find her saying, "Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines." See, she is hunting out her sins and her follies. Further on you find her with her lord in the vineyard, crying, "Awake, O north wind; and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out!" She is evidently keeping her garden, and asking for heavenly influences to make the spices and flowers yield their perfume. She went down to see whether the vines flourished, and the pomegranates budded. Anon, with her beloved, she rises early to go to the vineyard, and watch the growth of the plants. Further on you find her talking about all manner of fruits that she has laid up for her beloved

Thus you see that to walk with Christ is the way to keep your vineyard, and serve your Lord.

II. Now, I turn to the congregation in general, and speak with the man who has

and neglected his own. He can use the words of the text—"They made me the keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept." We know many persons who are always doing a great deal, and yet do nothing; fussy people, people to the front in every movement, persons who could set the whole world right, but are not right themselves. Very eminent men are these! I suggest to our highly-gifted friends that it is possible to be looking after a great many things, and yet to be neglecting your own vineyard. There is a vineyard that a great many neglect, and that is their own heart. It is well to have talent; it is well to have influence; but it is better to be right within yourself. It is well for a man to see to his cattle, and look well to his flocks and to his herds; but let him not forget to cultivate that little patch of ground that lies in the centre of his being. Right principles are spiritual gold, and he that hath them, and is ruled by them, is the man who truly lives. He hath not life, whatever else he hath, who hath not his heart cultivated, and made right and pure.

Have you ever thought about your heart yet? Oh, I do not mean whether you have palpitations! I am no doctor. I am speaking now about the heart in its moral and spiritual aspect. What is your character, and do you seek to cultivate it? Do you ever use the hoe upon those weeds which are so plentiful in us all? Do you water those tiny plants of goodness which have begun to grow? Do you watch them to keep away the little foxes which would destroy them? Are you hopeful that yet there may be a harvest in your character which God may look upon with approval? I pray that we may all look to our hearts.

Now, pass over that point, and think of another vineyard. Are not some people

Neglecting Their Families?

Next to our hearts, our households are the vineyards which we are most bound to cultivate. I shall never forget a man whom I knew in my youth, who used to accompany me at times in my walks to the villages to preach. He was always willing to go with me any evening; but I did not need to ask him, for he asked himself, until I purposely put him off from it. He liked also to preach himself much better than others liked to hear him; but he was a man who was sure to be somewhere to the front if he could. Even if you snuffed him out, he had a way of lighting himself up again. He was good-natured and irrepressible. He was, I believe, sincerely earnest in doing good. But two boys of his were well known to me, and they would swear horribly. They were ready for every vice, and were

Under No Restraint.

One of them drank himself into a dying state with brandy, though he was a mere boy. I do not believe his father had ever spoken to him about the habit of intoxication, though he certainly was sober and virtuous himself. I had no fault to find with him except this grave fault—that he was seldom at home, was not master of the house, and could not control his children. Neither husband nor wife occupied any place of influence in the household; they were simply the slaves of their children; their children made themselves vile, and they restrained them not! This brother would pray for his children at the prayer-meeting, but I do not think he ever practised family prayer.

It is shocking to find men and women speaking fluently about religion, and yet their houses are a disgrace to Christianity. I suppose that none of you are as bad as that; but, if it be so, please spell this text over: "They made me the keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept." The most careful and prayerful father cannot be held accountable for having wicked sons, if he has done his best to instruct them. The most anxious and tearful mother cannot be blamed if her daughter dishonors the family, provided her mother has done her best to train her up in the right way. But if the parents cannot say that they have done their best, and their children go astray, then they are blameworthy.

If any of my hearers exercise no parental discipline, nor seek to bring their children to Christ, I do implore them to give up every kind of public work till they have first done their work at home. Has anybody made you a minister, and you are not trying to save your own children? I tell you, sir, I do not believe that God made you a minister; for if He had, He would have begun with making you a minister to your own family. "They made me the keeper of the vineyards." "They" ought to have known better, and you ought to have known better than to accept the call. How can you be a steward in the great household of the Lord when you cannot even rule your own house? A Sunday-school teacher, teaching other people's children, and never praying with her own! Is not this

A Sad Business?

A teacher of a large class of youths who never has taken a class of his own sons and daughters! Why, what will he do when he lives to see his children plunged into vice and sin, and remembers that he has utterly neglected them? This is plain dealing; but I never wear gloves when I preach. I know not where this knife may cut; but if it wounds, I pray you do not blunt its edge. Do you say that this is "very personal?" It is meant to be personal; and if anybody is offended by it, let him be offended with himself, and mend his ways. No longer let it be true of any of us, "They made me the keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept."

Besides that, every man who knows the Lord should feel that his vineyard lies also round about his own house. If God has saved your children, then, dear friend, try to do something for your neighbors, for your work-people, for those with whom you associate in daily labor. God has appointed you to take care of those nearest home. They say the cobbler's wife goes barefooted. Do not let it be true. Begin at home, and go on with those nearest home. Manifest Christian love to your neighbors. It is a great pity that yonder Christian man, living in a very dark part of London, comes to the Tabernacle, and does good in our societies but never speaks a word for Jesus in the court where he lives. Poor stuff, poor stuff, is that salt which is only salt when it is

In the Salt-box!

Throw that kind of salt away. We want a kind of salt that begins to bite into any bit of meat it touches. Put it where you like, if it is good salt, it begins to operate upon that which is nearest to it. Oh, my beloved fellow Christians, do not let it be said that you reside in a place to which you do no good whatever! I am sure if there were individual, personal work on the part of Christians in the localities where they reside, God the Holy Ghost would bless the unanimous action of His earnest, quickened Church, and London would soon know that God has a people in the midst of it.

You and I must cry mightily to the Holy Spirit to help us to live really and truly the lives which our professions demand of us. A day will come when all church-goings and chapel-goings and preachings and singings and sacraments, will seem fluff and useless stuff, if there has not been the substance of real living for Christ in all our religiousness. Oh, that we would rouse ourselves to something like a divine earnestness! Oh, that we felt the grandeur of our heavenly surroundings! We are no common men! We are loved with no common love! Jesus died for us! He died for us! He died for us! And is this poor life of ours, so often dull and worldly, our sole return? Behold that piece of land! He that bought it paid His life for it, watered it with bloody sweat, and sowed in it a divine seed. And what is the harvest? We naturally expect great things. Is the poor starveling life of many a professor a fit harvest for Christ's sowing his heart's blood? Is this all the result? O Lord, was there ever so small an effect from so great a cause? You might almost need a microscope to discover the result of the work of grace in some people's lives. Ought it to be so? Shall it be so? In the name of Him that liveth and was dead, dare you let it be so? Help us, O God, to begin to live, and keep the vineyard which Thou Thyself has given to us to keep, that we may render in our account at last with joy, and not with grief! Amen.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN AND THE DESERTER.*

DANIEL J. MORRELL took the mother of a runaway soldier to see President Lincoln, in Washington, to plead for the life of her darling boy, who had been court-martialed, and was to be shot in a few days. Lincoln first upbraided my friend for subjecting him to such an ordeal, but the poor woman was already in the room, sobbing as if her heart would break, and there was no help for it. Lincoln conducted her to a seat, asked a great many questions, learned that the boy had returned to work at Johnstown, and provided for his mother and sister from his earnings, giving as an excuse for leaving the army, that it was lying idle on the banks of the Potomac, and he knew it could not move until spring.

The President mused a few moments, apparently undecided what action to take. Even the woman held her breath for the time, and awaited in silence the word which was to rejoice her or doom her to misery forever.

"Well, I don't believe it would do him any good to shoot him, do you, madam?" asked Father Abraham of the mother, in a tone of inquiry so natural that one would have thought he was actually in doubt upon the subject himself, and wanted the opinion of the person who knew the boy best.

The mother was speechless. During the inquiry the President had been rolling a small strip of paper into a ball. He handed this to Mr. Morrell, saying, "Read that when you get out, Daniel, but mind you don't tell Stanton."

Mr. Morrell beckoned the woman to the door, placed her in the carriage, read the slip, and ordered the coachman to drive at once to the office of the Provost Marshal. Here is what he found in that tiny strip: "P.M. Washington—Send Private Johnston, Company B, Ninth Pennsylvania Infantry, to his regiment. A. L."

That is the kind of thing that took our trusting hearts and gave this wood-chopper of Illinois such power as all the hereditary monarchs of the world can never hope to acquire.

Jennie of Lucknow.

It was strange that I should stumble upon a monument in the cathedral to Major Hodson, whose grave I had seen in India. He lies with Havelock and Lawrence in the pretty little English cemetery at Lucknow, poor fellow, and here his friends and neighbors away in quiet Lichfield have commemorated his valor. How well do I remember my visit to that historic burial-place in far-off India, and the impression made upon me as I stood beside the tombs of the heroes who fell in the days of the great mutiny!

For six long months Sir Henry Lawrence and his devoted band were shut up in Lucknow, and surrounded by fifty thousand armed rebels. The grounds, which I should say are about thirty acres in extent, were fortunately encompassed by an earthen rampart six feet in height. You need not be told of the heroic resistance of the two regiments of British soldiers and one of natives, nor of the famous rescue. Hour after hour, day after day, week after week, and month after month, the three hundred women and children, shut in a cellar underground, watched and prayed for the sound of Havelock's bugles, but it came not.

A Convoy of Slaves Crossing the Desert.

Death was the least of the fears of those poor women night after night as the days rolled slowly away. One night there was graver silence than usual in the room ; all were despondent and lay resigned to their seemingly impending fate. No rescue came, nor any tidings of relief. In the darkness one piercing scream was heard from the narrow window. A Highland nurse had clambered up to gaze through the bars and strain her ears once more. The cooling breeze of night blew in her face, and wafted such music as she could not stay to hear. One spring to the ground, a clapping of hands above her head, and such a shriek as appalled her sisters who clustered around ; but all she could say between the sobs—"The slogan ! the slogan !"

"Few knew what the slogan was. "Didna ye hear? Didna ye hear?" cried the almost demented girl, and then, listening one moment that she might not be deceived, she muttered, "It's the Macgregors Gathering, the grandest o' them a', and fell senseless to the ground. Truly, my lassie, the 'grandest o' them a',' for never came such strains before to mortal ears. And so Jessie of Lucknow takes her place in history as one of the finest themes for painter, dramatist, poet, or historian, henceforth and forever."

A CONVOY OF SLAVES.

(See Illustration.)

The picture on this page represents a convoy of slaves in the Soudan, and gives an idea of the misery entailed on these wretched creatures by the greed and cruelty of the traders. A traveller thus describes the journey as he saw it :

The lives of these slaves may be divided into three distinct periods, dating from the time of bondage. At Shaka, they are well treated, for, like the cattle they resembled, the better their condition the better the price they fetched The second period was entered upon when they were disposed of to the slave-dealers, and this was the time of hardship, suffering, and cruelty. Packed and loaded with cha ns, they started on the caravan journey across the Desert—a journey marked at every stage by hunger, thirst, disease, and death. The stillness of the Desert was only broken by piteous appeals for water and wailings of despair. With burning fevers, parched throats, and sunken eyes, they dropped by the way ; and the only act of mercy shown them by their owners was in the crack and flash of the pistol—the murder which put an end to their earthly wretchedness. Such was the journey across the Desert ; those who survived it entered upon the third and final period of their career, and this was one of comparative ease. They were retailed to private individuals and employed in domestic servitude, which in Egypt does not mean either hardship or misery.

WINNIE'S GIFT.

It was a dreary life that little Lottie Grenville led. It was true that her room was tastefully furnished, that the prettiest pictures decorated the walls, that her sofa was the most comfortable that money could buy, and that a servant and governess, both the most gentle and amiable that could be found, were devoted to her exclusively. Enough to have made her happy and contented, some will say, but she was not. The fact was that a little over ten years back when Lottie was a baby, a careless nurse had dropped her, and the sharp edge of a fire-guard had injured her spine, so that Lottie, though eleven years old, had never walked. She had grown and had learned to read and write and draw, and was very smart in those and other matters, but she would have been very glad to barter all her skill, and the beautiful room and all her comforts, if she could have run about and played like other children.

"You ought to be very thankful, Lottie," said a pious friend of her mother's, who always made it a matter of duty to visit the invalid whenever she came to the house ; "you ought to be very thankful to God for all His mercies. What a lovely room you have, and so many nice things around. I think I could be very happy up here."

"I think you would get tired if you were always here, Miss Whitney," said Lottie, in her usual quiet, sententious manner.

"Oh, no, I think not, because I should feel that it was God's will for me to be here, and if a tired feeling came I should just pray to Him and He would take it away. It is wrong to fret, you know, Lottie."

"Lottie must not be scolded, Miss Whitney," said a childish voice behind the lady. The voice belonged to Winnie, Lottie's younger sister and stanch friend, who had heard the last words and the sigh which was Lottie's only answer to them. She had more courage than poor afflicted Lottie, and resented the fault-finding implied and expressed in Miss Whitney's words. "A hard, unfeeling old thing," was Winnie's opinion of that good lady, and just then she was angry enough to have assailed her with the uncomplimentary dictum. "Lottie is a very good girl," was what she did say ; "she can't help feeling dull, and you'd feel dull, too, Miss Whitney, if you could not go to play if you wanted to."

"You are only a child, Winnie," said Miss Whitney. "You do not understand. I have been telling Lottie it is God's will for her to lie here, and she must bear it cheerfully."

"Don't believe it," was Winnie's curt response. "It was that horrid nurse who did it. I think God is sorry for her, and don't mind if she does fret now and then. If Jesus was here now, He'd cure her, perhaps. He'd come and see her anyhow, and He would not scold her either."

"Don't speak so, Winnie," Lottie put in, "Miss Whitney is very kind to come. She had been here ever so long before you came. It is very good of her."

"It is not good to scold you, I know, and you don't deserve it." And Winnie, having fared as those generally do who meddle in strife that belongeth not to them, whisked out of the room. At the foot of the stairs she was suddenly caught up and kissed by a stalwart gentleman in clerical garb, who had a very warm affection for the impulsive child.

"Oh, Mr. Venn!" said Winnie, "do go up and drive Miss Whitney away. She is scolding Lottie for saying perhaps God had forgotten her. I don't wonder Lottie thinks so sometimes; do you?"

"Come into this room, Winnie, and tell me all about it."

Winnie complied gladly, for troubles seemed to vanish in telling them to Mr. Venn. This one surely did. Mr. Venn had a suggestion to make. Lottie had toys and pictures and books in endless variety, but he knew of something that she had not. There was a store that he passed every day in which there were kept on sale all sorts of birds, squirrels, white mice, and live creatures of many kinds. Mr. Venn had seen there that morning a little Persian kitten. He would have bought it at once for Lottie, but that would have spoiled Winnie's pleasure.

"Oh, that's just lovely!" she said, clapping her hands in ecstasy. "I'll buy it, I have a whole dollar saved. Won't Lottie be glad!"

Mr. Venn would take her with him to buy it, and Winnie was soon ready and trotting eagerly by his side. The kitten was put in a little basket, and the two friends returned with the treasure. Winnie relapsed into unusual silence for a block or two. At last she said:

"Mr. Venn, may I ask you something?"

"Certainly, my dear, what is it?"

"Lottie will be delighted with the kitten; it's a real beauty, but, if it isn't wicked I have thought of something that will make it still better. She really does think what she said that Jesus doesn't care for her like He does for me and other children that don't have to lie up. Now, couldn't she think that Jesus sent her the kitten. She knows I love her, but she's kind of doubtful about Him. You see I could give my money to Jesus that you paid the man instead of giving it to you, and then it would be Jesus' money that bought the kitten."

"You are a little Jesuit," said Mr. Venn, laughing. But he could not but see that there was a grand motive underlying Winnie's scheme. Surely the Saviour must have put it into the child's heart.

Arrived at home, pen and paper were in requisition, and a little label was prepared by the clergyman and his little friend. On it was written "Jesus loves you." It was attached by a blue ribbon to the kitten's neck, and that night after Lottie was asleep the kitten after being fed to a state of repletion was put back in the basket, and taken into her room. Winnie was on hand in the morning, and when Lottie was laid as usual on her sofa, and inquired what that basket was, it was Winnie who handed it to her, and then hurried out of sight to hide her tell-tale face. She stayed long enough, though, to see that both her desires were accomplished.

Winnie Acts as Proxy.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

Unwelcome Recognition.

THE mystery of Alfred Atheling being seen in the vicinity of Aspen Garth after he was supposed to have fled the country was still unexplained. The game-keeper pondered over it as he walked homeward after bidding good-by to Simon Holmes. Whatever Alfred's motive might be, so long as it was not poaching, which, in the game-keeper's eyes, was a crime of the deepest dye, Alfred's purpose was no business of his, and he resolved to keep to his agreement with the cobbler, and say nothing about having seen the young man.

Crouch's explanation was really the true one. The desire to look once more on the familiar scene, to catch a glimpse, perhaps, through an uncurtained window, of his mother's face grew unsupportable to Alfred Atheling. He might be caught, arrested, and sent to the penitentiary for a term of years; he did not close his eyes to the risk, but he felt that he must go. The desire was remarkable, for he had never felt so drawn before. The fact was that Alfred had received a sharp lesson lately. He was like the prodigal son conscious of his degradation, and like him, too, wanted to go home.

He had been able in his retirement beneath the roof of Ned Saltmer to earn sufficient money to provide him with that welcome shelter and with more than frugal fare. He was possessed of very considerable literary gifts. For many years he had used his pen to composition, not for payment, but for pleasure Quite an accumulation of such articles had lodgment in his memory, so far, at least, that they could be readily reproduced by care and pains. He set himself to work at this. He wrote short stories, brief sketches, light essays, and these had sterling merit, and were written in a lively style. For these he was able to find a market, and they were published under a fictitious name without disclosing his identity.

Had it not been for the upbraidings of his conscience, upbraidings that refused to be silenced, and for the fear of detection and its probable consequences, that embittered his daily life, he might have faced the future even on the new lines whereon his sin and folly had compelled him to move. But wrong-doing has always a terrible power to trammel and disturb the wrong-doer, to darken his horizon, and to take all the enjoyment out of life, even at a long distance from the time and place of his transgressions.

One evening, as he was taking a brisk constitutional after a long day's labor at his desk and papers, he met with an incident that forcibly and cruelly reminded him of the constant perils of his position. He was rounding one of the shady corners of Victoria Park, when he was suddenly accosted by a well-remembered, and, therefore, unwelcome voice.

"Hallo, Atheling, old fellow! Why, who would have thought of seeing you so far east? I should have imagined that I was the only unlucky West-ender condemned to wander in these uncongenial regions. I am here, however, for my sins. How are you, old friend?"

The speaker was an acquaintance with whom he had often played the fool in the days when that employment took up the major portion of his time; a boon companion of his own and Harold Spofforth's, with whom they had consorted in such engagements as had helped to bring our young fugitive to his present pass. His name was Cecil Osborn.

"Oh, I'm all right!" said Alfred, with an assumption of ease and gaiety which he certainly did not feel. "What in the world brings you into this quarter of the modern Babylon?"

"Fact is, Atheling, I'm in a fix. Overrun the constable, you know, been going the pace too vast; vacuum here, yon't you see?" and the speaker slapped his pocket for further explanation. "My old nurse, bless her dear heart, furnishes me with a temporary Alsatia. By the by, now I come to think of it, you were under a cloud, weren't you? What was it? Oh, I remember smashing a peeler or something of that sort; saw it in the papers! Confounded bore those papers are; 'Absconded! A reward offered!' By George! You should not tempt a poor beggar, hard up as I am, 'pon my word, you shouldn't."

And verily, yea verily, this boon companion and comrade, who could grip hands so easily and warmly, and drink his friend's health so heartily, this jolly good fellow, positively viewed our young outlaw with covetous eyes, and Alfred Atheling felt sure that just then Mr. Cecil Osborn valued his friend and his friend's friendship at a price!

At that moment, a policeman, together with another individual in plain clothes, were seen pacing the gravel walk, and approaching them with a slow and, as they thought, a cautious step. Ordinarily this would have meant nothing, and in reality it did mean nothing to either of them; but to our brace of simpletons, each with his own secret to hide, it meant much. "The wicked fleeth when no man pursueth," and both alike were anxious to go their way.

"Well, ta-ta," said Cecil Osborn. "I must be going. Where are you hanging out?"

"Oh, I shall drop on you again, sometime, I dare say," was the reply, and turning on his heel, Alfred sought the shelter of Ned Saltmer's cottage by a very devious route so as to reach it unobserved. He was a good deal flurried, and as soon as he arrived at his own apartments, he heaved a deep sigh of relief that was quickly followed by another sigh of trouble and concern. "Now, what am I to do?" he said, "I cannot, must not, stop here any longer. I'll go abroad."

So startled was he by this sudden interview with the quondam friend that he could not sleep. He spent the night in laying plans for his departure, and rose unrested and ill at ease. By that morning's post he received a cheque for certain contributions to the Popular Reader, and as he needed to make some purchases, he went to the bank on which the cheque was drawn to get it cashed. As he came out from thence, he pushed the swing door open somewhat suddenly and vigorously, much to the surprise and discomfort of a stalwart policeman who was standing in the lobby, and who got the full effect of that "movement on flank."

"Hi, there! Heasily! Heasily!" said he "I'm not quite as 'ard as hiron. I'll charge you with 'sault an' battery."

"I sincerely beg your pardon," said Alfred, lifting his face toward the speaker. In these days Alfred Atheling usually wore a downcast look.

It was as much as he could do to maintain his composure, for lo, the two eyes that were looking on him from lowering brows were the eyes of Police Constable Tugwell, whom he had left in Harold Spofforth's dressing-room, with a lock turned on him to keep him there! Again he stammered, hardly knowing what he said—"I'm sure I beg your pardon!"

Tugwell looked at him with a sudden interest. He evidently suspected. Luckily for Alfred, he wasn't sure. Alfred moved away as rapidly as he dared, trying to choose a pace consistent with haste but not with fear. It was as much as he could do to refrain from looking round; and at every step he took he expected to feel a hand upon his shoulder, and to hear Police Constable Tugwell's stern command to stop. It was long before Alfred was able to look back upon that day without a "creep crawly feeling," and the sensation of the pressure of a policeman's digits on his arm.

Tugwell was cautious. Had he been more cautious on the former occasion Alfred would not have escaped. Tugwell had learned a lesson. He entered the bank, and stood at the counter, a man in authority. "Will you inform me what was the name of that gentleman who's just left the bank? Tallish young man, with blue heyes. Just gone hout," said he.

He was told that he was a stranger there, but that the name upon the cheque that he had presented was Ralph Ravensworth. Mr. Tugwell was not much the wiser for that. "It was the very man, I'm a'most sure!" said he, as he left the bank to look along the street in the direction Ralph had taken. "If it is 'im, I should just like to ha' nabbed him."

Honest Tugwell was not to have that indulgence. Alfred had made the best of his opportunities, and for the present at least was in safe quarters. But it was now more than ever certain that he must go. Without further delay, he gathered together the little substance that belonged to him, and set his face toward a far country. In America he thought he might be absolutely safe, and hoped, not without warrant, that the pen of Ralph Ravensworth would maintain him there.

It is needless to say that Ned Saltmer and Madge were sorry to part with him. His genial ways, his Yorkshire sympathies, his ability to talk "East Ridin," and so to make music in the ears of the home-loving couple, and especially his appreciation of Madge's housewifery, had endeared him to them both. There was also that other tie, always strong on the part of well-constituted natures—they had befriended him greatly in the "day of his calamity," and so seemed to have a permanent share in him. On the evening before he set out on his contemplated long journey, Ned asked him to give him ten minutes' conversation in his own room. Alfred wonderingly, and in truth apprehensively, consented. It was his fate to carry about with him always an accuser in his breast, and that led him to be always on the alert for an accusation from otherwhere.

"Why, now," said Ned, coming to the point at once, "it's just here. You've trusted me, an' I've trusted you; an' I don't think that either on us is ony the woss for that."

"Indeed, I'm grateful, from the bottom of my soul," said Alfred, warmly. "You've been a true friend to me."

"I want to be, an' I will be," said Ned. "If you believe it, give me your hand on it." Needless to say it was heartily gripped. "Now, then, all's clear sailin'," said Ned. "The long an' the short of it is, Mr. Alfred Atheling, I know you. I knew you i' the coffee-house the first day I saw you in London."

Alfred looked at him in dumb surprise, and thought what a fool's paradise he had been living in, so far as his notions of seclusion were concerned.

"I don't wonder," said Ned, "at your looking like that. It'll make no difference to me. I'm a Chilworth man, I am, an' I used to be journeyman wi' Simon Holmes o' Thorpe Aspen. He was buildin' a new farmstead for Farmer Holroyd, o' Aspen Grange, leastwise for Sir Godwin Spofforth, his landlord. Don't you remember when you used to be hevin' your holidays, how you used to come when we was hevin' dinner, an' tell us tales, whoppers they was, some of 'em; an' crack jokes till we a'most died o' laughin'?"

Alfred's face had become red and white by turns, and all the while honest Ned Saltmer was speaking he thought how entirely he had been at his mercy. Still, his confidence was not shaken, and he replied with a smile—"Now you mention it, I call it to mind. Those were merrier days than these," and as he spoke Alfred sighed heavily.

"Never mind," said Ned, misunderstanding the origin of that sigh. "You ha' no cause to trouble that I knows you. I liked you then, an' I like you now, an' so does my Madge. An' seein' that you're under a cloud, as you said yourself, I don't mind sayin' that me an' Madge is a good deal troubled about yo'; more especially as you ha' been so down i' the dumps these last few days. You've no call to fear that there's any danger of our lettin' out anything we know. I ain't goin' to ask where you are goin', because that might look suspicious-like, an' most likely it's best we shouldn't know; an' I ain't goin' to persuade you not to go, because I think it's quite likely you're right to move away. But I be goin' to say this, an' what I says I means—whenever you want a corner to set down in, or a plain man to do a friendly turn, an' a good little woman to mak' you welcome, Number fourteen Woodstock Street, Victoria Park, is the spot for you. Will you give me your hand on it?"

They were very honest and genuine tears that stood in Alfred's eyes as he looked in Ned's face, took again the proffered hand, and said, "I will, Ned, and thank you from the bottom of my heart. If ever I need a refuge I'll seek it with you."

It was a few days after this conversation that Alfred, starving with home-hunger, ventured to find his way to Aspen Garth, to snatch a glimpse of the hearth around which were gathered those who, now that a great gulf lay between him and them, were dear to him as life, ay, dearer, for it was more for their sakes, their name, their reputation, than for his own personal safety, that he shunned what he fully believed would be his if he surrendered—a convict's fate.

Protected from observation by the early winter dark and the thick mist that lay upon the ground, he had seen the dear old room with its cosy ingles, its flickering beech logs, whose flames lighted up each well-remembered picture on the walls. He had seen the calm, sad features and silver hair of his mother as she sat in her accustomed chair. He had seen the brighter, cheerier face of sister Clara, and the frank, open countenance of his brother Edgar. He did not see Robert, his good, noble, large-hearted elder brother. He gazed through the window until his face seemed glued to the pane, until the vision was blurred out by scalding tears. He felt as though he must rush in and steal one last embrace. But then came the thought that, by doing so, he should make them partakers of his peril, and possibly bring them within reach of the law, for not surrendering him to the justice he had defied.

While still he lingered, uncertain what to do, he was alarmed by approaching footsteps, and sped swiftly to the stackyard to hide from view Then it was that Jacob Benson, in hot pursuit of "Chivey" Ste'enson, mistook him for the poacher, and stretched his hand to take him. Fearful of being recognized, Alfred had crouched into the angle of the haystack made by the knife to supply the cattle with fodder. With an involuntary appeal upon his lips, he sprang out into the darkness with a darker night within him, and fled away, away from home and friends, to meet an unknown future on a foreign strand.

But the bitter cup he was called upon to drink had not yet received all its unpalatable ingredients. As he sped along the Chilworth road he overtook the poacher who had been the quarry that Jacob Benson would fain have brought down. That worthy, in his turn, mistook him for the keeper in hot pursuit. He turned on Alfred with an oath, and laid his hand upon his gun to defend himself.

Alfred was taken by surprise, and stood in silence for a moment. That moment was sufficient for Chivey to recognize him. Alfred's face was ghastly white, and even through the night the poacher saw that it wore a hunted look. The poacher could sympathize with that; he had had to run many a gauntlet of keepers, policemen, and keepers' men. Only the rough side of his human kindred had been turned toward him, or he might have been other and better than he was. A sudden impulse of sympathy with a brother outlaw made him lower his gun and say as he stood aside to let the young man pass, "Gan yer ways, for all me—hawks sudn't pick oot hawks' een."

Stung to the quick by the humiliating claim of fellowship, Alfred did not stay to recognize the better feelings that prompted it, but passed on into the deepening shadow, the very incarnation of shame and humiliation. He hastened to Liverpool, and took ship for New York. There he hoped to enter on a new career, and to live a nobler and a better life. He resolved to write home as soon as he had landed, and say that much, at any rate, to sow the seeds of hope at home. Thanks to the pious principles which had always been in the ascendent at Aspen Garth, the young prodigal felt a real yearning after better things. Ere he left his native land he had vowed that, by the help of God, he would "Build a new life upon a ruined life,

And make the future fairer than the past,
And make the past appear a troubled dream."

It is a worthy object, but in such a case as his, can it be attained? That question Alfred Athelng asked himself full oft, and feared even while he hoped. That fear well guarded may haply help him in his task.

ABRAHAM PLEADING FOR SODOM.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 20, Gen. 18 : 16-33. Golden Text, Heb. 3 : 3.

The New Names—Abraham's Faith Wavering—His Desires for Ishmael—Unbelief Yields to Faith—A Message for Sarah—God's Confidential Friend—The Investigation of Sodom—The Secrets Unveiled—Abraham's Interest in Sodom—His Intercession—Receives All he Asks—Lot Blessed by Financial Ruin.

WHEN God gave Abraham "the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had when he was in uncircumcision" (Rom. 4 : 11, R. V.), He changed his name from Abram (the father of elevation) to Abraham (the father of many nations). God called him by a name which was, in itself, a fulfilment of His Word of promise. But not only so, God also changed the name of Sarai (contentious), to Sarah (princess), implying that she should be mother of a royal race. "Sarah shall her name be, . . . and she shall be a mother of nations; kings of people shall be of her." For a moment the eye of Abraham was off his God. He looked at Sarah, considered the possibility of such a thing, and "fell upon his face and laughed, and said in his heart, Shall a child be born unto him that is an hundred years old? and shall Sarah, that is ninety years old, bear?" Nature said, "Impossible," faith says, "With God all things are possible" (Matt. 19 : 26). Abraham thought he saw an easier way than that which God proposed, "O that Ishmael might live before Thee!" God was ignoring Ishmael, just as

He Ignores All Our Attempts to Mend His Ways.

But Ishmael was dear to Abraham, and he had taken for granted that the promises would be fulfilled in him; but this was not God's thought; it would have defeated His purpose, and have played into the hands of Abraham's unbelief. So He said, "Sarah, thy wife shall bear thee a son, indeed, and thou shall call his name Isaac —(i.e., laughter); and I will establish My covenant with him for an everlasting covenant, and with his seed after him." It was not in vain that Abraham had pleaded for Ishmael, "As for Ishmael, I have heard thee; behold, I have blessed him, . . . and I will make him a great nation." Blessing was in the tents of Abraham, and, probably, at this very time, Ishmael knew the God of his father, and he was blest, but not with the covenant blessing.

It was not long after this that the Lord appeared again to Abraham. His moment of

Unbelief Had Passed Away

and in the New Testament there is no record of it at all, on the contrary, we are told that, "being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about one hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb; he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; and being fully persuaded that what He had promised, He was able also to perform." Faith looks at soul, body, circumstances, through what God is, what God says, and what God is able to do. Unbelief looks at God's promises through what we are, what we feel, what our former experiences have been. Unbelief measures trial, temptation, disease with what we are, faith measures all these things with what God is. With Abraham,

Faith Had Now Superseded Unbelief, and thus could God commune with him. God appeared to him in the form of three men, to whom Abraham offered hospitality, and with whom he was perfectly at his ease. The men inquired for Sarah, who was within hearing in the tent, and when God, through them, confirmed His promise that Sarah should have a son, she laughed at the apparent absurdity of such a thing, and God said, "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" Sarah denied that she laughed, thus adding untruth to her unbelief. This, too, is not mentioned in the New Testament. God overcame the sin in Sarah, and the Holy Ghost thus testified of her, "Through faith also Sarah herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she Judged Him Faithful Who Had Promised."

Jesus came "not . . . to condemn the world; but that the world, through Him, might be saved" (John 3 : 18). He is "the Mediator of the New Covenant" (Heb. 12 : 24), which speaks, not condemnation, but pardon. He came "to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself," therefore are the sins of men of old not mentioned in Heb. 11.

Having delivered their message, the men rose up, and looked toward Sodom, and "Abraham went with them to bring them on the way." God was about to judge the wicked city of Sodom, but He would not do it without taking a man into His counsels. Before He destroyed the world by a flood, He took Noah into His counsels, and now He says, "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do; seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him?" God treated Abraham as

and He gives two reasons for so doing: one is the greatness which should distinguish Abraham in fulfilment of His promises, the other is Abraham's faithfulness to God, "For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which He hath spoken of him." God's faithfulness to man and man's faithfulness to God must go together. It is true that we can do nothing of ourselves, but which enables us to do His will. When He worketh in us to will and to do, we can either co-operate with Him or resist His working. God confided to Abraham, "Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous; I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto Me; and if not, I will know." Surely, Abraham must have held his breath while this searching investigation was going on. No sons of Belial could be brought forward to prove that the cry which had entered into the ears of God was a false one. No bull's-eye lantern or earthly detective was needed to discover and make known the truth. "He that planted the ear, shall He not hear? He that formed the eye, shall He not see?" (Ps. 94 : 9). What fearful in that silent, severe, uncompromising scrutiny, only the day of judgment will declare! Blighted lives, affections trampled upon, innocence betrayed, the strong taking brutal advantage of the weak—such were the things which called down fire and brimstone out of heaven, for God could not suffer them in His creation.

Secrets Were Unveiled

"The men" went on their way—all unsuspected by the wicked men of Sodom—"but Abraham stood yet before the Lord." He had Interests in Sodom.

Lot, who was not only his nephew, but one of his spiritual children, lived in Sodom, and Abraham trembled for him. He knew that Lot was a justified man, a child of God, and yet how could Abraham justify his worldliness? He looked away from Lot to the God who had brought himself out of idolatry, and said, "Wilt Thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked? Peradventure there be fifty righteous within the city: wilt Thou also destroy and not spare the place for the fifty righteous which are therein? That be far from Thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked; and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from Thee; shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Fifty! Abraham was altogether out in his estimate. But could Lot have dwelt over twenty years in Sodom, and yet have had

No Fruit for God Among the Men of Sodom?

Fifty in about twenty years would have been but a small number of conversions. But man sees not as God sees. Sodom had no such salt as Abraham imagined, and, by and by, he awoke to the ghastly fact that in all that city and the cities of the plain there was but one man whom God could call His own, and that one was the worldly Lot! God's answer was clear and decisive, "If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then I will spare all the place for their sakes." Abraham reduced the number by five, then by ten, then again by ten, until at last he said, "Oh, let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak yet but this once, Peradventure ten shall be found there, and He said, I will not destroy it for ten's sake!" All that Abraham asked was granted—the city was destroyed—but the one righteous man was saved. "And it came to pass, when God destroyed the cities of the plain, that God remembered Abraham, and sent Lot out of the midst of the overthrow, when He overthrew the cities in the which Lot dwelt" (Gen. 19 : 29). God would have us to be intercessors. But is not the attempt to compel God to do what we want, or what we think right. Abraham wanted God to save Sodom, which was the greatest curse on God's earth; this was not God's thought, it was better even for the wicked men of Sodom that they should not live to add to their wickedness, and it was necessary that God's holiness and His hatred of the loathsome sins of the wicked city should be demonstrated to all time. But why should Lot, who was righteous, lose all his possessions? Because God knew that they were weaning his heart from the God he knew, and so hindering his usefulness, that when he did attempt to speak a word for God to his sons-in-law, it was a thing so unusual and unlooked for, that "he seemed as one that mocked unto his sons-in-law." Prayer in the Holy Ghost is and so an asking in the will of God; and then, against all seeming, and all discouragement, there is praise to God for the answer. In the utter stripping of Lot of all his temporal possessions, a fuller answer was given to Abraham's prayer than he had either asked or thought.

"GOD SHALL SUPPLY ALL YOUR NEED."

PHILIPPIANS iv, 19.

Not what I want myself, dear Lord,
But what I need, O give to me;
I thank Thee I can trust Thy word,
That as my need, my gift shall be.

I place my trembling hand in Thine,
And love Thee, trust Thee, as Thy child;
Content with Thee to walk alone
Through gloomy paths and deserts wild.

And though the way be dark and cold,
Still am I safe, dear Lord, with Thee;
My feeble steps Thou wilt uphold,
For Thine own arms encircle me.

And giving all my life to Thee,
No longer have I any care;
Thou hast prepared a home for me,
And Thy own hand will lead me there.

The Railroad Catastrophe at White River Junction, Vermont, and Burning of the Cars and Bridge, on Feb. 5.

THE VERMONT RAILROAD DISASTER ON FEB. 5.

The Make-up of the Train—Starting from White River Junction—The Engineer's Narrative—The Fall from the Bridge—The Burning Cars—A Passenger's Story—A Brakeman's Jump—The Bridge on Fire—The Roll of the Dead—Parting of a Father and Son—A Husband's Suicide.

THE appalling railroad disaster on the Central Vermont Railroad on Saturday, February 5th, has sent a thrill of horror through the country. Since that dread calamity at Ashtabula in December, 1876, in which the eminent Gospel singer, Mr. P. P. Bliss, and his wife, and about one hundred and twenty other passengers lost their lives, there has been nothing of a like character so terrible as this. On the first page is a picture of the scene with which we here give a brief description of its prominent features.

The Train

to which the accident occurred was made up at White River Junction, Vt., from two trains, one of which came from Boston and the other from Springfield, Mass. When it started on its journey to Montreal, it consisted of six cars, made up, as is customary, with the combination baggage and express car next to the engine, then the combination mail and smoker, with the first passenger car, all of which came from Boston over the Boston and Lowell Road; then followed the passenger and sleeping cars from Springfield, the sleeper being the St. Albans. Attached to the rear of the train was the Pullman sleeper Pilgrim. The train was more than an hour late, and did not leave the junction until ten minutes past two in the morning, and should have reached Montreal soon after eight o'clock. On account of the special rates to the Montreal Carnival the number of passengers was unusually large, many persons taking advantage of the reduced fare, to make the on business and pleasure. So extensive was the demand for accommodations that all the berths on the sleeping car Puritan were taken long before the Boston section reached Hartford. Fifteen persons occupied berths in the sleeping car St. Albans. The ordinary coaches were well filled, and inquiries which have been made since the disaster indicate that there must have been ninety-one persons in all on the train, of whom twelve were employés of the road.

About four miles from White River Junction is West Hartford, a small hamlet on the White River. The population consists of farmers, whose homes are quite widely scattered. At this point the Central Vermont Railroad crosses the river obliquely. The track is fifty feet above the water, which, at this point, is eight feet deep. The bridge is a wooden one, resting on abutments of gray granite near the banks, and on three piles of the same material in the middle of the river. It is six hundred and fifty feet in length, the longest of its character in the country. The river was frozen on Friday night, ice to the thickness of two feet having formed on it, and the thermometer registered twenty degrees below zero.

of the wrecked train in giving evidence at the official investigation on February 7th, said that he made no effort to make up lost time, and slowed up as usual before reaching the bridge. He noticed nothing unusual until he was past the middle of the bridge, when a sharp stroke of the alarm-bell caused him to apply the air brakes and look out. Then he saw the rear end of his train topple over fifty feet below. Two sleeping cars and two passenger coaches had become detached from the forward part of the train. They left the track before reaching the bridge, and bumped along the cross-ties until the coupling broke, and then the first car fell on its side and over the bridge, dragging the others with it to the frozen river below. A broken rail has been found where the cars left the track and a broken axle. It is supposed that either the break of the axle caused the car to leave the track, or that the broken rail caused the shock that broke the axle.

The baggage and mail cars, with the engine, crossed the bridge in safety. As soon as possible the train was stopped, and the railroad employés and a few passengers in the smoking compartment of the mail car went to the relief of those in the wreck. The descent of the steep embankment was speedily made, and when they arrived where they expected to find the detached portion of the train they discovered the four cars bottom up on the ice. Flames immediately burst forth.

Vain Efforts at Rescue.

The scene at the bridge was awful. Mingled with the uproar of the fire were the cries of the imprisoned passengers, crying "Help! Help! Help!" The few passengers who were in the "smoker" and the employés of the railroad and the mail service were struck dumb at the terrible sight before them. The most collected men rendered what little service was possible, but the heat of the fast-burning cars drove them away before much could be accomplished.

A Passenger's Story of his experience gives a vivid idea of the scene. John Shull, a printer of New Haven, in company with Louis B. James, the son of the editor of the Thomaston Express, went to Springfield on Friday and took the through train there for Montreal to attend the carnival. The sleeper in which they were was put into the train at White River Junction. Shull says that while the train was being made up there he fell asleep. When he awoke shortly afterward he perceived that the car was off the track. "I recognized that it was," he says, "by its bumping on the cross-ties. Of course I had no idea that we were on a bridge. The curtain on my window was down. I had hardly made out the point about the car being off the track when I felt the car turn over. The turning gave me a feeling of nausea. Then I lost consciousness, for how long I don't know, but when I came to I found that the window which before was at my side was now over my face and some feet above me. Some car timbers lay across my chest and pinned me into a very uncomfortable position. I was lying on my back, and, as I said, with the opening over my head. I struggled desperately and finally was able to punch my hand through the glass of that window, giving myself some severe cuts in the arms. I could hear some noise outside, and soon I heard somebody walking on the side of the car over my head.

"You must remember that the car was now lying on its side. I yelled for help with all the strength I had. The man overhead came to the window, wrenched it open, and, as he did so, let a bushel or two of snow fall in on me. The snow nearly suffocated me. I could not yet make another outcry. I was nearly mad with anguish, and the more so, as the man, after listening for a few seconds at the window, walked away from me. After freeing myself from the snow I called out again and again for help. I could now see from where I lay that

The Car was on Fire,

I was only three berths from the stove. The timbers about the stove were blazing slightly every minute, and the smoke was reaching me All this while I had seen nothing and heard nothing of James. Nobody answered my cries for help, and I had just barely room for breathing under the big beams or whatever it was that pressed on my chest. Just as I was despairing a man heard my cries, opened the window, and pulled me out on to the ice of the river. The cars and the bridge were then burning. The man who pulled me out helped me look for James. We pulled all the furniture we could reach through the window and worked until the flames were right beside us, licking up the berth next to mine. Then we had to go. Afterward I learned my assistant was the son of Judge Vesey, of Vermont. I was soon told it was silly for me to wait around for the body of my friend James. Even if the body were found nobody could recognize it. It was seven o'clock before I could get anything to put on my bare feet. James's body had not been found when I left."

A Brakeman's Jump

for life was one of the thrilling incidents of the disaster. George Parker was acting as brakeman on the train, and was in the forward passenger car just before it went on the bridge. Suddenly he heard a sharp snap and felt a jar. He rushed forward, and, looking out from the rear end of the smoker, saw the four rear cars enter the bridge off the rails and jumping up and down on the ties and cross timbers. Thinking the whole train would be hurled from the bridge, he jumped and rolled down the bank to the river

"About half way across," said he, "I saw the rear car make a sharp pitch to the right and drop into the shadowy abyss like a meteor, dragging three other cars with it. I saw the engine and two cars keep on, witnessed the fiery plunge of the other cars, heard them grind and thunder on the rocks and ice below, and then I ran to arouse the neighborhood. When I returned flames were bursting forth from the passenger cars, and five minutes later they were all on fire. I assisted in helping people out of the two sleepers and then looked on and saw the poor fellows cremated alive. I heard them cry piteously for help and could not offer them any aid on account of the great heat."

Train and Bridge Burning.

The fire, according to best accounts, first appeared in the wreck of the second passenger car. It spread to the others with frightful rapidity. At its height the flaming pyre made a sight of sickening horror. From all parts of it came heart-rending cries that died away in death all too slowly. Of near a hundred passengers who went down with the wreck, only thirty gathered around the dreadful bonfire. The flames leaped up to the bridge above and soon spread to the further shore, and the blazing timbers dropped to the ice below. Before this stage was reached most of the rescued had walked, or had been carried, to the single farm-house within sight of the wreck. Few were able to make their way unassisted. Two or three died on the way. As soon as the flames had subsided sufficiently the work of recovering the bodies from the wreck was begun. Most of the remains are so charred as to be unrecognizable. The body of Pullman Car Conductor Burgess was one of the first taken out.

Upon the receipt of the news at St. Albans President J. Gregory Smith, General Manager Hobart and the other officials started a special train to the scene of the accident. Physicians were taken in at St. Albans and intermediate stations, and all that was possible was done to relieve the suffering of the injured. The scene of the disaster is a sparsely settled country, but people in the vicinity lent all possible aid. Hundreds from all quarters visited the scene of the accident, which is now a desolate waste. Work upon the ruins was kept up all day, but the work of recovering the bodies was necessarily slow. Some undoubtedly fell into the water when the heat of the burning cars and bridge timbers melted the ice, and were carried away by the current.

cannot be counted with absolute accuracy. Of the former the remains are so charred as to be in many cases beyond identification, and even the surgeons are unable to be sure whether a heap of burned flesh represents two or three bodies. A most careful revision, however gives the following estimate of the number of persons on the wrecked train and how accounted for: There were brought to Windsor on the Connecticut River Road, 36; to White River Junction on the Boston and Lowell Road, 37; taken on at White River Junction, 6; trainmen, 12. Total on train, 91, accounted for as follows: Injured, per surgeons' official list, 36; dead bodies recovered, surgeons' count, 32; known to have gone north on trains, 12; known to have returned home, 5. Total, 85. Six are still unaccounted for. These figures may be changed by the probable presence of children without tickets on the train, who have not yet been heard from.

A Pathetic Parting

of a son from his father is among the sad incidents reported. One of the first passengers to escape from the burning wreck was Clovis Maignet, a French-Canadian boy, living in Shaewigan, Canada. He was with his father, David Maignet, on their way from Holyoke to their home. The boy sat three seats behind his father in the third car from the rear. He was dozing in his seat when he felt the car shiver. This motion was kept up for a few seconds and then the car dashed over the bridge upon the ice. By hard work the boy succeeded in getting out of one of the car windows. He at once went in search of his father, and discovered him, by the light of the burning wreck just above him, pinned down by a part of the top of the car, which had fallen directly across his chest and legs. The old man was as firmly held as if in a vise. Clovis rushed to his father's assistance, and spoke words of encouragement to him.

The father was very cool under the circumstances, and told his son to help him out as soon as possible. The boy seized his father and struggled with all his strength to extricate him, but in vain. The flames were approaching rapidly. "Clovis," said the father, "run and get an axe or a saw," but the boy could not find either. "Pull me out, then," said the father, "even if you have to break my legs to do it." The boy tugged away with all his might, but could not stir his father an inch. With wonderful coolness the father gave himself up to his fate.

"It's no use, my boy," he said. "There is no hope for me. Leave me and save yourself. But remember the dying words of your father. Always be a good boy. Farewell, my son; I will meet you in the other world."

The flames were then so close at hand that the boy could remain no longer.

A Husband's Suicide

was one result of the maddening spectacle. Soon after the accident a man was noticed leaning on the edge of one of the cars and calling to his wife, saying, "Mary, are you there?" No answer came, and then he would lean back and moan in his anguish. When Mr. Lee looked for him again he was gone, and it is supposed that he jumped into the wreck and perished with his wife.

Many other heart-rending incidents are reported. The awful calamity separated for all time even those who were side by side a few minutes before. One man escaped while his companion was pinioned firmly by timbers across his foot, and before he could be extricated he was burned to death. It was a terrible scene. In such circumstances death is very awful. Still, in any circumstances death is deeply solemn; and it lies before every one in the near or far future. Whether by sudden catastrophe like this, or by disease, farewell must be said to the world and the soul enter upon eternity. Happy are they to whom death has no terrors in whatever shape it comes. To those who have through Christ entered into that peace which passes understanding, who through His blood have been accepted of God and are washed and purified, death is only the gate of life. They go to be with Him, "which is far better."

The Testimony of a Defaulter to the Truth of the warning of Scripture of the fatal results of sin was mentioned on February 1st in the course of a trial in a Canadian court. A witness identified the handwriting of a letter written by Blackstone, the Portland defaulter, in which the writer, after confessing to the theft of $75,580, said: "They say I stood high in the church. That's a lie. I have not attended church for two years. I have had too great a weight of sin on my conscience. Let no man tell me that the wages of sin is not death. Instead of being an exile and a fugitive from justice, I might to-day, if I had not gone wrong, been a bank cashier."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Saved From Tripping.—Mr. J. G. Forbes Said at a recent meeting: "One day as I was going along the street I saw a number of girls playing with a rope on the pavement. As I came up they let the rope lie flat on the ground with the apparent purpose of allowing me to pass; but just as I was about to step over it they drew it tight two or three inches above the ground, and had I not been too strong for them and kicked it out of their hands, I should have fallen. So Satan and the people of this world are continually laying traps for Christians, and, while seeming to help them are but enticing them to their ruin. But, thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, He either removes the temptation, helps us, by lifting us safely over it, or making us strong in His strength, enables us to firmly face and resolutely overcome it."

Made Rich Through a Bank Failure.—Another worker remarked: "Not long ago, I met a very old gentleman who had at one time of his life been a very rich man. He had in his youth been a most earnest Christian, but as he increased in this world's wealth, and got fine houses, horses and carriages, he, although still a Christian, was not so energetic in his Master's service; his time was more taken up with his business. By and by there came a great bank failure, one of the most extensive of the city banks came down, and he being a large shareholder lost all he had; but when he was thus made poor the Lord came to him and comforted him, and he felt happier and drew closer to the Lord than he had ever done in his greatest prosperity, and he praises the Lord for his seeming misfortunes."

The "Three Courses" Open.—The Same Gentleman observed: "I remember a friend of mine telling me the other day that he had been speaking to an anxious soul; and the anxious one had said to him, 'What must I do?' 'There are three things, and one of them you must do,' was the reply. 'The first is you may turn over a new leaf, but though you do so and keep the new leaf perfectly clean, what are you going to do about the past? You cannot efface it, and there it will remain to condemn you. Secondly you may remain as you are, and then you are surely lost. Or, best of all, you can come to Christ, and the whole thing is finished at once. Your past sins are all blotted out, and your future secured. You are safe for time and for eternity.' The last-named course was adopted, and the anxious soul entered into rest."

Afraid of the Wild Cats.—Mr. J. Gilbert Forbes said: "Once my father and I (I was a very little boy then) were driving along a country road which led through a thick forest; there was nothing but trees on every side, and the night was intensely dark, and I became very much afraid, especially as there were a number of wild cats in a hill in the neighborhood, and I expected every moment that one of them would jump out and seize me. I seemed to have completely forgotten the presence of my father, until he turned to me, and said, 'Don't be afraid, I'll take care of you,' and then all the fear left me at once, and I felt quite secure because I was along with him. So when things grow dark all around them, many Christians begin to think of the dangers and difficulties to be encountered, and look at their own feebleness; but when the Lord's gracious 'Fear not for I am with you, and nothing shall harm you" falls upon their ear, they are comforted and enabled to conquer in the strength of Him who loved us and gave Himself for us."

Return of a Prodigal Daughter.—An Evangelist remarked: "A lady whom I knew had five sons, all of them ministers of the Gospel. Yet, though she was thus blessed by her sons being all in the ministry, strange to say, she had a daughter—an only daughter—who had gone far astray. And it was the constant prayer of that good old lady that her wandering child should be brought back; and for the last years of her life the door of her house was never shut; she was always expecting her daughter's return. And if the neighbors asked her if she were not afraid to leave her door open all night, especially as she lived in such a quiet part of the country, she would answer, 'I have given my house, door and all, to the Lord, and He is quite able to take care of His own; besides, I expect my daughter home some day soon, and I am keeping the door open for her. I have asked God to give me back my daughter, and He has never yet disappointed me in anything I asked from Him.' Well, one night she was roused from sleep by some one kissing her, and when she opened her eyes she saw bent over her the tear-stained face of her daughter, as she stood weeping by the bedside. She had come to the door that night, and trying the latch and finding it open, had known that that meant a welcome. She had slipped softly in, and up to her mother's bedroom, where the sight of her mother sleeping calmly and peacefully had completely broken her down, and from that night she was a changed woman."

A Leap Into the Chasm.—A Worker Said: "There is a story of ancient Rome, that right in the middle of the city in the forum, there was caused by an earthquake, an enormous chasm so deep that no one could see the bottom, and such that no matter how much material was thrown into it, it swallowed it all up and refused to be filled. The Romans consulted the oracles, and were told that there the chasm would remain until the most precious thing among the Romans would be cast into it, upon which it would close, and from that time the progress of Rome would be one steady march forward. For some time the Romans were much perplexed to find out what was the most precious thing they possessed, but one of them named Curtius said, 'Why, do you not all know that the most precious thing in Rome is its youth and valor,' and arming himself and mounting his steed, he sprang into the chasm, which immediately closed over his head. The legend is typical. Sin had caused a great chasm between God and man, and no matter what sacrifices were thrown into it, it swallowed them up, leaving the gulf of separation the same as ever. It required that the most precious thing in all God's universe should step into the breach, and by the sacrifice of Himself reconcile God and man, and, to-day, thanks to the love of Jesus, there is now no separation but a straight road to salvation and to God through the body and blood of Christ."

A Fall Through a Trap.—Mr. Calder said: "Yesterday, in my place of business, one of the boys engaged with us fell down a trap, and was very badly injured. I rushed down and got him in my arms, but he was unconscious; and as I bathed the blood from his face and otherwise tried to restore him, I heard the first words he moaned, which were, 'Thank God I'm not killed yet; but it is dark here; we must get up, up into the light.' At length he was sufficiently recovered to recognize me, and then he seemed somewhat reassured, and consented to lie still till the doctor should come. When the doctor came he said there was not much to be feared, that he was more frightened than seriously hurt, and if we were careful there was no danger. Meanwhile he had again relapsed into unconsciousness, and was constantly reiterating the one word, 'When? When? When?' And it was not until this morning, when we had sent the other lad to inquire for him, that we learned what he meant. The lad on calling was told by the injured boy's sister that though he was improving he was still partly unconscious, and continued to moan, 'When? When? When? Oh, when shall I meet Jesus?' I had been speaking to him some few days before about his soul, and had told him to think of his mother now dead, but who, in life, had often prayed for him; and when thus suddenly stricken down, his first thought had been about Him who had died for him. He is now out of all danger, but I have hope that this seeming accident will be blessed to the saving of his soul."

YOUR friend takes you through his valuable house. You examine the arches, the fresco, the grass-plots, the fish-ponds, the conservatories, the parks of deer, and you say within yourself, or you say aloud: "What did all this cost?" You see costly apparel, or you see a high-mettled span of horses harnessed with silver and gold, and you begin to make an estimate of the value. The man who owns a large estate cannot instantly tell you what it is all worth. He says: "I will estimate so much for the house, so much for the furniture, so much for laying out the grounds, so much for the stock, so much for the barn, so much for the equipage—adding up, in all making this aggregate."

Well, my friends, I hear so much about our mansion in heaven, about its furniture and the grand surroundin s, that I want to know how much it is all worth, and for it. I cannot complete in a month or a year the magnificent calculation; but before I get through to-day I hope to give you the figures. "Ye are bought with a price."

With some friends I went into London Tower to look at the crown jewels of England. We walked around, caught one glimpse of them, and being in the procession were compelled to pass out. I wish that to-day I could take this audience into the tower of God's mercy and strength, that you might walk around just once at least and see the crown jewels of eternity, behold their brilliance and estimate their value. "Ye are bought with a price." Now, if you have a large amount of money to pay, you do not pay it all at once, but you pay it by instalments—so much the first of January, so much the first of April, so much the first of July, so much the first of October, until the entire amount is paid. And I have to tell this audience that "You have been bought with a price," and that that price was paid in different instalments.

The First Instalment

paid for the clearance of our souls was the ignominious birth of Christ in Bethlehem. Though we may never be carefully looked after afterward, our advent into the world is carefully guarded. We come into the world amid kindly attentions. Privacy and silence are afforded when God launches an immortal soul into the world. Even the roughest of men know enough to stand back. But I have to tell you that in the village on the side of the hill, there was a very bedlam of uproar when Jesus was born. In a village capable of accommodating only a few hundred people, many thousand people were crowded; and amid ostlers and muleteers, and camel-drivers yelling at stupid beasts of burden, the Messiah appeared. No silence. No privacy. A better adapted place hath the eaglet in the eyrie—hath the whelp in the lion's lair.

The exile of heaven lieth down upon the straw. The first night out from the palace of heaven spent in an outhouse! One hour after laying aside the robes of heaven, dressed in a wrapper of coarse linen. One would have supposed that Christ would have made a more gradual descent, coming from heaven first to a half-way world of great magnitude, then to Cæsar's palace, then to a merchant's castle in Galilee, then to a private home in Bethany, then, last of all, to the stable. No! It was one leap from the top to the bottom.

Let us open the door of the caravansary in Bethlehem, and drive away the camels. Press on through the group of idlers and loungers. What, oh Mary, no light? "No light," she says, "save that which comes through the door." What, Mary, no food? "None," she says, "only that which is brought in the sack on the journey." Let the Bethlehem woman who has come in here with kindly affections put back the covering from that we may look upon it. Look! Look! Uncover your head. Let us kneel. Let all voices be hushed. Son of Mary! Son of God! Child of a day—monarch of eternity! In that eye the glance of a God. Omnipotence sheathed in that babe's arm. That voice to be changed from the feeble plaint to the tone that shall wake the dead. Hosanna! Hosanna! Glory be to God that Jesus came from throne to manger that we might rise from manger to throne, and that all the gates are open, and that the door of heaven that once swung this way to let Jesus out, now swings the other way to let us in.

The second instalment paid for our soul's clearance was a mountainous region full of caverns, where there are to this day panthers and wild beasts of all sorts; so that you must now, the traveller says, go there armed with knife or gun or pistol. It was there that Jesus went to think and pray, and it was there that this monster of hell, more sly, more terrific than anything that prowled in that country—Satan himself, met Christ.

Hunger must have agonized every fibre of the body and gnawed on the stomach with teeth of death. The thought of a morsel of bread or meat must have thrilled the body with something like ferocity. Turn out a pack of men was a-hungered, and, if they had strength, with one yell they would devour you as a lion a kid. It was in that pang of hunger that Jesus was accosted, and Satan said: "Now change these stones, which look like bread, into an actual supply of bread." Had the temptation come to you or me under those circumstances, we would have cried: "Bread it shall be!" and been almost impatient at the time taken for mastication; but Christ with one hand beat back the hunger, and with the other hand beat back the monarch of darkness. Oh ye tempted ones! Christ was tempted.

We are told that Napoleon ordered a coat of mail made; but he was not quite certain that it was impenetrable, so he said to the manufacturer of that coat of mail: "Put it on now yourself and let us try it;" and with shot after shot from his own pistol the Emperor found out that it was just what it pretended to be—a good coat of mail. Then the man received a large reward. I bless God that the same coat of mail that struck back the weapons of temptation from the heart of Christ we may all now wear; for Jesus comes and says: "I have been tempted, and I know what it is to be tempted. Take this robe that defended Me and wear it for yourselves. I will see you through all trials, and I will see you through all temptation."

"But," says Satan, still further to Jesus, "come and I will show you something worth looking at," and after a half-day's journey they came to Jerusalem and to the top of the Temple. Just as one might go up in the tower of Antwerp and look off upon Belgium, so Satan brought Christ to the top of the Temple. Some people at a great height feel dizzy and have a strange disposition to jump; so, Satan comes to Christ with in that very crisis. Standing there at the top of the Temple they look off. A magnificent reach of country. Grain fields, vineyards, olive groves, forests and streams, cattle in the valley, flocks on the hills, and villages and cities and realms. "Now," says Satan, "I'll make a bargain. Just jump off. I know it is a great way from the top of the Temple to the valley, but if you are divine you can fly. Jump off. It won't hurt you. Angels will catch you. Your Father will hold you. Besides, I'll make you a large present, if you will. I'll give you Asia Minor, I'll give you India; I'll give you China, I'll give you Ethiopia, I'll give you Italy, I'll give you Spain, I'll give you Germany, I'll give you Britain, I'll give you all the world." What a humiliation it must have been.

Go to-morrow morning and get in an altercation with some wretch crawling up from a gin-cellar in the Fourth Ward, New York. "No," you say, "I would not bemean myself by getting in such a contest." Then think of what the King of heaven and earth endured when He came down and of hell, and fought him in the wilderness and on the top of the Temple. But I bless God that in that triumph over temptation Christ gives us the assurance that we also shall triumph. Having Himself been tempted, He is able to succor all those who are tempted.

In a violent storm at sea the mate told a boy—for the rigging had become entangled in the mast—to go up and right it. A gentleman standing on the deck said: "Don't send that boy up; he will be dashed to death." The mate said: "I know what I am about." The boy raised his hat in recognition of the order, and then rose, hand over hand, and went to work; and as he swung in the storm the passengers wrung their hands and expected to see him fall. The work done, he came down in safety, and a Christian man said to him: "Why did you go down in the forecastle before you went up?" "Ah," said the boy, "I went down to pray. My mother always taught me before I undertook anything great to pray." "What is that you have in your vest?" said the man. "Oh, that is the New Testament," he said, "I thought I would carry it with me if I really did go overboard." How well that boy was protected! I care not how great the height or how vast the depth, with Christ within us, and Christ beneath us, and Christ above us, and Christ all around us, nothing shall befall us in the way of harm. Christ Himself, having been in the tempest, will deliver all those who put their trust in Him. Blessed be His glorious name forever.

The third instalment paid for redemption was

The Saviour's Sham Trial.

I call it a sham trial—there has never been anything so indecent or unfair in the Tombs Court of New York as was witnessed at the trial of Christ. Why, they hustled Him into the court-room at two o'clock in the morning. They gave Him no time for counsel. They gave Him no opportunity for subpœnaing witnesses. The ruffians who were wandering around through the midnight, of course they saw the arrest and went into the court-room. But Jesus' friends were sober men, were respectable men, and at that hour, two o'clock in the morning, of course they were at home asleep. Consequently, Christ entered the court-room with the ruffians.

Oh, look at Him! No one to speak a word for Him. I lift the lantern until I can look into His face, and as my heart beats in sympathy for this, the best friend the world ever had, Himself now utterly friendless, an officer of the court-room comes up and smites Him in the mouth, and I see the blood stealing from gum and lip. Oh, it was a farce of a trial, lasting only perhaps an hour, and then the judge rises for the sentence! It is against the law to give sentence unless there has been an adjournment of th court between condemnation and sentence; but what cares this judge for the law? "The man has no friends—let him die," says the judge, and the ruffians outside the rail cry: "Aha! aha! that's what we want—His blood. Hand him out here to us. Away with Him! away with Him!"

Oh, I bless God that amid all the injustice that may be inflicted upon us in this world we have a divine sympathizer. The world cannot lie about you nor abuse you as much as they did

Christ, and Jesus stands to-day in every court-room, in every home, in every store, and says: "Courage! By all my hours of maltreatment, I will protect those who are trampled on." And that two-o'clock morning scene, and the stroke of the ruffian on the mouth, and the howling of the unwashed crowd, then He will forget you and me in the injustices of life.

Some of you want deliverance from your troubles, God knows you have enough of them. Physical troubles; domestic troubles; spiritual troubles; financial troubles. You have been gathering them up, some perhaps for five, or six, or seven years, and you have divided them into two classes: Those you can talk about and those you cannot talk about; and as those griefs are the most grinding and depressing which you cannot mention, you get condolence for the things you can speak of, while you get no condolence for the things that you cannot. In your school days you learned how to bound the States and could tell what rivers and lakes and mountains ran through them. If you were asked to-day to bound your worldly estate you would say it is bounded on the north by trouble, and on the south by trouble, and on the east by trouble, and on the west by trouble, while rivers of tears and lakes of woe, and mountains of disaster run through it. What are you going to do with

Your Troubles?

Why do you not go to the theatre and have your mind absorbed in some tragedy? "Oh," you say, "everything I have seen on the boards of the stage is tame compared with the tragedy of my own life!" Well, then, why do you not go to your trunks and closets and gather up all the mementoes of your departed friends and put them out of sight, and take down their pictures from the wall and put in the frame a harvest scene or some bright and gay spectacle? "Ah," you say, "if I should remove all these mementoes of my departed friends, that would not take away the killing pictures that are hanging in the gallery of my own heart."

Well, if that does not help you, why do you not plunge into society and try to wash off in worldly gayeties all these assoilments of the soul? "Oh," you say, "I have tried that! but how can I hear other children laugh when my children are silent? How can I see other happy families when my own happy family is broken up? Trouble, trouble!" But do you gain anything by brooding over your misfortunes, by sitting down in a dark room, by a comparison of the sweet past with the bitter present? "No; that makes things worse." But I have to tell you to-day that the Christ of all sympathy presents Himself.

Is there anybody in this house that can get along without sympathy? I do not think I would live a day without it. And yet there are a great many who seem to get along without any divine sympathy. Their fortune in the counting-room, or in the store, or in the insurance company, takes wings and flies away. They button up a penniless pocket. They sit down in penury where once they had affluence, and yet there is no and say: "Oh, man, there are treasures that never fail, in banks that never break! I will take care of you. I own the cattle on a thousand hills, and you shall never want." They have no such divine Saviour to say that to them. I do not know how they get along. Death comes to the nursery. One voice less in the household. One less fountain of joy and laughter. Two hands less to be busy all day. Two feet less to bound through the hall. Shadow after shadow following through that household, yet no Jesus to stand there and say: "I am the Shepherd. That lamb is not lost. I took it off the cold mountains. All's well." Oh, can you tell me the mystery? Can you solve it? Tell me how it is that men and women with aches and pains and sorrows and losses and exasperations and bereavements, can get along without a sympathizing Christ? I cannot understand it.

But I come here to say this morning that if you really want divine sympathy you can have it. There are two or three passages of Scripture that throb with pity and kindness and love. "Cast thy burden on the Lord and He will sustain thee." "Come unto Me all ye who are weary and heavy laden and I will give you rest." Oh, there are green pastures where the heavenly Shepherd leads the sick and wounded of the flock! When all the other trees of the orchard fail, God has one tree of fruit for His dear children. Though the organ wails out its requiem, there comes afterward a song, a chant, an anthem, a battle-march, a coronation, a victory. Do you not want the sympathy of Jesus? I offer it this morning to every man and woman in this house; you need Him. Oh, how much you need Him! There was wounded unto death. While lying there on the field he heard at a great distance off some one crying out in great pain: "Oh, my God!" and he said to himself: "I am dying, but I think, perhaps, I could help that man. Although I can't walk I'll just roll over to where he is." So he rolled over in his own blood, and rolled over the bodies of the slain, and rolled on until he came to where the other man was dying, and put, as it were, his wound against that wound, and his sorrow against that sorrow, and helped to alleviate it. And so it seems to me that Jesus Christ hears the groan of our sorrow, the groan of our poverty, the groan of our wretchedness, and comes to the relief. He comes rolling over sin and sorrow to the place where we lie on the battlefield, and He puts over us the arm of His everlasting love; and I see that arm and hand are wounded; and as He puts that arm over us I can hear Him say: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." Oh that you might feel this morning the power of a sympathizing Jesus!

Further, I remark the

paid for our redemption was the demise of Christ. The world has seen many dark days. About fifteen summers ago there was a very dark day when the sun was eclipsed. The fowl at noonday went to their perch, and we felt a gloom as we looked at the astronomical wonder. It was a dark day in London when the plague was at its height, and the dead with uncovered faces were taken in open carts and dumped in the trenches. It was a dark day when the earth opened and Lisbon sank; but the darkest day since the creation of the world was the day when the carnage of Calvary was enacted. It was about noon when the curtain began to be drawn. It was not the coming on of a night that soothes and refreshes; it was the swinging of a great gloom all around the heavens. God hung it. As when there is a dead one in the house you bow the shutters or turn the lattice, so God in the afternoon shut the windows of the world. As it is appropriate to throw a black pall upon the coffin as it passes along, so it was appropriate that everything should be sombre that day as the great hearse of the earth rolled on, bearing the corpse of the King.

A man's last hours are ordinarily kept sacred. However you may have hated or caricatured a man, when you hear he is dying silence puts its hand on your lips, and you would have a loathing for the man who could stand by a death-bed making faces and scoffing. But cannot be left alone. What! pursuing him yet after so long a pursuit? You have been drinking His tears, do you want to drink His blood? They came up closely, so that, notwithstanding the darkness, they can glut their revenge with the contortions of His countenance. They examine His feet. They want to feel for themselves whether those feet are really spiked. They put out their hands and touch the spikes, and bring them back wet with blood, and wipe them on their garments.

Women stand there and weep, but can do no good. It is no place for tender-hearted women. It wants a heart that crime has turned into granite. The waves of man's hatred and of hell's vengeance dash up against the mangled feet, and the hands of sin and pain and torture clutch for His holy heart. Had He not been thoroughly fastened to the cross they would have torn Him down and trampled Him with both feet. How the cavalry horses arched their necks, and champed their bits, and reared and snuffed at the blood. Had a Roman officer called out for a light his voice would not have been heard in the tumult; but louder than the clash of the spears, and the wailing of womanhood, and the neighing of the chargers, and the bellowing of the crucifiers, crashing through, loud, clear, overwhelming, terrific. It is the groan of the dying Son of God. Look! What a scene! Look, oh world, at what you have done! I lift the covering from that maltreated Christ to let you count the wounds and estimate the cost. Oh, when the nails went through Christ's right hand and Christ's left hand—that bought both your hands with all their power to work and lift and write. When the nail went through Christ's right foot and Christ's left foot—that bought your feet, with all their power to walk, or run, or climb. When the thorn went into Christ's temple—that bought your brain with all its power to think and plan. When the spear cleft Christ's side—that bought your heart with all its power to love and repent and pray. Oh, sinner, come back!

There Comes a Voice

If a man is in no pain, if he is prospered, if he is well, and he asks you to come, you take your time and you say: "I can't come now. I'll come after a while. There is no haste." But if he is in want and trouble you say: "I must go right away. I must go now." To-day Jesus stretches out before you two wounded hands, and He begs you to come. Go and you live. Stay away and you die. Oh, that to Him who bought us, we might give all our time, and all our prayers, and all our successes! He is so fair, He is so loving, He is so sympathizing, He is so good, I wish we could put our arms around His neck and say: "Thine, Lord, will I be forever."

When the Atlantic Cable was Lost

in 1865, do you remember that the Great Eastern and the Medway and the Albany went out to find it? Thirty times they sank the grapnel two and a half miles deep in the water. After awhile they found the cable and brought it to the surface. No sooner had it been brought to the surface than they lifted a shout of exultation, but the cable slipped back again into the water and was lost. Then for two weeks more they swept the sea with the grappling hooks, and at last they found the cable and they brought it up in silence. They fastened it this time. Then with great excitement they took one end of the cable to the electricians' room to see if there were really any life in it, and when they saw a spark and knew that a message could be sent, then every hat was lifted, and the rockets flew, and the guns sounded until all the vessels on the expedition knew the work was done, and the continents were lashed together. Well, my friends, Sabbath after Sabbath, we have come searching down for your soul. We have swept the sea with the grappling hook of Christ's Gospel. Again and again we have thought you were at the surface, and began to rejoice over your redemption; but at the moment of our gladness you sank back again into the world and back again into sin.

To-day we come with this Gospel searching for your soul. We apply the cross of Christ first to see whether there is any life left in you, while all around the people stand, looking to see whether the work will be done, and the angels of God bend down and witness, and oh, if now we could see only one spark of love and hope and faith, we would send up a shout that would be heard on the battlements of heaven, and two worlds would keep jubilee because communication is open between Christ and the soul, and your nature that has been sunken in sin has been lifted into the light and the joy of the Gospel!

YEAR-DAY FULFILMENT OF DANIEL AND REVELATION IN 2595 YEARS,

i. e. 2520 years—the "seven times" (or 7 × 360 year-days) in Daniel iv. 16 and 75 years (or 1335 minus 1260 year-days.—Daniel xii. 7–12).

B.C. 695 665 635 605 575 545 515 485 455 425 395 365 — 1st Time of 360 Years.
335 305 275 245 215 185 155 125 95 65 35 5 — 2d Time of 360 Years.
A.D. 55 85 115 145 175 205 235 265 295 325 355 — 3d Time of 360 Years.
385 415 445 475 505 535 565 595 625 655 685 715 — 4th Time of 360 Years.
745 775 805 835 865 895 925 955 985 1015 1045 1075 — 5th Time of 360 Years.
1105 1135 1165 1195 1225 1255 1285 1315 1345 1375 1405 1435 — 6th Time of 360 Years.
1465 1495 1525 1555 1585 1615 1645 1675 1705 1735 1765 1795 — 7th Time of 360 Years.
1825 TO 1900 — 75 Years.

The 2520 Years, i. e., the "seven times," or years of 360 year-days each (Levit. xxvi. 28; Daniel iv. 16), measure the duration of the Jewish nation's chastisement by the predominance of the four successive Gentile Empires of Babylon, Medo Persia, Greece and Rome—the four wild beasts and four parts of the prophetic Image (Daniel ii. 37–45, vii.)—and have a primary and secondary fulfilment;—(1.) About 695 B.C. after Hoshea's reign the ten tribes of Israel were carried captive into Assyria, 2 Kings xvii. 23; and about A.D. 1825 the European revolutionary epoch ended which paved the way for the restoration of the Jews and the downfall of the Gentile Powers. (2.) From 620 B.C. in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar's father, we may date the full establishment of the Empire of Babylon and the captivity of the two tribes of Judah, and thus the full Jewish restoration and end of the 4th Gentile Empire should be about A.D. 1900.

The 2300 Years (Daniel viii. 14) began in 445 B. C. (Artaxerxes' 20th year), with the decree for Nehemiah to restore Jerusalem and its temple (Nehem. ii.), and ended in 1855–6, when religious liberty was decreed in Turkey by the Treaty ending the Crimean war, and the Jews began to return to Palestine.

The 490 Years, or 70 Weeks of years (Daniel ix. 24–6), commenced about 445 B.C., along with the 2300 years. There were 69 weeks or 483 years "unto Messiah the Prince," when Messiah entered Jerusalem as a Royal Prince (Matt. xxi. 5) about A.D. 36–8, after which Messiah was cut off. There will also be a future literal-day fulfilment of the 69 weeks as 483 days from a future decree "unto Messiah's" Second Advent. (The 70th week of seven years will begin 7 years before this dispensation ends, by (ver. 26) "the Prince that shall come" (a Napoleon) making a seven-years' Covenant with the Jews—Dan. ix. 27).

The ASCENSION of the Man-child (Rev. xii. 5) in its year-day fulfilment was the Ascension of Christ about A.D. 36–8 whom the Dragon had sought to devour (Matthew ii. 16), and who (with His saints, Rev. ii. 27) is to rule all nations with a rod of iron (Rev. xix. 15; Psalm ii. 9).

Seal 1 (A.D. 38 to 323). The Christian Church in its primitive zeal and purity (Rev. vi. 1, 2).
Trumpet 1 (250 to 365). Northern hailstorm of Gothic invasions upon Roman Empire (Rev. viii. 7).
Satan's downfall (Rev. xii. 9) had its year-day fulfilment in downfall of Paganism in 323.
Seal 2 (323 to 565) Discord and Corruption in the visible Church after it was nationalized.
Trumpet 2 (365 to 412) Renewed barbarian irruptions, and the sack of Rome (Rev. viii. 8).
Trumpet 3 (412 to 476) Poisoning of channels of instruction by heretical teachers (Rev. viii. 10).
Trumpet 4 (476 to 612) Extinction of Western Emperorship, 476, or eclipse of Eastern Empire.

The 1260 and 1290 and 1335 Years begin in midst of 2520 years.—Daniel xii. 7, 11, 12.

Seal 3. Spiritual famine and corruption of Church—565 to 1073.

Trumpet 5 begins in 612 with Mahommed's preaching. This Saracen Woe, or Mahommedan wars of conquest, lasted twice 5 prophetic months (Rev. ix. 5–10), or 300 years from 637 to 937.

Trumpet 6 began about 1064, when the Turks crossed the Euphrates. This Turkish Woe continued twice a year & month & day (Rev. ix. 15), or 792 years, until 1855–56, reaching its height in 1460.

Seal 4. Spiritual desolation of Church from 1073 to 1438 during the hottest Papal persecution (Rev. vi. 7, 8).

Seal 5 (1438 to 1793). The Martyrs, under the altar in heaven, cry for vengeance.

The Papal and Mahommedan Antichrists during 1260 years (Dan. vii. 25; xii. 7; Rev. xi. 2, 3; xii. 6; xiii. 5) prefigure the Personal Antichrist (a Napoleon) during the final 1260 literal days. The Pope's chief power lasted 1260 years, from 529-65, when Justinian made him Head of all the Churches, until 1789-1825, when his temporal power was greatly shaken by European Revolutions. Mahommedanism's power lasts 1260 years, from 630–37 to 1890–97.

Revelation x. 6 describes Luther's Reformation from Popery about 1517–45, at which period the Angel declares "there will be a time, i. e. (360 year days), no longer," i.e., there will not be so long a period as 360 years until the End comes.

The 7th Head of the Wild Beast (Rev. xvii. 10, 11) denotes the Napoleon dynasty, "wounded to death" at Waterloo and Sedan, but yet to be "healed of its deadly wound." The Greek letters of the inscriptive dative, *N*50, *α*1, *π*80, *ο*70, *λ*30, *ε*5, *ο*70, *ν*50, *τ*300, *ι*10 (Napoleonti), amount to the number 666 (Rev. xiii. 3, 18).

The two Testaments the two symbolic witnesses (Rev. xi.) prophesy in sackcloth (under oppression and affliction) during the 1260 years of Papal and Mahommedan dominancy. They were openly destroyed for a brief season at the French Revolution, the symbolic "great earthquake" (Rev. xi. 13; vi. 12).

Seal 6 (1793 to 1895) opens with French Revolution. Then 144,000 watchful Christians sealed (Rev. vi.).

Primary termination of the 2520 yrs. and 1260 yrs. (7 times and 3½ times.)

The Seven Vials (Rev. xvi.) began in 1790. The 1st caused the outbreak of anarchy and atheism in Catholic France. The 2d (1793–4) caused terrific bloodshed during the Reign of Terror. The 3d (1795) corrupted the channels of education. The 4th (1802–15) made the despotic Bonaparte a scourge to the nations. The 5th (1815) brought upon France defeat and disappointment. The 6th (1825 to about 1895–6) began to destroy the Turkish Empire, and will end with the FIRST ASCENSION of 144,000 Christians (1 Thess. iv.; Rev. iii. 10; xiv. 4), about 2 years and a fortnight after the Seven-years' Covenant between the Napoleonic Antichrist and the Jews. The 7th consists of the 3½ years' Great Tribulation, ending with the SECOND ASCENSION about 7 years and 2½ months after the Covenant (Matt. xxiv. 31), and is simultaneous with 7th Trumpet and 7th Seal. Then the Battle of Armageddon will be fought, the unrepentant are slain, Christ descends and the Millennium of 1000 years begins (Rev. xix., xx.).

FUTURE LITERAL-DAY FULFILMENT OF DANIEL & REVELATION IN 2595 DAYS

during the Final Seven Years, Daniel ix. 27 (or 2520 days), and 75 days (or 1335 minus 1260 days). Daniel xii. 7, 12.

The exact calendar dates of these seven years and of each month in these years can be written down here opposite each year and month as soon as Napoleon (then a King in or near Syria) shall make his seven-years' covenant with the Jews, for the commencement of his covenant seven years will be the commencement of these seven years (probably sometime about 1893).

FIRST YEAR. SECOND YEAR. THIRD YEAR. FOURTH YEAR. FIFTH YEAR. SIXTH YEAR. SEVENTH YEAR. 75 DAYS. (1335—1260.)

The 2520 days, i. e., the seven years of Daniel's last week of years (Dan. ix. 27) will begin with a SEVEN YEARS' COVENANT between "the Prince that shall come" (a Napoleon who will afterwards become Antichrist) and many Jews (Dan. ix. 26, 27; xi. 22, 23) and will end with Christ's descent after 75 days more upon Mt. Olivet at Armageddon (Zech. xiv. 4; Rev. xix. 19). In Prophecy a month contains 30 days, and a year 12 months, or 360 days (Rev. xii. 6, 14; xiii. 5). Before these 7 years Cæsar's Roman Empire will have become divided into exactly 10 allied kingdoms, Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Syria, Egypt, and Bulgaria, ruled by 10 Sovereigns (the 10 horns of Dan. vii. 24), and then the Antichrist Napoleon, an 11th little Sovereign, will have arisen and become King of Syria. The Covenant will cause great sensation and wide-spread preaching of the Second Advent midnight cry (Matt. xxv. 6), and agitation and controversy among Christians (Rev. xii. 2).

The 2300 days (Dan. viii. 14), ie., 6 years, 4 months, and 20 days, begin with the restoration of the sacrifices in a rebuilt temple at Jerusalem between 8 and 10 months after the Covenant, and end with the cleansing of the sanctuary at the end of the 1290 days.

In about 1 or 2 years after the Covenant, Napoleon is to conquer the King of the South (Egypt), but in a second later expedition is to be turned back by the ships of Kittim. In a third attack, he will overrun Egypt towards the midst of these seven years (Dan. xi. 25 to 42).

ASCENSION of the Man-child or translated body of 144,000 Watchful Christians at Christ's Advent in the air, and resurrection of the righteous, about 2 years and from 1 to 3 weeks after the Covenant (Revelation xii. 5; xiv. 1–5; iii. 10; Matthew xxv. 10; 1 Thess. iv. 16).

Seal 1.—Great Revival next ten months among Christians on earth and new converts. Three messages preached by them and probably by persons from heaven (Revelation vi. 2; xiv. 6–11).

Trumpet 1. Storms of hail, blood and fire burning up all grass in final 4 months of 3d year. Satan's downfall personally to this earth issues in the 3½ years' Persecution (Rev. xii. 7–13).

Seal 2.—Universal sanguinary warfare for 7 months before midst of 7 years (Rev. vi. 4).

Trumpet 2.—3d of sea becomes blood, 3d of fish and ships perish in months 1 and 2 of year 4.

Trumpet 3.—3d of fresh waters become bitter and kill many in months 3 and 4 of year 4.

Trumpet 4.—Literal eclipse of third part of sun, moon and stars in months 5 or 6 of year 4. (Rev. viii.)

The 1260, 1290 & 1335 days begin in midst of week of 7 years.—Dan. xii. 7–12, &c.

Seal 3.—A period of dreadful famine for 18 months from midst of fourth year.

Trumpet 5 begins about the end of the 8th month of 4th year, when the bottomless pit will be opened and emit a great smoke. The Woe of literal locusts for 5 months begins about one month later (Rev. ix).

Trumpet 6 introduces the woe of destroying horsemen, who slay the 3d part of men during a year and month from beginning of 12th month of 6th year.—(Rev. ix).

Seal 4. A period of great mortality & pestilence, and persecution, during all 6th year.

Seal 5. During all 7th year. More martyrs slain. A great Revival begins in 3d mo. of 7th year (Rev x.).

On the 1st day of 7th month of 4th year, Napoleon, having become Emperor of the Ten Kingdoms and their 10 new kings elected by universal suffrage, has his image the abomination of desolation (Matt. xxiv. 15; Dan. xi. 31; Rev. xiii. 15; xvii. 12, 13; 2 Thess. ii. 4) set up in the Jewish Temple. Then ensues the 3½ years of GREAT TRIBULATION and PERSECUTION (Dan. vii. 25; xii. 7; ix. 27; Rev. xi. 2, 3; xii. 6, 14; xiii. 5; Matt. xxiv. 15, 21; Mark xiii. 19; Dan. xii. 1), in which Napoleon, healed both of his dynastic and personal "deadly wound," will exercise "power over all nations, and all the ungodly upon the earth shall worship him," and he shall "make war with the saints and overcome them for 42 months" (Rev. xiii. 1–8). Atheism, idolatry and massacre will reign supreme, and Christendom become like a hell. Tens of thousands of Christians will be beheaded for refusing to worship Napoleon's image or receive his mark, which the Romish Church and Pontiff—the two-horned figure, will everywhere enforce (Revelation xiii. 11–18; xx. 4) especially throughout the ten kingdoms—Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Syria, Egypt and Bulgaria. After the 3½ years Napoleon and the False Prophet perish at Armageddon (Zech. xiv.; Rev. xix.).

Two fire-breathing witnesses, Elijah (Mal. iv.) and another prophet, visit the earth and preach, clothed in sackcloth, during this 3½ yrs. (Rev. xi.). At its end they will be killed, and after lying dead for 3½ days raised up & ascend to heaven.

Seal 6 begins about end of 7 years. Great earthquake and darkness. Then 144,000 Jews sealed.

End of the 7 yrs., Dan. ix. 27, and 3 yrs., Dan. vii. 25, xii 7; Rev. xi. 2, 3, xii., xiii.

Of the Seven Vials (Rev. xvi.) the first five will be fulfilled during final month of these covenant 7 years. The 1st torments Napoleon's worshippers with grievous sores. The 2d turns all salt water into blood. The 3d turns all fresh water into blood. The 4th (10th to 22d day) makes the sun scorch men with fire. The 5th (22d day) covers France with darkness. The 6th (30th day of final month) begins to dry up the literal Euphrates. The 7th (1332d day) brings the last crushing strokes of judgment. The Second Ascension of living Saints (Matt. xxiv. 31; Rev. vii. 9; xiv. 16), including 144,000 Jews, occurs (with the 7th Trumpet and 7th Seal) 4 or 5 days before the Lord descends, about the 1335th day, on Olivet, at Battle of Armageddon (Zech. xiv.). The ungodly are then slain, the Jews and heathen converted, and Millennium of 1000 years begins (Rev. xix., xx.).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Veto of the Dependent Pension Bill was sent to Congress on Friday. It has received the almost unanimous approval of the press. Journals opposed to him on personal grounds, and those with few exceptions which are opposed to him on political grounds, as well as those who support him, commend his course. This does not arise from any indisposition to support soldiers and their dependents who are in poverty through personal incapacity to earn a living, when that incapacity results from service in the army during the war, but from the conviction that the bill is so loosely worded that a considerable part of the immense sum of money appropriated by it would go to persons who have no valid claim upon the nation. The President intimates his belief that the bill would effect this, and also that it is really a "service pension" which, if precedents of previous wars are followed, ought not to be passed for ten or twelve years yet. He reminds Congress that 561,576 pensions have been granted since the war, and that 365,763 are still being paid, and that the total amount paid out for the purpose since 1861 is $808,624,811. That the new bill would have involved an outlay far in excess of the five millions estimated is conceded, but the amount would not have been an objection if the people were convinced that it would go to men who deserve it.

The Senate Passed Two Bills Appropriating money for coast defences on February 7th, and they were sent to the House and referred on Mr. Holman's objection to the Appropriation Committee. It is unusual for the Senate to originate an appropriation bill, but in this case there has been so strong a desire manifested in the country for prompt action, and the bills are so sure to be re-modelled in the House, that they passed the Senate without discussion. The bills call for the expenditure of twenty-one millions, of which part is to enable the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to purchase from steel manufacturers rough-turned and tempered steel in forms suitable for heavy ordnance, and part to erect an army gun factory at the Watervliet Arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., and a naval factory at the Washington Navy Yard. This does not imply an apprehension of war, but a desire to afford protection to our harbors and ports, which at present lie at the mercy of even a small power possessing a navy.

The House Bill of Indemnity to the Chinese for the Rock Springs, Wyoming, outrages in September, 1885, was finally accepted by the Senate on Thursday, and sent to the President Mr. Edmunds explicitly told the Senate that it was a better bill than that which was sent to the House. The difference between the two was that the Senate appropriated a sum not to exceed $150,000 as compensation to the Chinese who suffered by mob violence, the amount to be determined by a commission appointed by the President; while the House adopted the simple course of accepting the moderate estimate of the losses fixed by the Chinese Government, and appropriating the exact sum to be distributed among the sufferers or their representatives at the discretion of the Chinese Government. The sum is $147,748.74. Congress is to be congratulated on doing an act of justice, though it would have been more to its credit if it had not taken a year and a half to do it.

The Great Strike of 'Longshoremen and Coal handlers in New York came practically to an end on Friday. A few companies still have difficulties with their men, and the Old Dominion Company is permanently boycotted, but the deadlock of business on the water-front has been broken. The crisis of the struggle came when an effort was made by the Knights of Labor to add the engineers, who work stationary engines, and the brewers to the number of men on strike. That step would have affected seventy-five thousand persons, and have caused inconvenience in every house where there is an elevator, and suspension of every business to which steam-power is indispensable. Before deciding on their course a committee of the engineers waited on Mr. Corbin, of the Philadelphia and Reading Company, to endeavor to effect a settlement. Ultimately, the conference assumed the character of an arbitration Mr. Corbin representing the companies, and the engineers representing the Knights of Labor. On Friday an agreement was reached acceptable to the men, and they were requested to return to work. Mr. Corbin agrees to pay the old rate of twenty-two and a half cents instead of the reduced rate of twenty. The Knights claim to have won the victory, but it is probable that many of them will fail to regain their old places at present, and there is still a possibility of the strike, though formally "declared off," being renewed in part.

The Pope's Intervention in the German Electoral struggle is causing general surprise in Germany, and much indignation in France. He has cast in his lot with his old enemy, Prince Bismarck, and will throw the whole weight of his influence in the constituencies in favor of the candidates pledged to vote for Prince Bismarck's policy. When contrasted with his recent policy in German affairs and his attitude on the Irish question, the Pope's action seems inexplicable. It is suspected that Bismarck has made a bargain with him by which the price of the Pope's support is to be paid in further concessions in the May laws.

The Impending Catastrophe is thus Discoursed upon by the New Yorker Staats Zeitung of February 5th: "Boulanger is master of the situation in France. Germany cannot now accord time to either the Minister of War, Boulanger, or to the Minister of Marine, Aube, who is striving with the same activity to accomplish the same design, nor permit them to carry these plans into execution, if she does not wish to behold France in a condition of absolute superiority to herself. If Boulanger's designs should at no distant day receive the approval of the Chamber, as, according to Freycinet's declarations, can no longer be questioned, before the close of the year 1887, France will possess an army increased at a time of peace to five hundred and forty-five thousand men. With an expenditure of two hundred millions of francs in fortifications, melinite granades, and a better repeating-rifle added to this, with an expenditure of four hundred millions of francs, Aube will have organized a fleet of cruisers and torpedo boats of such strength and efficiency, and in such numbers, as England herself does not possess. But the question of the repeating-arm has undoubtedly the chief importance, while in this the improvement has made the greatest progress, and is most visible. Germany, it is true, has got ready the materials for a repeating-rifle. From considerations of economy, however, and in order to utilize a very considerable stock of old rifle-barrels, she has retained the old calibre of eleven millimetres. The new French repeating-arm, on the other hand, possesses not only a longer range, but a more dangerous reach, while it has a bore of scarcely eight millimetres; the latter is considered of very material influence in a weapon intended for rapid discharge, by reason of the circumference of the cartridges carried by the men. If Germany does not obtain a repeating-arm of equal value, in order not to lose wholly the advantage of superior discipline and efficiency in her soldiery, her officers, and horses, she must resolve upon incurring a sacrifice of life in comparison with which her last military experiences were mere child's play. There are abundant reasons for Germany to come to a decision before France is in a position to carry out the colossal designs of Boulanger and Aube. While one may shudder at the thought of the appalling results of the impending catastrophe, it is far better, in any event and as soon as possible, to familiarize one's self with the thought." [It is remarkable that a German paper should thus foresee a danger of Germany's defeat.]

Irish Affairs Occupied the Attention of the British Parliament during nearly the whole of last week. It is the custom of the House of Commons to present an address to the Queen in reply to her speech delivered at the opening of Parliament. Mr. Parnell on Monday proposed to incorporate in the address these words: "The relations between the owners and the occupiers of land in Ireland have not been seriously disturbed in the cases of those who granted to their tenants such abatements as were demanded by the prices of agricultural and pastoral produce. The remedy for the crisis in Irish agrarian affairs will be found, not in an increased stringency of criminal procedure, or in the pursuit of such novel, doubtful, and unconstitutional measures as those recently taken by Her Majesty's government, but in such reform of the law and system of government as will satisfy the needs and secure the confidence of the Irish people." His proposal was opposed by the Conservatives and their Liberal allies, and after a spirited debate it was rejected on Friday by a majority of 106, the vote being 352 to 246. The Conservative government is now regarded as committed to coercion, and there are grave fears of serious trouble ahead.

Two Full-page Parallel Diagrams are Printed opposite each other on pages 102 and 103 of this number. That on the left shows the year-day fulfilment of the principal prophecies of Daniel and Revelation within the final 2595 years, especially in connection with the 1260 years of the Papal Antichrist in the Western Roman Empire and of the Mohammedan Antichrist in the Eastern Roman Empire. The diagram on the right exhibits the Literal-Day fulfilment of most of the same prophecies within the future and final 2595 days especially in connection with the future 1260 days of the personal infidel Antichrist's power over both the Western and Eastern Roman Empire at the end of this dispensation. The best modern students of prophecy now admit these two fulfilments—year-day and literal-day—of the chronological dates and of the seals, trumpets and vials. The two diagrams are prepared by the Rev. M. Baxter, and are also printed in his "Coming Wars."

The Rev. M. Baxter had Good Audiences in Cooper Union last Sunday at his three services. The room was hung with a map of the Roman Empire and nineteen large oil paintings of scenes described in prophecy. One is a copy of Martin's vivid and grandly realistic painting of "The Day of His Wrath." Another is a picture of Nebuchadnezzar's image symbolizing the world-empires of Daniel 2 : 31–45; a third is a beautiful picture of millennial peace (Isa. 11 : 6–9), etc., etc. The congregations listened with close attention to Mr. Baxter's expositions, and at the close, when an opportunity was given for questions, several persons rose and mentioned difficulties which they wished to have explained, and stated various points on which they held views at variance with the preacher. His meetings next Sunday will probably be in a hall in Harlem.

The Gospel Union (or Gospel Army, as it has been styled in some places), of which the Rev. M. Baxter is President, has now mission stations in America in the following cities: Philadelphia, Pa.; Warsaw and Peru, Ind.; St. Paul, Minn.; Omaha and Lincoln, Neb.; Orangeville and Ottawa and St. Andrew, N. B.; and Charlottetown, P. E. I., in the Dominion of Canada, besides more than seventy mission stations in Britain. Evangelistic Gospel meetings are held at these stations generally every week evening and Sundays in halls rented permanently by evangelists, and many sinners are being converted by this Gospel work. Contributions, which are urgently needed for carrying on and extending the movement, should be sent to Rev. M. Baxter, 63 Bible House, New York, N. Y. Received with thanks $2 from G. L. Packard.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers in the South with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were received last week to the amount of $20.50. They were as follows: From Philadelphia, Pa., $4; Des Moines, Iowa, $5; Riverside, Ill., $3; Jacksonville, Fla., $2; Rock City, Ill., $1; Manitou Springs, $2.50; Lockport, N. A Novel Method of Defence for a Ship is that with which Bishop Taylor's new steamer is to be equipped. It is nothing but a hose and nozzle for throwing a stream of water sufficient to repel a fleet of attacking canoes, wetting down the enemy instead of killing them. It is most devoutly to be hoped that this application of Christian principles to warfare will prove a success.

Work on the Presbyterian Churches of Charleston, S. C., which were injured by the earthquake has been commenced. The Restoration Fund, for which Dr. Junkins has labored with indefatigable energy, now amounts to $22,000. The architects and contractors have discovered that the First Church, which was believed to be so injured as to necessitate its being rebuilt from the foundations, can be restored. The congregation are delighted at being able to save their historic old building. The saving to the Repair Fund will be considerable. Work is commenced on the First and Second churches, and will soon be on Westminster Church.

A Notable Instance of Divine Healing is Reported by the Pittsburg Despatch. It occurred, says that journal, in the Stark County Infirmary, near Canton. Several years ago the daughter of a widow, Mrs. Ann Ammerman, of Alliance, was admitted to that institution, being an invalid and in destitute circumstances. Mrs. Ammerman entered the infirmary with her daughter, and served faithfully as an attendant to her, which service was deemed equivalent for the keeping of both. Medical skill proved of no avail for the girl, and her gradual dissolution was expected. Hearing about her case, a young lady of Canton, Miss Ella Holm, who had been cured of a serious injury by prayer some time ago, began, with other believers in the treatment, to pray for Miss Ammerman. The result of this faith treatment, it is claimed, has so far cured Miss Ammerman that from being a bed-fast invalid, scarcely able to move, she to-day can walk about her room.

A Detective Policeman of Baltimore, Md., Related his remarkable experience on Sunday, February 6th, at a meeting in Washington, D. C. He said he had been a very wicked man; he had lead a harum-scarum life, and taken "no stock in Christianity." On the 26th of March, 1879, he went after a man into the Maryland Institute, where Mr. Moody was preaching. He had been detailed to watch for pickpockets in that great throng. There he met an old barkeeper, who said, "I've sold my old saloon, and I'm now a doorkeeper here." Just then some friends came up and carried him to a seat. A hymn-book was put into his hand, and soon he began to hum with the hymn time. Then, when Mr. Moody explained the simple tidings of the Gospel, he accepted the promises of the Gospel and became a Christian. The devil said as plain as could be, "It is impossible for you to live a Christian life and be a detective." He thought, well, if I can't be a detective, I can go back on the street cars or go to laying brick again. Then he said, "Now, Mr. Devil, you sha'n't fool me. I'm going to take a stand." He then narrated how he was received at the City Hall. The chief had his head against the mantel, and the men all stood around. He said as soon as he went in, "Boys, I've made up my mind to lead a new life. I have given my heart to God in the Maryland Institute. I ask you not to make fun of me." And they did not make fun of him, but gave him their best wishes. The devil followed him to his home, and urged him not to tell his family, but he stood right in the middle of the floor and told them he had given his heart to God, and his wife followed his example. He had proved the devil to be a liar when he said that no one could be at the same time a detective and a Christian, for he was still a detective, and for eight years he had been a Christian, and he now had the confidence of his chiefs and the good-will of his associates.

A Thirty-three Years' Imprisonment Has been ended by a pardon in Michigan. In 1854 a man in Stockbridge, Mich., who killed another, was sentenced to State prison for life. The confession made recently by one of the witnesses at the trial showed that the crime was not premeditated, and was really manslaughter rather than murder. The prisoner, therefore, received a pardon from Governor Alger. He states that during the first eight years, from 1854 to 1862, he was kept for long periods in solitary confinement, and always the first three years with a nine-pound weight around his leg. After that he had better usage, and looking back at it now he says that he was tolerably well treated, being known as an exemplary prisoner. Now that he has recovered his liberty he finds that his family, wife, sons, and daughter are all dead. His property is gone, and the world is so changed and his spirits so broken that he has neither strength nor ambition to struggle for a livelihood. He is not so happy as he was when in prison. It is not so with Satan's captives. When Christ releases them their joy and happiness cannot be marred by outward circumstances, and an eternity of bliss is before them (Isa. 61 : 1-3).

A Ship was in the Possession of Scorpions and centipedes for two days during a recent voyage from Port au Prince to Philadelphia. The captain of the schooner Harvey, which arrived in Philadelphia on February 8th laden with logwood and cedar, says that when the vessel had been but a few days out a large number of centipedes and scorpions, apparently many thousands of the most poisonous kind, were discovered crawling about on the deck. The crew, all of whom were negroes, became terror-stricken, and climbed up into the rigging and refused to come down when commanded by the captain. They stayed aloft for two days, only coming down to get something to eat, and then to hasten back. A large Newfoundland dog which remained on deck was bitten by the venomous creatures and died in great agony. After the reptiles had held full sway over the vessel for two days a gale came up and the heavy seas which washed over the vessel swept them into the sea. Those that were not swept overboard died from the cold. It is thought that the reptiles got aboard the vessel in the cargo, which was much decayed. If any man had volunteered to go down and rid the ship of its venomous invaders, the crew would have blessed him as a deliverer; but when this world was in a worse state than this ship, and Christ came and gave His life to rescue it, He was hated and persecuted, betrayed and crucified (Acts 3 : 13-15).

A Two Hundred Dollar Casket for a Parrot was ordered from an undertaker last week in New York. The order came from a widow, who said it was her intention to keep the casket in her parlor until such time as she herself should die, when mistress and parrot were to be placed in a common grave. The parrot was then being embalmed, and was of the common green variety. "Make it as good as money can buy," was the direction of the eccentric old lady, and the order was duly forwarded to the Rochester factory, where General Grant's coffin was made. It is to be of the choicest rosewood, mounted with solid silver trimmings and ornaments, while, within, the lining will be of heavy tufted pink satin of the richest variety. A heavy plate-glass top will permit the inspection of the dead bird, and a solid cover will screw on to protect the glass panel when the final burial takes place. The reason for this extraordinary expenditure was explained by the widow. She said that many years ago in India the parrot saved the life of her husband by giving the alarm when some natives were creeping to his bedside to murder him as he lay asleep. The bird was petted ever afterward, and is now to have costly obsequies. Having saved a life, no expenditure is thought too great as an evidence of gratitude. Christian men are not so grateful, though they have far more reason. Christ's cause would not lack funds nor Christ's poor lack food and clothing if believers, remembering that they owe eternal life to Him, showed their gratitude with their money (1 John 3 : 16, 17).

The Heiress of a Great Estate Starving in a garret is a romantic report published by the Chicago Tribune. It states that the Countess Von Steinman, a noble widowed lady of Saxony, Germany, has been searching for years for her son or his heirs, and the search has ended at Detroit, Mich. A quarter of a century ago a young student in the university at Berlin became enamored by the daughter of a poor tradesman, and married her. He was the eldest son of Count Von Steinman, and heir to a fine estate and millions of dollars. After his marriage he went to his father and told him what he had done. The old Count having previously, with immense effort, succeeded in arranging for a marriage between his son and a noble lady of Dresden, was exasperated by the disclosure, and drove his son away with a curse. He never forgave him, but being dead now, his widow has been seeking her son, whom she tenderly loved. The son died twelve years ago in Milwaukee, Wis., and his wife is dead also, but their daughter has been found in Detroit in abject poverty, living in an unfurnished garret, in want of the commonest necessaries of life. The change in her lot will be a very wonderful one, but a still greater change is occurring daily all around us. Christian men and women poor in this world's goods and despised in society in dying go to inherit mansions prepared for them in heaven (James 2 : 5).

BRIEF NOTES.

MAJOR COLE is holding united revival services in Sedalia, Mo. Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, are all engaged in the work, and the city is stirred to its centre and all classes are affected. The Ministerial Alliance reports over thirteen hundred accessions to church fellowship since Major Cole began work in the city.

Mr. Charles B. Martin, of Weatherford, Tex., is making an effort to influence the people of his town for good. He has opened a reading-room, established the nucleus of a Sunday-school, and is trying to organize a temperance society. Persons having religious or temperance journals to give away would materially assist him in his work by mailing them to him.

Rev. Dr. Munhall commenced services yesterday, which will be continued for ten days, in the rooms of the Y.M.C.A. of Brooklyn. His mission at Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle has been successful beyond precedent. He is anxious now to speak to the young people of the city, who, as Dr. Munhall perceives, are now surrounded by terrible temptations from which Brooklyn has until recently been comparatively free.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond is holding services for children in the Washington Heights M. E. Church, N. Y. On Sunday the building was crowded with a juvenile congregation. His theme was the sacrifice of Christ and the ingratitude of the world. He pictured the crucifixion of Christ vividly, and showed the children a crown of thorns, which he said he had brought from Jerusalem.

Rev. George C. Needham's labors in Cleveland, Ohio, are being signally blessed. The Cleveland News and Herald says that the places in which he and Mrs. Needham hold their meetings are crowded to suffocation. On February 6th four services were held. In the morning Mr. Needham preached before a large audience in Music Hall, in the afternoon he was at the Friendly Inn and the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, and in the evening he delivered another eloquent sermon at Music Hall.

Rev. John Dooly's work at the Broome Street Tabernacle, New York, is becoming increasingly useful among working people and those who are habitually non-churchgoers. Mr. Dooly has a rare capacity for organization and setting people to work. His society of "King's Daughters" is now busily engaged in getting up libraries for Sunday-schools in the Far West and South. Any person having books suitable for the purpose will do good by presenting them to the society for distribution.

MIGHT HAVE BEEN, OR MAY BE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And some of them said, Could not this man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died?"—JOHN 11 : 37.

Tears Drawn by Love—The Argument of the Bystanders—I. A Vain Argument—Grief Increased by Self-Reproach—Gets no Explanation—Inconsistent with a Child-like Spirit—II. A Vile Argument—A Specious Dilemma—III. A Fair Argument—Making Idols of Physicians—How to Deal with Unsaved Friends—IV. A Full and Faithful Argument—Divine Disinfectants—Putrid Men Savable.

"Jesus wept;" it does not mean that He shed a tear or two, but that His tears flowed freely. Such is to be gathered from the original word. He wept copiously and continuously, till He became the observed of all observers. He was deeply affected, and His tears were the fit expression of His intense emotion.

Love Made Him Weep;

nothing else ever compelled Him to tears. I do not find that all the pains He endured even when scourged or when fastened to the cruel tree, fetched a single tear from Him; but for love's sake "Jesus wept." At first I feel inclined to say "Behold, how He wept!" and then I check myself, and borrowing my language from the bystanders, I cry, "Behold, how he loved Him!" The Jews recognized, even with their unfriendly eyes, that His tears were drawn from Him by love alone. From this Rock of our salvation no rod but that of love could bring forth water-floods.

I should like to begin my sermon with that thought deeply fixed upon our spirits, if we are indeed the people of God—that Jesus loves us—loves us unto tears. Inasmuch as He loved Lazarus when Lazarus was dead and in the tomb, let us herein behold how He loved us when we were dead in trespasses and sins. See how He loves us though, perhaps, our spirits may be dull and dead; and how He will love us even when we come to die. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." He loves us so that He will love us when we die, even as He loved Lazarus at the grave's mouth.

Let us turn away from our preface, which we have found in the context, to look at the text itself. While there were some who thought only of the love of Christ when they beheld His tears, there were others standing by more full of reasoning, who argued, "Could not this Man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died?"

I. First, I see in the text

A Vain Argument.

It is an argument about what might have been if such-and-such a thing had been. It is a very common thing to hear people thus talk: "If so-and-so, then so-and-so." Such talk is always vain, because it leads to no practical result. What was the use of saying, "If Jesus had been here, then Lazarus would not have died," when Lazarus was already dead? The thing is done, and cannot be undone; what is the use of asking about what once might have been but now cannot be? Yet have I seen strange sorrows wrung out of these suppositions. Perhaps the bitterest griefs that men know come not from facts, but from things which might have been, as they imagine. The sisters of Lazarus did this. Each said, "Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died."

In a more unbelieving way the Jews did it, and said, "Could not this Man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died?" Yes, and so you say, "Now, if I had gone to so-and-so, this would not have happened; and then the other might have happened; and a third thing probably would have occurred; and then how different it would have been from what it is now!" You blame yourself for steps which were not only innocent, but wise and right; but now that you see the consequences of them, you begin to imagine that they were not innocent, and not wise, and not right, and you fret to think that you took such steps.

I have known some go a great deal further than vainly accusing themselves; they have even accused God. They say, "Why was moral evil admitted into the world? Why were men and women constituted as they are? Could not God, who is omnipotent, have so arranged things that there should have been no sin and no sorrow?" What we get into when once we begin arguing over those points, and conjecturing what might have been under other circumstances! You see, dear friends, these things will not be, and cannot be; and, therefore, what is the good of our worrying over what is not, and cannot be? I will plough, but if there be no field, excuse me. I shall not plough the sea, or the mist. I will get to work on anything that is practical, but I will not break my heart over fancies

I call this a vain argument, in the next place, because, even though we raise the question about what might have been, and we push it until we begin to think that it ought to have been, still unbelief will never get an explanation of it from the Lord. In the chapter there is no explanation given to the Jews of why Jesus, being able to open the eyes of the blind man, and able to keep this person from dying, yet did not keep him from dying. An explanation was given by the Lord to His disciples by His assurance that it was for the glory of God. That explanation you will get. You have received it already. If you are God's child, and He has denied to you what you think He might as well have given you, if He has permitted you to suffer under a calamity which you think He might have averted, He will give you no other explanation than this which He gives you now without any pressure at all—namely, that it is for His glory. If it be for His glory, is it not

For Your Advantage?

If you are not satisfied with that answer, do not expect any other. "Why have I been bereaved of my children?" "Why have I been ill so many years?" "Why did I fail when I hoped to reach wealth?" "Why did I break down in the examination when I might have obtained a degree?" It is an idle piece of business to demand the reasons of unavoidable trials. It is mere dreaming to guess what would have been if such another thing had been. "What thou knowest not now, thou shalt know hereafter;" let that content thee.

Once, again, I call this a vain argument, because it cannot benefit you to pry into this thing which the Lord has hidden from you. You are fostering self-conceit in calling God's providence to your bar. You are practically sitting upon a throne, and making God to be the prisoner at your bar. You are weighing over again what He has already weighed in the scales of wisdom. This will never do. A child-like spirit is infinitely healthier as it is infinitely holier than the spirit of questioning. I shall beg you, therefore, brethren, to forbear from prying into those secret things which belong to God only. Your profit lies in the direction of abstaining from such speculations. Do not talk about what might have been, and should have been, interfering with the good which God has given you by pining after what He has denied. Oh, could you know as He knows, and then love as He loves, you would act as He acts! Believe in Him, and sit still at His feet, and talk no more about what He could have done, or might have done, or what you fancy He should have done, lest evil come of it.

II. Secondly, as I have spoken upon a vain argument, I will now speak of

for I believe these Jews intended a piece of evil argument against the Christ of God. They put it thus: this Man says that He opened the eyes of the blind, and all the people think that He did; but if He did so, why did He not prevent His friend, whom He evidently loved, from dying? Either He has a want of power, which will prove that He did not open the eyes of the blind after all, but that it was an imposture; or else, if He has such power, and does not use it for His friend, He does not love him, and these tears are a mere pretence. He could have saved this man's life, and now He stands here and weeps because he is dead.

Thus the adversary would put the believer in our Lord upon the horns of

A Dilemma.

We are not gored by either horn, for we know a way of escape therefrom. Still you see the drift, and this is often the drift of Satan's arguments. Your brother, your mother, your child, your friend—these are dead. You sent to Jesus, you cried to God, you importuned for the precious life; and yet they are dead. Well, then, there must have been a want of power on the part of God to save life.

You see the drift of the specious reasoning; is it not a vile argument? Let us unveil the falsehood of it. Suppose that Jesus is willing to open the eyes of the blind, and does open them; is He therefore bound to raise this particular dead man? If He does not see fit to do so, does that prove that He has not the power? If He lets Lazarus die, is it proven therefore that He could not have saved his life? May there not be some other reason? Does Omnipotence always exert its power? Does it ever exert all its power? May there not be

Some Great Reason Why

Christ should open the eyes of the blind, and yet should not step in to prevent the death of Lazarus? We can see that there may be many such reasons; but it is easy, when you wish to argue against Christ and the Gospel, to forget a good deal. You can shut your eyes where it is inconvenient to see, and then you can rush on blindly like a mad bull.

On the other hand, if they say, "If Christ can prevent Lazarus dying, and He does not do so, there is a want of love in Him;" is it so? Is that fair argument? It is not true as a matter of fact; nor will it be thought to be true by our faith. It may be infinite love that wounds, that chastens, that afflicts. There is as much love in the Father when He wields the rod as when He gives the kiss; as much love in the Saviour when He permits Lazarus to die as when He raises Lazarus from the grave. Ay and it is possible that the less pleasing deed may be the more greatly charged with love! The greatest blessings come to us in the guise of sorrows. I should not wonder if the death of Lazarus was the passing of Lazarus into a higher state of spiritual life than he had ever enjoyed before. I should think that Lazarus rose into the higher life in the very highest degree; and so it was Christ's love to Lazarus that let Lazarus die, and it was a calumny altogether that he died because Jesus had a want of love toward him. It is Christ's love that has let some of you be ill and poor. It is Christ's love that has suffered you to be despised and down-trodden. It is Christ's love that has let you remain in affliction, because the divine benefit that has come of it is more to your profit than the thing itself could ever be to your loss. So the vile argument may well be driven away, whatever shape it takes in our minds.

III. We shall now proceed very briefly to notice what is

A Very Fair Argument.

If you take the text, and press the malice out of it, it is true. "Could not this Man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died?" Yes, it is true. Jesus Christ, by what He has done, has proved His power to do anything. I need not enlarge upon the point, but I will put it before you. There is not a life which He cannot preserve. You may cry to Him about your sick ones. You are permitted to do so. Even if they are given over by the physician, I counsel you to go to Jesus about them, though it is far better to go to Jesus before you consult the physician. We often make a mistake about the use of medicines by using medicine first. We should first go to the Lord, that we may be guided as to what medicine shall be used, and what means shall be employed, and trust in God to bless the means used for restoration.

We may make idols out of physicians as much as the heathen make idols out of blocks of wood. Medicines are right enough in their place for healing, even as bread is right for nourishment; but as men live not by bread only, so are they not healed by medicine only. Before we eat bread, we ask God's blessing on that bread; let us seek whenever we use them. We are not healed by the physician, but by that God who works according to His own will and pleasure. Let us then believe that the Christ, who has done this and that for other sick folk, can do the same for those whom we bring to Him, and let us leave their cases in His hands.

But take the text spiritually. I want you to believe that Christ can preserve us spiritually from death. Are we forced by our employments into the society of the ungodly? Does Providence call some of you workingmen to toil side by side, or even at the same bench, with infidels? The Lord Jesus can cause that you shall not be injured by them. He can give you spiritual health and strength, even when you seem to be under the most deadly influences. He that opened your eyes, when you were blind, can keep you alive now that you can see.

Beloved, what a mercy it is that we can look back upon Christ's having opened the blind man's eyes, and see the same thing in ourselves! Here is a blind man whose eyes Christ opened. It is yourself. He was and can you not transfer the argument to others? If the Lord Jesus Christ could give you sight, He can give others sight. If He opened your blind eyes, He can open the blind eyes of your children, of your unconverted father, your unsaved brothers, your unsaved sisters. Some seem to have inherited a nature more wild than common; their heart does not appear to be a heart of flesh, but a heart of stone; yet Jesus, who dealt with this strangely blind man—blind from his birth—can deal with those strange sinners, those sinners of a scarlet hue, who develop in their lives more of desperate viciousness than you see in others. Take them to Him, believe on account of them, and be fully convinced that no case is beyond the power of the living Saviour.

For my part, I never can or will despair of the salvation of one of my fellow-creatures now that I am myself saved. I know that there were certain traits in my character, and certain elements in my disposition, which make my conversion to Christ to be more remarkable than that of the conversion of anybody else, and so I shall have hope concerning the most blasphemous, the most obstinate, the most unbelieving. This glorious Man who, in the days of His flesh, opened the eyes of one born blind, which thing had never been known before, can come and deal with the very chief of sinners—ay, with sinners that are dead in sin—with sinners that lie rotting in their lusts, and He can make them to be saints! This is a fair argument.

IV. But, now, lastly, they had never thought of

from the text. All they said was—This Man, who has opened the eyes of one born blind, could have prevented Lazarus from dying. That was fair argument, but it was not full argument, and it never occurred to them to go further, and inquire, "Now that Lazarus is dead, cannot this Man raise him from the dead?" I fear a great deal of our religion is of that kind. But what a mercy it would be if God would give some Christians sixpennyworth of common-sense! Oh, if some people could but believe what I am sure is true—that true religion is sanctified common-sense—that there is about the religion of Jesus Christ that which is just as practical as if our life were to be spent in keeping shop! There is a mathematical truthfulness about our holy faith as well as a lofty, eagle-winged aspiration. So then they should have argued thus: "Jesus Christ, who opened this blind man's eyes, has come to a corpse in its grave, and He is able to make it live."

Friend, is there laid upon your mind at this time some poor sinner who is dead in trespasses and sins? You cannot get at Him. You do not know how to make Him feel or think. There does not seem to be a vital spark anywhere about Him, and you know not how to deal with Him. Believe that the Gospel is meant for such a case as this, and that the living God, in Jesus Christ, by the Holy Spirit, can meet with this clay-cold dead heart.

"Oh, it is worse than that," say you, "it is worse than that! The person I am thinking of is put out of society, and is too corrupt to be spoken with." Yes, I know what you mean. Perhaps you speak of

A Fallen Woman.

We are always more eager to bury the fallen women than the fallen men. A man, of whom we must say with Martha, "By this time he stinketh," may still be tolerated in society; but if it happens to be a woman that sins, they cry, "Bury her out of sight. Roll the stone to the mouth of the tomb. We never speak to her, or mention her." If you have an anxiety on your soul about a person who is thus shut out from society, I want you to believe that Jesus can bring out the buried and corrupt.

"Oh!" say you, "but it is not merely that the person I think of is buried away, but the case is really one which may not be described. He hath been dead four days. He has gone so far that his crime is unmentionable." I know the case. Yet you may mention it before the Lord; in His presence no harm will come of it. I do not read in the Gospel narrative of anybody being distressed by the odor when the sepulchre of Lazarus was opened. When Jesus said, "Take ye away the stone," He knew that He had

ready to hand. He knew what He did. When you seek after gross sinners, prudent people say, "Well, if you go after such people as that, your own character will be injured before long." The Lord will prevent any harm coming from it, for He can speak to the most corrupt sinner, and say, "Live," and he shall live, and then the corruption is no more. Wherefore let us drive out of our minds the notion that any sinner is too far gone for Christ to save him. I used to hear in my youth about a "day of grace," and about persons having passed that day of grace; but I do not believe it. As long as you are in this world I am bidden to preach to you, for the Gospel message is to be proclaimed to every creature, and I dare not draw vain distinctions about a day of grace. If you are so bad in your own esteem that there never lived a worse man or a worse woman out of hell, yet still believe in Jesus Christ. My Lord even as He delighted to bring from the grave the long-dead Lazarus, that he might be received into the bosom of his family, to be the joy of the house, and the glory of Christ.

Loves to Save Great Sinners,

I have not gone too far; I am sure that I have not. Nay, I could not go too far. The shoreless, bottomless love of my great Lord—I wish I had the tongues of men and angels to tell of it. You have not sinned beyond His power to save you. He is a great Saviour, a mighty Saviour, and His precious blood can remove all your death and corruption. When I think of those whom He has saved, I argue, "Could not my Lord Jesus, who opened the eyes of the blind, make these dead sinners live?"

I will tell you something else. If you yourself to-night are that dead sinner, I say to you, in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, "Thus saith the Lord, believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." "I cannot," says one, "I am dead." I know that you are, but if the Lord speaks to you, you will live; and He does speak to you by this voice of mine. I speak to you in His name. Thou careless sinner, in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, consider thy ways! Thou dead sinner, in the name of Jesus, live! His Spirit has gone with the word which I have spoken. The thing is done in some who have heard me, and will be done in others who will read these words. Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, forever and ever! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

PRECIOUS NEWS AT A MIDNIGHT SUPPER.*

THE writer had four sons in the service during the War of Secession. John S. Copley, the eldest of the four, was killed in the battle of South Mountain, in Maryland, on September 14th, 1862. Of his death I was able to answer, "It is well." The next in age was Albert, a member of the Seventy-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers. In character he was like his brother—a good man and a sincere Christian. At the battle of Stone River, in Tennessee, he was wounded by an exploding shell and captured. He and his fellow-prisoners were put on board a train and carried southward nearly to the border of Florida. There they were turned back to be taken to Richmond, because some Union forces had in the mean time come near to that part of the Gulf States.

Although not mortally wounded, twelve hundred miles of continuous travelling was more than he was able to bear. When the returning train got as far as Knoxville, Tenn., he was taken off and put into a hospital. There he wrote me a short letter giving the above facts. He spoke hopefully of his recovery; but very soon afterward another letter from some one there informed me of his death. But that was all. I wrote to his captain and to General James S. Negley, then in command of his division. Both returned kind replies but could give me no information subsequent to his capture.

During the war, as many people will remember, a band of generous men and women organized for the purpose of giving a good meal to every regiment which passed through Pittsburg, no matter what the hour might be. A few weeks after Albert's death I learned that a regiment in transit from West to East would be at the City Hall that night about midnight. I lived in Alleghany City at the time, and had no active part in that good work, but still I felt that I must go over that night and see the boys.

When I entered the hall I found them around the long tables to the number of ten or twelve hundred, all highly pleased, as if they enjoyed their bountiful warm supper. I stood near the entrance and looked on until they were through and had begun to gather into groups, then I walked down among them but spoke to none until I noticed a good-looking young man standing alone. I went to him and entered into conversation. He told me he was a member of an Ohio regiment, and that he belonged to the Army of the Cumberland. "Did you ever meet any of the men of the Seventy-eighth Pennsylvania?" I asked. "Yes," he replied, "we lay for some time alongside of that regiment, and I got acquainted with a good many of the boys." "Did you know a man named Albert Copley?" He started at the question, and exclaimed, "Albert Copley! Why, I was lying beside him in the hospital when he died." He then told me that he was captured at the same time, that they travelled all that round in the same car, that he dressed Albert's wound daily as well as he could, that before reaching Knoxville he himself took sick, that both were put into the same hospital, and occupied couches side by side. He said Albert was in a fair way of recovery until erysipelas set in which soon terminated in death. He spoke of his resignation, cheerfulness, and hopefulness, and of his gratitude to his nurse who had been very kind to him. I inquired if he knew anything of his grave, but he did not, for he was too sick to attend his funeral.

Now what shall we say to all this? If you ask why I went over at all at that unseasonable hour, I cannot tell you. And when I got there was it chance that led me to the only man among ten or twelve hundred, who was able to give me the information for which I so earnestly yearned, and for which I had besought the Lord? They who please may think so and say so; but I feel that it would be wicked in me to do either.

JUSTIN McCARTHY,

The historian of our own times, whose works are widely read in this country, and who a few days ago arrived here on a visit, is a many-sided man. He is not only an historian, but an editor and a member of Parliament. Probably Mr. Parnell has had no more valuable aid from any of his supporters than Mr. McCarthy. Though not an orator, he can give wise counsel, and brings to the Irish party in the House qualities much needed—moderation, learning, and common sense.

Mr. McCarthy was born in Cork in 1830. Having learned short-hand, in 1847 he became a reporter on the Cork Examiner, then edited by John Francis McGuire. In the troublesome times of 1848 Mr. McCarthy, John Pope Hennessy, and others, started the Cork Historical Society, every member of which subsequently joined the Young Ireland movement. In 1852 Mr. McCarthy was engaged on the Liverpool Northern Times as reporter, and subsequently contributed to its editorial columns. When the paper failed, in 1860, he went to London. His first employment was as Parliamentary reporter for the Star. Mr. McCarthy is a good French, German, and Italian scholar, and he soon began to write for the columns of leading magazines. One of his articles in the Westminster Review attracted the attention of John Stuart Mill. An introduction followed, and young McCarthy stood on the stepping-stone to fame. He became editor of the London Morning Star, a paper in which John Bright had a large interest. In 1868 he visited this country and wrote a series of articles for the Galaxy. He also delivered lectures in the principal cities of the Union. In 1871 he accepted a call from the London Daily News as Parliamentary leader writer. Mr. McCarthy is the author of a number of novels. The work which brought him fame was "The History of Our Own Times," published in 1878.

JONAS GILMAN CLARK.

To Mr. Jonas Gilman Clark, of Worcester, Mass., is due the credit of originating the magnificent and philanthropic project now in course of realization which bears his name—Clark University. His appropriation of a million dollars of his fortune to the purpose, with, we understand, the intention of adding to the endowment as occasion may suggest, is a princely beneficence.

Mr. Clark is a native of Worcester County, Mass. He was born at Hubbardstown, on February 1st, 1815. His father was a farmer, and his first industrial employment was in agriculture at home. After that he made carriages, an occupation which he changed for the manufacture of tinware. He had been a dealer in hardware some time, when, in 1849, he made up his mind to go to California. There he became wealthy, as the result of selling hardware, paints and oils, furniture, and miners' outfits. Investments in real estate in and about San Francisco also added to his present and prospective gains. Mr. Clark went East in 1864, where he turned his gold into greenbacks, and made investments in New York and Boston.

When Mr. Clark returned to his native town, after spending some time in Europe, he built there a Town Hall and library building, spending fifty thousand dollars in this way.

THE LATE EDWARD L. YOUMANS.

Edward Livingstone Youmans, whose portrait appears on this page, was the editor of the Popular Science Monthly, and was regarded in Europe as the representative American savant. He was born at Coeymans, N. Y., on June 3d, 1821, and was, therefore, in his sixty-sixth year when he died on January 18th. At the age of thirteen he was attacked by ophthalmia, and for some years was totally blind. Surgical assistance eventually brought him some relief, but his sight was always defective. His sister, Anne Eliza Youmans, devoted herself to his assistance, and read and experimented for him, while he wrote with a machine which he himself invented.

Professor Youmans published in 1852 his "Class Book of Chemistry," which had a great circulation, and was translated into Spanish. In 1872 he established the Popular Science Monthly.

EDITH MAY'S SELF-SACRIFICE.

Edith May was in a difficulty. Her heart was drawing her in one direction while her conscience and her sense of duty drew her in an opposite direction. Three years ago when her dear mother lay dying she gave a promise that it was difficult to keep.

"Edith," the mother said, "I should not grieve so much about dying, for I know that I shall go to be with Jesus, but I am leaving your papa and the boys just as they need me most. I cannot think what they will do without me."

"I cannot fill your place, mother," Edith said, between her sobs, "but I will do my utmost to comfort papa and take care of the boys."

"Thank you, my love, God will help you. The burden will be a heavy one for your young shoulders, but if you look to Him you will be able to bear it. You can do much to relieve your papa of the household worries; he knows nothing of them, for I have kept them to myself, and now they would be a torture to him. And the boys—I cannot bear to think of their going away from home into temptation through being comfortless here. You can make home bright for them all, and my place will not be empty. Your promise comforts me, my love, in my darkest hour. Think of that afterward when you are being tried; it will comfort you to remember that your mother thanked you and blessed you from her heart with her latest breath."

It was three years ago that Edith listened to those grateful words, and through all that time the remembrance of them had been her stay and support. She had grown a beautiful woman, large, fair, gentle, Madonna-like, with perfectly rounded form and soft, silky hair, and deep gray eyes of marvellous clearness and purity. They had been in some respects troubled years, for her father was fastidious and exacting about his home comforts, and her brothers at first defied her authority, and even now when she had won their respect and love they could not be controlled by her as they were by their mother.

But that was not Edith's severest trial. There was one which her mother did not suspect, but which she foresaw. In that time which now seemed far away when she stood beside her mother's dying couch, Edith had already promised herself to one in all respects worthy of her. He had gone away to a distant city, inspired by her love, to win wealth and fame, hoping to return soon and claim her as his bride. She ought to have informed him of her solemn promise, but she could not deny herself the pleasure of his letters, nor could she cast out of her heart the love she bore him. Now the difficulty had come.

One morning the mail brought her a letter addressed in the familiar handwriting. Edith laid it aside and attended to the duties of the breakfast-table, promising herself the pleasure of reading it later in the privacy of her own room. As soon as she was free she opened her letter and read. Then she saw the mischief that her silence had done. Her lover had thought to give her a pleasant surprise. His success in his profession had been greater than he had told her, and he had bought and furnished a home that was worthy of her. Everything was ready for her reception, and he waited only for her to fix the day of their marriage.

She sat long with the letter in her hand lost in thought. Her duty grew clearer the longer she thought, but it was very hard. She rose at last and threw herself on her knees. It was so that this conflict must be fought as others had been, though none had been so hard as this. She prayed long and earnestly, not for wisdom or light, but for strength. After all, that is the greatest need of our poor weak nature. Reason and conscience, if they are not perverted, will generally indicate the right course; it is the will that fails. But none ever go to God for strength and come away empty-handed. When Edith rose it was with a sad heart but with a firm resolve to do the right. Self-sacrifice for the good of others was demanded of her, and she was ready to render it.

Edith opened her Bible to get comfort from the pages to which so many have gone in times of trial. Was it a coincidence or a providential direction that, opening the book almost at random, her eyes fell on the thirty seventh Psalm? "Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in Him; and He shall bring it to pass." No way was visible to any such result, but the poor suffering girl could obey and wait, and this she did. She wrote to her lover plainly and decisively, blaming herself for her neglect to inform him before of her promise, sparing him all the pain she could, but carefully impressing upon him that there was no hope. After this she went about her daily duties, and none who looked upon her that day knew how fierce a battle she had fought and won.

Edith had made the sacrifice and rigidly refused to let her thoughts wander to that home which had been prepared for her by loving hands. But as with Abraham on Mount Moriah, God intervened when the spirit had bent in submission. It was some six months after that struggle and victory, that Mr. May asked Edith to come into his room for some private conversation. He was a hard, undemonstrative, and unsympathetic man, but on this occasion he unbent as he took his daughter into his confidence. He began by telling her how he had observed her effort to fill her mother's place, and how well she had succeeded. For this he thanked her in no measured terms. This, however, was only the prelude. He thought it due to her, he said, to give her the earliest intimation of a change in his condition. A lady of eminent Christian character, refined and amiable, had consented to become his wife, and, in short, Edith must prepare to abdicate the position she had filled with so much success.

Edith May's Dilemma.

Mr. May evidently expected a protest or, at least, a manifestation of reluctance. He little knew the joy his announcement gave to Edith's heart. In the same place in which her victory had been won over herself, in which she had chosen duty and relinquished love, she knelt and thanked God for His wonderful goodness.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

Following Clues.

ROBERT ATHELING had undertaken a task much more formidable than he had imagined. It was, as he found, no easy task to find one man among the four million persons in London. He wisely endeavored, however, to prepare the way for the prodigal's return even before he found him. With this object he visited his brother's employer, Hudson Harvey, Esq., whose anger Alfred would naturally dread.

Mr. Harvey received Robert with marked coldness in the first instance, for he was with good reason very wroth with the young wrongdoer, who had rendered such an ill-return for all his kindliness and trust. But Mr. Harvey was a just man—a man of warm sympathies—and it was not long before he estimated his ingenuous visitor aright and treated him with confidence and respect.

"The facts of the case, Mr. Atheling, are just these," said he, "I had for some months felt grieved and dissatisfied with your brother's negligence and inattention to duty. I gently remonstrated, and then sharply rebuked him—not with much result, I am sorry to say. But I remembered my poor boy's affection for him as his tutor, and bore with a course of conduct which I certainly should not have borne from anybody else. Then came errors and deficiencies in his accounts, for which he accounted in a lame and unsatisfactory way. At last, on examining matters closely, I discovered that a sum of several hundred pounds, which I had intrusted to him on the morning of a day on which he had asked for a holiday, had never reached the bank at all. On the first sign of discovery, your brother took himself off, and there the matter stands at this day.

"It is very painful for me to say it, and for you to hear it; but the facts are too clear for doubt, and your brother is a guilty and dishonored man. The matter is in the hands of the police, and though I deeply sympathize with you and your aged mother, I don't see how I can further interfere."

"Believe me, sir," said Robert, "I do not desire to suggest that you should do anything but what is right. All that can be asked of you, in case my brother is found, is to be merciful as the prosecutor, and to help me to minimize the consequences of his sad offence. One thing I can do, one thing I am commissioned by his mother to do; that I am sure you will agree to for the sake of the good name of his relations. Kindly inform me what the deficiency is that is fairly traceable to his misdoings, and let me give you a cheque for the full amount. That, at any rate, is quite consistent with your freedom of action in the interests of public justice."

"I am quite willing," said Mr. Harvey, "to do as you wish, and, further, I am quite ready to promise that so far as lies in my power I will endeavor to lighten the punishment meted out to him. If I can honorably save him from imprisonment, I will."

There was something so honest and transparent about Robert Atheling that Mr. Harvey "took to him," as we used to say, asked him to lunch, and, finally, of his own accord, he intimated that the offer of a reward for Alfred's capture should be withdrawn. "As far as I am concerned," said he, "your brother shall have another opportunity of redeeming his character."

It may be well imagined that Robert Atheling returned to his quarters much relieved in his mind as to one portion of his mission to town.

Clearly, the next step was to find the prodigal, and communicate the good news to him, so that if, as Robert hoped, he had begun to repent, his return might not be so dreadful as Alfred would naturally imagine. In that effort Robert was less successful, for, as we know, Alfred had quitted London, and was on the sea, bound for America.

Many a weary tramp about the London streets he had with Joss his faithful dog at his heels. He was glad now that Joss had succeeded in accompanying him, for he was lonely, and Joss was company to a certain extent. The two together visited Alfred's old boarding-house, and his various haunts, and spent much of his time in the crowded streets eagerly scanning the faces of the throng for the one dear familiar face so like his own. He went back every night weary and disappointed to recommence his search in the morning.

At length he had the good fortune to come across Mr. Cecil Osborne, the young gentleman whom we last saw "in difficulties," seeking to elude his financial enemies by courting the seclusion of the Victoria Park. That "friend" of the absent one ventured his opinion that he was still hiding somewhere in that Eastern region. It was not much of a clue, but still it was worth following. Indeed, there was no filament of possibility, however fine, that Robert would have rejected, so bent was he on the honest and earnest prosecution of his enterprise. Having found his way to the locality indicated he resolved to take up temporary quarters there. Nothing was more natural than that he should enter a coffee-house to make inquiries after decent lodgings, and possibly to find them in the eating-house itself. Here he did find what he sought, and abode.

In this respect fate, or, rather, Providence, was kinder to him than he knew. He had happened to fix upon the restaurant favored by Ned Saltmer, and as he often sat there drinking his coffee and planning new schemes, he and that worthy artisan met under the same roof. With Robert was the ever faithful and intelligent Joss, whose memory was as clear and strong as ever. He had received many a morsel at Ned's hand when that honest carpenter was in Simon Holmes's employ. He had come to know the customary dinner hour, and had paid his visits with unerring regularity. Ned, like all other good and honest men, was fond of dumb animals, and had treated Joss with peculiar favor. So having eaten salt with him, as the Arabs say, Joss counted him a friend for life. He recognized the bluff artisan instantly, and barked a kindly "How d'ye do," placing his forepaws the while upon his knee, and wagging his tail as though grateful to fortune, that it had found at last something that was worth wagging for. The recognition was not mutual, though, true to himself, Ned gave the dog a kindly pat or two.

Robert Atheling fixed his eyes directly on the collie's new-found friend. "Excuse me," said he, "my dog seems to know you, and, strange to say, I seem to be familiar with your face. Didn't you use to work for Simon Holmes, at Thorpe Aspen, some time ago?"

"Nowt so sure," said Ned, who instantly remembered both the owner and his dog. "I helped to put a new roof on your barn, Mr. Atheling, and to put up a new shed in your paddock. But I shouldn't ha' thowt that you would ha' remembered me. Well, this is rich!" said he, as a thought suddenly came into his mind, and slapping his knee in his excitement. "Why, it was in this here very house, not so long since, that I met your bro—"

Here Ned's remark came to a sudden and untimely end. It dawned on him that he might be doing Alfred an ill turn. But he could not call back what he had already said; and as for turning Robert off on a wrong scent, plain, straightforward Ned had not the art to do it. "I give him joy that's awkward at a lie," says the poet Young; and though Ned was nimble enough at his trade, he would have sorely bungled at a falsehood, not being "practised to deceive." He simply sat staring at Robert Atheling with his mouth open, and said nothing.

"My brother Alfred?" cried Robert, starting from his seat. Then, crossing the floor, he laid his hand on Ned's shoulder, and said with a tremulous earnestness not to be mistaken—"For Heaven's sake, man, tell me all you know!"

There was a few moments' pause. Ned was reading his companion's heart; not by any means a difficult task, for there it was, in his eyes, both eloquent with a brother's deepest, truest love.

"I hope he won't get into trouble if you should chance on him," said Ned, questioningly.

"No, I think not, now; I hope and believe not. I want to save him from trouble. I want to save his mother's life. She is breaking her heart over him." His voice faltered as he spoke.

Ned's heart was very tender, and Robert Atheling's anxious and weary tone cut right into the middle of it. "I don't know where he is," said Ned. "But I know where he was. You come along with me."

Nothing loath, for in very sooth he was willing to go anywhere on this errand, Robert followed him out of the coffee-house, accompanied by Joss.

"Madge, my lass," said Ned, when they had entered his cottage, "this is Mr. Robert Atheling, of Thorpe Aspen. He's the brother of the young chap that lodged here." Then, seeing that a cloud was gathering on her sonsy face, he hastened to add, "He means no harm, lass, but good, nowt but good, as a brother should. His mother's breaking her heart for the lad, an' she wants him back."

Madge was not by any means at ease. She was dubious and unconvinced, and scented danger in the air—danger to her young favorite, whose safety she had pledged her word to guard, so far as it should lie within her power. Then her husband told her that he knew their visitor, that he was really Alfred's brother; and Robert explained to her truthfully what his errand to London was, and how it had grown out of the promise he had made by his dying father's bed. Madge could not resist this. She felt intuitively that home with his mother was the place where her late lodger ought to be. Robert's story softened her to tears. She showed him into the parlor where there were still some little matters belonging to the absent one, all of which he handled with trembling fingers and a full heart. Among the rest there was a small papier mache writing-case. On the inside the cover was written in well remembered characters, "Ralph Ravensworth," and underneath were these words, "For life, I wonder?"

"No, my brother, no, I pray God!" said Robert, unable to restrain his tears; for he read in it the assumption of a new name, and a doubt, mingled with a great longing, as to whether he would ever again be able to claim his own.

"He promised us," said Ned, "that if ever he needed a shelter he would come here." "An' welcome he'll be as the flowers in May," chimed in Madge. "Whatever he's gone an' been an' done, the poor young fellow is all right at heart."

"If you will let me have these rooms," said Robert, "I'll pay you well. To live in the very house where the poor lad dwelt will give me heart and hope."

"But you'll give 'em up, if he comes back again," said Madge, stoutly. "They're promised to him, you know."

"Ay, I'll give them up," said Robert, who could not help smiling at her fidelity to Alfred's interest, smiling, too, at the thought of his coming back. In a little while he and Joss were installed as lodgers, and the young man felt cheered and strengthened by the thought that he had secured two faithful allies in Ned Saltmer and his buxom spouse. It soon appeared as if Joss had clearly understood that the honest couple had been taken into partnership, for he attached himself to Ned and Madge and Robert promiscuously; now going with Ned for a saunter, now trudging with Madge to market, and now following at the heels of Robert on his weary tramps through the dreary London streets.

One morning Robert received a letter from his brother Edgar, requesting him to call on a certain corn merchant whose great warehouse for some distance lined the borders of the Thames, and who, for many years, had purchased the corn and other crops that had been raised at Aspen Garth. After breasting for awhile the human waves that rolled through the roaring metropolis, Robert found himself in one of the narrow, busy streets hard by London Bridge. Hoisted high on the front of a tall warehouse he saw the name he sought, Ephraim Hartgold, Corn Merchant.

In response to his inquiry, a stout, pleasant-faced individual came from an inner office. "Well, friend," said he, "what is thy business?" Like the question the speaker's tone was brisk and prompt. "It concerns a consignment of corn from the Athelings of Aspen Garth," said Robert, readily taking the cue of the merchant. "An honored name," was the reply, "I am at thy service. Follow me." As Robert followed him into the inner office, he was more than ever struck with the firm step and erect deportment of the merchant whose white hair betokened that its owner was fast approaching the allotted term of threescore years and ten.

Ephraim Hartgold was a Quaker of the real old-fashioned type. He wore the broad-brimmed hat, the collarless coat, the drab breeches and gaiters, and the voluminous white neck cloth which was the good old mode and fashion among his sect in the days when George the Third was King. The old-fashioned pronouns, too, "thou," "thee," and "thy," did unflinching duty in common conversation. He possessed, also, all that sterling character for uprightness and integrity which has ever marked that peculiar people. The immediate business in hand was very soon dispatched, although nothing could surpass the careful and methodical way in which the merchant went about it.

"And now," said he, "that we have finished the matter of business which brought thee here, I would fain induce thee to favor me with a visit to Sharon Lodge. Thy father and I have had business relations from the time that he succeeded his father to the heritage of Aspen Garth. He was a good man and true, the ideal of probity and the soul of honor; and I count it no small honor that he accounted me his friend. It would make me glad if the same relationship may be continued in the person of his son."

"It is very pleasant to me," said Robert, "to hear you speak thus of my honored father. I have often heard him speak with equal warmth and respect of yourself. I need scarcely say that I, too, should be glad to inherit your friendship and confidence, as it has fallen to me, too soon, to become the heir of Aspen Garth."

"Thou wilt follow in thy father's steps, young man; they will lead to the same holy place. 'The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord,' and his heritage shall dwell in 'peace.' Give me thy promise that thou wilt visit Sharon Lodge. My wife Keturah and my daughter Ruth will give thee a true Friend's welcome there."

"Excuse me just now, Mr. Hartgold. The fact is, that I have sorrowful business in hand at present. I feel that I may make it known to you. I am searching for a brother of mine who has got himself into serious trouble and is a fugitive." Forthwith Robert told the merchant the whole sad history, and solicited his advice.

"I wish I could give thee a helping hand," said Ephraim Hartgold, thoughtfully rubbing his beardless chin. "Hast thee advertised for the youth in the public papers?"

"Yes, over and over again, and as clearly as I dared," replied Robert."

"I fear thy search may be a long one," said the merchant. "As for advertising, even with a view to restore lost money, it seems to be ineffective; at least so it has been in my case, for I could not find an owner. Some time ago I picked up a bag of gold. It was left behind in a public conveyance by two young men—the worse for liquor, I thought—who suddenly left the vehicle to hail a comrade in the street. I discovered their loss as soon as they had left, and hastened after them. But the crowd in Regent Circus was so great, and something especial was to be seen, I think, that I quite lost sight of them. By the way," he continued, looking earnestly at Robert, "now I come to think of it, the younger of them certainly bore a marked resemblance to thyself. I remember at the time being struck with something of the kind; thou art greatly like thy father, Robert Atheling."

Robert looked at the speaker with intense interest Had he here found another clue? "Indeed!" said he, "and what of the money? Did you never find the owner?"

"No; as I was saying, I gave notice to the police. I advertised in the newspapers. In short, I did all I could to put the matter right. The bag is at this moment locked safely up in my oak cabinet at Sharon Lodge. It is contained in a brown canvas-bag with the letters 'H. H.' printed on it in black ink, and is tied with a piece of green tape."

"H. H.!" said Robert, leaping to his feet. "That would stand for Hudson Harvey, Alfred's employer! Oh, can this be true?"

"Thou hast some reason for surprise," said Ephraim. "Come with me to Sharon Lodge."

Robert eagerly complied. Oh, if it were true! If his brother had not embezzled the money after all!

DESTRUCTION OF SODOM.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 27, Gen. 19: 15–26. Golden Text, ver. 17.

Lot Honored in Sodom—His Place in the Gate—Neutrality Impossible—The Timeservers—Lot's Hospitable Courtesy—The Outbreak of Persecution—Judgment Commencing—The Message to Lot—His Words Ridiculed—The Influence of an Inconsistent Life—A Time of Urgency—Lot's First Recorded Prayer—Judgment Restrained by Prayer—Miseries of Half-Hearted Believers.

MANY believe that of the three men who appeared to Abraham, one was an incarnation of the Lord Himself, and the other two were angels. In any case, when "the men turned their faces from thence and went toward Sodom, . . . Abraham stood yet before the Lord," and two angels, or messengers, only came to Sodom. It was evening, and Lot sat in the gate of Sodom. This was the place of judgment, and therefore of judicial power and of honor. While Abraham would not take from Sodom or its king "from a thread even to a shoelatchet," Lot grasped at the worldly advantages which he could acquire, though it might be from God's enemies. While Abraham would have nothing to do with Sodom but in the way of rescue, deliverance, or intercession, in accordance with God's Word, "Be thou a blessing," Lot became silently a curse to Sodom, for his very presence, his very acceptance of honor at their hands made him, in fact, to countenance the deeds of the men of Sodom.

We Cannot be Neutral, we are every moment either taking part with God or against Him, "He that is not with Me is against Me, and he that gathereth not with Me scattereth abroad" (Matt. 12: 30). It was God's reproach against Jerusalem that, far from being a blessing to Sodom and Samaria, she justified these her sisters in all her abominations, and was "a comfort to them" (Ezek. 16: 51, 52, 54). "Again, God reproaches the prophets of Israel that they strengthen the hands of evil-doers" (Jer. 23: 14). It was so with Lot. Though he "vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds," "was vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked" (II Pet. 2: 7, 8), yet neither in his life nor in his testimony was he a power for God, and, consequently, his influence told against God instead of for Him. Lot could not, or would not, relinquish his own selfish ends, and so he sacrificed the souls of his wife, children, and servants, who might otherwise have been saved, to his miserable desire to be a great man!

How Many Lots Have We In Society?

When Lot saw the angels, thinking them to be strangers, as they were in the form of men, with gentlemanly courtesy he rose to meet them, and "bowed with his face toward the ground," and urged upon them to accept of his hospitality. At first, they said, "Nay, but we will abide in the street all night." In that eastern climate such a thing was not uncommon. But Lot knew the horrors of the streets of Sodom (almost rivalled now by the streets of our large cities), and he "pressed upon them greatly," and they yielded, and entered his house, where he treated them with lavish hospitality. Little did Lot know that that was the last feast he should ever make or should ever share. Little did he think that these messengers had come to destroy the city, and that the riches, honor, reputation, position, for which he had

of mind and the souls of his family, were now slipping out of his grasp forever! "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not highminded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God" (I Tim. 6: 17).

The men of the city found out sooner than Lot did, that the men who had entered his house were no fellows of theirs, and open persecution broke out. Now Lot must take his position. He first attempted a compromise. Strange to say, in the filthy atmosphere of the wicked city. his daughters had remained pure up to this time; now he decides to turn them on the streets! Was there nothing better to be done? Oh, had Lot remained in communion with God, he could have trusted God to save his children, but Lot was no man of faith like Abraham, he could not count on God, and now,

In a Time of Trial, He Was Utterly Powerless.

The scorn of the men of Sodom added to his trouble. "This fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a judge." His terrible compromise did not stay the persecution. But his guests now began to move—a hand of power was put forth out of the door to pull him in, and then blindness fell upon the wicked men who were so soon to be destroyed. Judgment had commenced already, "they wearied themselves to find the door," but without avail, for God was preventing them.

Meanwhile, within the house, the judgment message was being spoken, "the men said unto Lot, Hast thou any here besides? son-in-law, and thy sons, and thy daughters, and whatsoever thou hast in the city, bring them out of this place; for we will destroy this place, because the cry of them is waxen great before the face of the Lord; and the Lord hath sent us to destroy it."

For the first time in his life, Lot attempts to preach; but a message from God on the lips of the money-loving, world-loving, honor-loving Lot was so out of place that it fell powerless, like "sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." He said the truth, but no life of separation unto God, power with God, or testimony for Him, backed up his words. Lot spoke with members of his own family, the very men who had married his daughters, "Up, get you out of this place; for the Lord will destroy this place." But why, if the place was so wicked, had Lot dwelt here so long? Why had he countenanced all this evil? Why this sudden change? "he seemed as one that mocked unto his sons-in-law."

Men Judge by Deeds More Than by Words, and Lot had the untold bitterness of knowing that his own undecided life had involved those dear to him in a fate worse than his own, and it was forever!

The morning broke; little sleep had visited Lot's home, and "the angels hastened Lot, saying, Arise, take thy wife, and thy two daughters, which are here; lest thou be consumed in the iniquity of the city." Lot lingered; all his hopes were crushed, the object for which he had lived was shattered to fragments; he had no heart to flee; but the angels used compulsion, laying hold upon, and hurrying him, with his wife and daughters, away from the doomed city. Once without the walls, the angels said, "Escape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain, escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed." The mountain? but Lot had left his horses and asses and camels behind, he had not so much as a servant to carry any baggage! Lot had been used to luxury, and so he pleaded, "Oh, not so, my lord; behold now, thy servant hath found grace in Thy sight, and Thou hast magnified Thy mercy which Thou hast shown unto me in saving my life; and I cannot escape to the mountain lest some evil overtake me, and I die; behold, now, this city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one! Oh, let me escape thither (is it not a little one?), and my soul shall live!" It is Lot's first recorded prayer, and it was heard. If he had prayed for his children, might he not have been heard? but he lived for self. The prayer was granted, but the Lord said, "Haste thee, escape thither; for I cannot do anything till thou be come thither." "I cannot!" Does God speak thus? Yes; for from faithful Abraham, and God allowed Himself to be bound! Dear child of God, He is just as much bound by that prayer in faith which you made when His promise for your wife, or husband, or child came home to you in such power, when some flash which you knew to be from His own Spirit lit up some work in which you waited to know His will, and now He has undertaken to bring it about, He "cannot" do other than He has promised.

He Had Heard the Prayer of Faith

"The sun was risen upon the earth when Lot entered into Zoar." Then it was that the work of destruction began. With the light of day the heavens glowed with fiercer light, and fire and brimstone poured down like hail, setting houses, tents, men, women, all on fire. It was a kind of foretaste of "the fire which never shall be quenched." Thus God showed His hatred of sins of impurity. Had Abraham slept? We know not, but when he rose early in the morning, and went to the very spot where he had communed with God only twenty-four hours before, "lo, the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace." But

and that smoke did not hide beneath it the one righteous man which was found in Sodom.

Lot's end was a sad one. Maybe he did come to know more of God as he dwelt in a mountain cave, driven thither by fear of dwelling in Zoar; but we never learn of his becoming a blessing to others. "He that loveth his life shall lose it." There is no life more miserable, more ignoble than the life of a half-hearted believer, a man who accepts salvation from God, but caters for himself in things earthly, and does not yield himself a living sacrifice to God. He shuts himself out from all the wondrous depths of grace and love with which God floods the hearts and lives of those who fully yield to Him, and fully accept Him to be their all.

ASSURANCE.

It may not come to us as we have thought,
The blessed consciousness of sins forgiven;
We may not hear a voice that shall proclaim
Our title clear to the sweet rest of heaven.

We may not see a light upon the path
Above the brightness of the noonday sun,
Whose radiance shall reveal out names enrolled
As ransomed by the Lord's Anointed One.

Not thus may the sweet knowledge come to us,
That all is well with us for evermore;
Not with a flash of glory on the soul
To call pass into life through Christ the door.

But like the winter merging into spring,
Or gently as the trees put forth their leaves,
May come to us the impulse of that life
Which God bestow on those sin truly grieves.

If we are conscious of a firm resolve
To follow Jesus as our constant guide;
In prosperity or in distress,
Our hearts cling closely to the Crucified;

If we are not ashamed to have it known
That in His service is our chief delight;
Though we may never feel the ecstasy
Which those attain who reach the mountain height;

Yet, if the hour of secret prayer be sweet,
When we hold converse with a friend divine,
And dear the time when with His "own" we meet,
For as the promise stands, "They shall be mine."

In Mr. Spurgeon's sermon which appeared in this paper Jan. 20, he mentioned the fact that General Gordon always carried with him a little book called Clark's "Precious Promises," an arrangement of the various promises in the Old and New Testaments, under different heads, which the General used to consult, and seek out that holy text which best suited his particular condition. In answer to many inquiries, I would say that I will send the book, bound in handsome cloth, gilt edge, for 50 cents, postpaid. Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

MR. HENRY M. STANLEY.

British Honor to an American Citizen—What Citizenship Did for an Apostle—The Ceremony in London—Stanley's Programme—The Attempt to Rescue Emin—What Emin has Done—His Connection with General Gordon—The Terror of the Slave Hunters—Brief Summary of Stanley's Eventful Life.

IT was a deeply significant ceremony which took place recently when Henry M. Stanley, an American citizen, was with quaint forms and ancient customs invested with the citizenship of London. Never before had that much-coveted honor been conferred on any journalist. Wherever Mr. Stanley goes in future, he will be able to claim the protection of the British, as well as the American, Government. He may be in situations in which the former may be of greater service to him than the latter, and then he will doubtless use the privilege conferred upon him. The possibility of such an occasion arising will remind Bible-readers of one of the most thrilling passages of apostolic history. When in Jerusalem the chief captain commanded that Paul be scourged, and the officer was binding him with thongs preparatory to the infliction, Paul used (Acts 22:25). Immediately the officer acquainted the chief captain with the fact, and gave him the friendly warning: "Take heed what thou doest; for this man is a Roman." He knew well enough that it was not safe to deal with a Roman citizen as with other men. The chief captain, doubtless aware that Paul was a native of Tarsus, was incredulous, but thought it best to question him. The result was significant: "Then straightway they departed from him, which should have examined him, and the chief captain also was afraid, . . . after he knew that he was a Roman." At Philippi, too, a similar result followed Paul's declaration of his citizenship (Acts 16:37). It is possible that Mr. Stanley will meet with citizens of London abroad, who may say truthfully, as the chief captain said to Paul: "With a great sum obtained I this freedom," and Stanley may say, "But it was given to me as a mark of respect." Unhappily, the recent murder of Bishop Hannington, and other events, show that the savages have little respect for England's power, so the great American citizen may derive no benefit from the honor conferred upon him; but, such advantages as it gives, he now possesses.

The Privilege of Citizenship

Another significant feature of the honor was the fact that English citizens had unusual reason for conferring it. They understand from recent dreadful experience the character of the undertaking which Stanley has accepted. When General Gordon was shut up in Khartoum, and the British Premier was at last shamed into sending an expedition to rescue him, the most famous English general was placed in command, and the flower of the English army, was sent to fight under him. The issue was a fruitless expenditure of blood and treasure—a miserable lamentable failure. Now that another brave man is in peril, and humanity calls for his deliverance, it is an American citizen, whilom a newspaper reporter, to whom the task is committed, and he goes out with the conviction of the civilized world that if any man can succeed it is he. Not a titled, pensioned general, with his breast ablaze with ribbons and stars and medals, the favorite of sovereigns this time, but a plain American citizen, with grit and intrepidity. The Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London honored themselves in honoring him. At as shown in the illustration on the first page, Mr. Stanley was accompanied by the philanthropic Christian, Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and her husband, who are his warm friends, by Cardinal Manning, Generals Lord Wolseley, Lord Napier, of Magdala, Lord Chelmsford, Sir Gerald Graham, and many other famous persons. The Lord Mayor of London presided, and the city Chamberlain read from an illuminated scroll the record of Mr. Stanley's great achievements, which formed the justification of the London magnates for conferring the unusual honor upon him. At the conclusion of the reading, a copy of the scroll was handed to Mr. Stanley, with the certificate of his freedom, and the two were placed in a magnificent casket of gold, the gift of the City of London.

Mr. Stanley's Reply to the address was modest and manly. He said: "I am preparing a new expedition into the centre of that little-known continent for the relief of an Egyptian officer, who is at present in somewhat straitened circumstances, and environed by breadths of unknown territories populated by savage tribes. The borders of these unknown lands are occupied by some peoples actively hostile to his retreat, or to any communication with him; others are hostile through sheer barbaric ignorance, and passively opposed to the advent of any strangers in their midst. To break down both active and passive hostility requires means of opposing a defensible front, otherwise the beleaguered chief, while retreating, might be only leading his sorely tried followers to that frightful doom which overtook Hicks Pasha, on the road to El Obeid." And he added: "I accept the scroll and casket with a full and grateful heart. They will be significant to me of the esteem in which I am held by the good citizens of London, and will be treasured and valued as a testimony of duty conscientiously performed by me. They will stimulate me to still further exertions, and honorable performance of whatever duties may in the future fall to me."

A Banquet in His Honor was given later in the day, and at this Mr. Stanley spoke, entering more into detail respecting the plans of his expedition. He said: "If the expedition took the central (or Masai) route it would have in front Uganda with 150,000 warriors. In the days of Mtesa, the father of the present King Mwanga, it would have been very easy to have negotiated for a safe passage through his territory. It was even likely that Mtesa would have said, 'I will go with you, or, if you wish, we will go and take the white man and bring him to you.' But Mwanga, the son, was a person of very different disposition; he got drunk upon bhang; he had already distinguished himself by the atrocious murder of Bishop Hannington; and the sight of a valuable convoy going to Emin Pasha would, of course, excite his cupidity. If, on the other hand, the expedition took the south-western route, it would encounter the valorous and brave Wahuma, who were the aristocrats of that part of Africa, who furnished the royal blood of all the chiefs in Equatorial Africa, and who would bar the way to Emin Pasha. The King of the Belgians had solved the difficulty by offering the steamers of the Congo State, and consequently it was proposed to go by

The Congo Route.

On the one side there was the river to float down and take these women and children straight to the Atlantic without any trouble, with the prospect of being hospitably received all the way. This would be a month's journey, or forty days at the utmost, to the sea. The other route would involve twelve hundred miles of march through combative tribes, against whom women and children would have to be guarded. This statement of facts put the matter in a nutshell, and people could judge as to the best route."

Having thus discussed the difficulties and perils of the various routes which had been suggested for the relief expedition, and observing that they were not going to annex anything, nor excite the people of Africa, nor endanger the safety of the missionaries, nor arouse the susceptibilities of the Germans, Mr. Stanley proceeded: "If we can avail ourselves of transport by steamer from Zanzibar to the Congo, the relief of Emin Pasha might be effected in four comfortable months. The women and children will be brought down the Congo and return to Egypt. From the Congo side if I try to reach Emin Pasha the route is perfectly open. On the other hand, you know that these women and children will have to take twelve hundred miles of march, escorted by the expedition, in order to reach the Indian Ocean. When the expedition is ready, if the steamer is at Zanzibar to convey us to the Congo, we propose to take that route, but if it is not there we propose crossing the mainland, striking inland, and not returning until we bring news of Emin, unless we fall in the attempt.

On January 21st all arrangements were completed and from Charing Cross Station, London, for the interior of Africa. He was going first to Brindisi, and thence to Suez. A large number of reporters and distinguished persons gathered at the railway station to witness Mr. Stanley's departure. (See Illustration on first page.) Among those present were United States Consul-General Waller, Mr. Charles T. Russell, United States Consul at Liverpool, and General Sir Lewis Pelly. On behalf of the reporters of London, Mr. Williams, ex-President of the Press Club, presented to Mr. Stanley a pocket night compass carried by the former in the Soudan campaigns while serving as a special correspondent. Mr. Stanley's last words, in reply to an inquiry by a reporter, were: "I will return as soon as I can. Give my kindest regards to my friends in America, Belgium, and England." As the train moved out of the station Mr. Stanley was lustily cheered.

The Object of the Expedition is, as has been said, the rescue of Emin Pasha, the friend and coadjutor of the late General Gordon. He is a German physician who was attached to General Gordon's staff thirteen years ago when General Gordon occupied the position which Emin now holds. An accomplished linguist and naturalist, Emin's time was fully engrossed during the four years he occupied the post of medical officer to the Government. For not only was he accumulating great scientific collections, and writing elaborate "papers" for the learned societies, but he was repeatedly sent by Gordon on diplomatic missions to Uganda and Unyoro, tasks in which he acquitted himself with such remarkable ability that when Gordon succeeded to the governor-generalship of the Soudan, Emin Bey (as he had by this time become) was selected for the vacant office. His new duties were by no means light. The vast district watered by the White Nile and its tributaries, which he undertook to rule, was inhabited by savages who brooked no foreign lord, and by black sovereigns too intent on hating each other to pay much attention to the white governor whom Gordon had sent to be their master. He worked entirely in the civilizing spirit of his chief. He rooted out the slave trade from a huge province, and he has made a good start in civilization with the docile natives under his sway. He has given them a postal service, taught them to submit to taxation for the purposes of regular government, and, above all, he has set them to work. But a few years ago the sole industry of these people was cutting one another's throats.

The province in which he is lies just north of the Albert Nyanza, a long way south of Khartoum, and it forms a wedge of civilization between the Nile slave-hunters and their brethren on the East Coast. It is precisely because of his being which this situation has made him, that Emin Bey stands in need of relief. He is kept in strict quarantine by the Arab traders, for fear the disease of freedom should spread, and when they are ready they may move down and sweep him out as they have swept out Stanley Falls. They have been closing in upon him for years, and news of him has come only at rare intervals through their iron ring. He was heard from in 1882, and again in the next year, which he passed, "the world forgetting," if not "by the world forgot." He was living, he said, "as if there were no Egypt, no Khartoum, no Mahdi."

In 1885 he gained a victory over the slave-hunters. Last July he wrote to Dr. Junker to say that his position was one of extreme distress, that gunpowder was scarce, and that the behavior of his troops did not inspire him with so much confidence as before.

It is realized that there is no time to be lost; according to Dr. Junker, all will be over with Emin Pasha if he is not relieved within five months. Another European is with him, the Italian explorer Casati, and there are women and children in his camp. It would be premature to say that he personally is to be brought off; for, after all, he may not consent to leave. He has written as Gordon might have written of his sense of the true uses of his life. "If I die, who will take this work up? I think only of that. I am too much needed here to think of leaving my post. Time is wanted, but from the seed I have tried to sow doubtless good fruit will spring up."

Of Stanley himself, who has gone out on this work of mercy for the rescue of the brave Emin, it is unnecessary to write much. On August 13th, 1885, his portrait and life appeared in this journal. In brief summary it may be said here that he was born in 1840, in poor circumstances, became the adopted by a distinguished American citizen, served in the Confederate service, subsequently, after being a prisoner of war, entered the Union army, took part in the battles of Fort Donelson, Fort Henry, and Pittsburg Landing, became a war correspondent of the New York Herald, and after the war continued his services on that journal. In October, 1869, the proprietor, Mr. James Gordon Bennett, offered to send him to the interior of Africa to find Dr. Livingstone, the Christian missionary-explorer, who had been so long lost to the ken of the civilized world that he was believed to be dead. Stanley tramped across Africa searching for him, and eventually found him, relieved his pressing needs, gave him news of the civilized world, and carried despatches home from him. Stanley's was the last white face on which Livingstone ever looked, for before he had completed his journey fever and fatigue did their fatal work, the brave missionary lay down to die. He breathed his last while on his knees in prayer, surrounded by faithful black followers, on May 4th, 1873, little more than a year after Stanley parted from him. Stanley afterward took up the work of exploration which Livingstone left unfinished, and, aided by the King of the Belgians, has established the Free State of the Congo.

A Remarkable Series of Medical Experiments conducted by eminent French physicians are interesting the scientists of Europe. They have also a fascination for the detective police and judges of the courts. They are efforts to discover the resources of hypnotism. The results arrived at so far are similar to those produced by mesmerism, but of a more exact and reliable character. Dr. Charcot who is the leader in the study recently had a conference with a delegation of a society of medico-legal experts, who consulted him as to the possibility of a will being signed unconsciously by a person under hypnotic influence. The Paris correspondent of the New York Herald, describing the circumstance, says that Dr. Charcot experimented on a girl before the delegation. She firmly refused to sign a paper presented to her, but signed it under hypnotic influence, and afterward could not remember having done so. Another girl in the hospital of Salpetrière, being suspected of having committed a theft, indignantly denied the charge, but while sleeping under the hypnotic influence confessed her guilt, and revealed the place where the property was hidden.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Cabman's Idea of Wealth.—A Missionary remarked at a recent meeting: "I remember a cabman in London coming to me in a state of delight one day, and saying, 'Oh, sir, I have good news for you; I have found the Saviour!' And I asked him something which I rarely ask any one. 'I am heartily glad to hear it; but how did you feel when you let the Saviour in?' I said to the poor fellow, who stood wondering how I was going to congratulate him. 'Feel,' he exclaimed, 'I felt so rich—so rich, as if I had got a thousand cabs and horses.' Ah, this is how the poor fellow could count his riches. I say poor, but he was spiritually rich, for all are rich who love Christ; for 'God is rich unto all them that call upon Him.'"

Drowned in a Sewer.—A Man Related His experience as follows: "It is now two years since I first trusted Jesus. Some men were at work in a sewer, when a dreadful storm came on. Some one ran to warn them of their danger, and cried: 'There is a flood coming, come out!' The men hastened out, knowing how dangerous it is in these large sewers when a rain storm occurs. But two men were unwilling to leave their work, and when the warning voice again was heard calling, 'Come out, the flood is coming,' they replied, 'There is time enough yet.' But there was not time, for when they would have escaped, the flood came rushing down upon them, and they were both drowned. When I heard of the sad fate of those two men, I reflected that there is no time but the present 'now' which is positively available for safety."

"Are You God's Wife?"—An Evangelist Remarked: "A lady in America one day came across a little girl looking into the window of a large confectioner's shop. She was peering in so earnestly, pressing her little nose against the window-pane, that she thought she would give the child a little treat, so went into the shop and bought some candies. Coming out she offered them to her, but the little girl was very poor, dirty, and badly dressed, and could not understand how a stranger should be so kind to her, and instead of accepting the gift she moved back a bit, as much as to say, 'it is not for me; there must be some mistake.' The lady assured her there was no mistake, that they were really for her; then she stretched out her hand and took them. The lady expected that at least she would say, 'thank you,' but the child seemed completely overcome, and looking up into the lady's face, said, 'Please, ma'am, are you God's wife?' She had heard that God loved the poor, and she knew that very few rich people did, and as that lady had been so kind to her, she thought she must be almost God."

Lost in the Mountain Mists.—Mr. J. G. Forbes remarked: "A few years ago I was in the Highlands, and set out for a ramble over the hills. Suddenly there settled down upon the hills a thick mist, which completely obscured everything, and made it almost impossible for me to find my way back. For some time I was completely nonplussed, not knowing which way to return; then I remembered that down that hill there ran many little rills which, joining each other, formed streams, and these in turn flowing together at the foot of the hill formed a small river. I knew if I reached one of these rills and followed it, I should be brought safely home. Soon I came upon one, and to make sure that I should not lose it I got right into the middle of it and waded along. I walked in the direction the water was flowing, and followed it faithfully, turning neither to the right hand nor the left; and did it take me home? No. It took me all wrong. It led me down the other side of the hill, and it was long before I walked round, and at last reached home. This little incident, I think, shows us a deep spiritual truth. Some people think it is no matter what religion we may have if we be earnest in it, the more assiduously we follow a wrong course the farther it takes us from the right. God has given us His glorious Gospel with full directions how to find our eternal home, but many ignore these directions, or treat them with contempt, and then say, 'I have done the best I could with the imperfect knowledge I had, and surely God will not punish me for failing to do that which I knew nothing about."

A Bite of an Apple.—Mr. Marsh said: "There were two little boys in one of the streets in Dublin lately. One of them was eating an apple, which the other seemed to be eyeing enviously, and at length said to the other, 'I say, boy, give us a bite!' The little fellow with the apple seemed a generous boy, and at once handing him the apple, said, 'Take one,' which was soon done, and the remains of the apple handed back. But the possessor of the apple did not look at all satisfied, and after wriggling about for a minute or so, said to his friend, 'Here, take a bigger bite.' And, comparing great things with small, that is just what Christ has to say to some Christians. He asks them to come and take of His grace. They come, take a little bit, and are about to go away, and He has to call them back and tell them to take a more bountiful supply; there is plenty for all, and it's a fine thing to have a good appetite in the midst of plenty."

An Unwise Signalman.—Mr. Alexander Nar- rated the following: "At Alexander, there were in our meeting one night two signalmen. At the close of the meeting I spoke to them about their souls, and one of them gave his heart immediately to the Lord, but the other refused, and while acknowledging his need of salvation, said he was not ready to give up the world. I tried to show him his meanness in expecting to sneak into heaven after having spent his whole life in the service of Satan; but he seemed to be wedded to worldly pleasure, and would not be constrained to give it up. During the next few days I frequently met him, and always saluted him with the question, 'Have you given yourself to Christ yet?' but the answer was still the same, 'Not quite yet.' About a week or so after that meeting he and his companion were at work as usual, and his companion made an earnest, and it proved to be his last, effort to persuade him to accept Christ, but in vain. That day this man, who thought he had plenty of time yet, was taken suddenly and seriously ill. On his way home he lost consciousness, and before the close of the day he died, having never recovered his reason. This is another illustration of the insecurity of life. The man who goes blundering on toward eternity with his eyes shut and unprepared, is less wise than one who would attempt to walk between precipices blindfolded."

An Old Man's Pathetic Story.—Another worker related: "A number of workmen joiners were engaged in the same yard when one of them, a young man, taking a bottle of spirit from his pocket, took a drink, and then, as he offered it to one of his companions, said, 'That's the stuff to make you work!' An old man who had been working a short distance from them looked up at this and said, 'Yes, that's the stuff to make you work!' 'Of course it is,' said the younger man, 'and you know it, William.' 'Yes, I know it,' was the soft reply; 'it is making me work now in my old age when I might have been resting. When I was a young man I was earning good wages, and looked forward to a happy and prosperous life. But after a bit I began to take a little drop; at first only now and again when I was specially tired or overwrought, and I found that it really did seem to give fresh strength for a time; but soon I was as tired as ever, and had to have recourse to the bottle again, and soon I found I could not do without it, and took it regularly, besides at odd times. Soon my home was lost, my family destitute, and I became an outcast. And now though I have given up the drink I still feel the effects. The money which I wasted during my prodigal years is all gone, and now when I am old and unfit for work, and might have been living on the fruits of my labor, I am obliged to work.'"

DEMENTIA DRAMATIZED.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Feb. 20, 1887.

"And he changed his behavior before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands, and scrabbled on the doors of the gate, and let his spittle fall down upon his beard."—1 SAM. 21 : 13.

Those who Procrastinate—A Life of a Minute.

THERE is one scene in the life of David that you may not have pondered. You have seen him with a harp playing the devil out of Saul; with a sling, smashing the skull of Goliath; with a sword, hacking to pieces the Philistines; with a sceptre, ruling a vast realm; with a psalm, gathering all nations into doxology; but in my text, you have David playing the fool. He has been anointed king, yet he is in exile and passing incognito among the Gathites. They begin to suspect who he is, and say: "I wonder if this is not the warrior King David? It looks like him. Is not this the man about whom they used to make poetry, and about whom they composed a dance, so that the maidens of the city, reeling now on one foot and now on the other, used to sing: 'Saul has slain his thousands, but David has slain his tens of thousands?' Yes, it is very much like David. It is David." David, to escape their hands,

Pretends to be Demented.

He said within himself: "If I act crazily then of course these people will not injure me. No one would be so much of a coward as to assault a madman." So, one day, while these Gathites are watching David with increased suspicion, they see him standing by the door running his hands meaninglessly up and down the panels—scrabbling on the door as though he would climb up, his mouth wide open, drooling like an infant. I suppose the boys of the streets threw missiles at him; but the sober people of the town said: "This is not fair. Do you not see that he has lost his reason? Do not touch this madman. Hands off!" So David escaped; but he made of himself before all the ages! There was a majesty in King Lear's madness after Regan and Goneril, his daughters, had persuaded him to banish their sister Cordelia, and all the friends of the drama have been thrilled with that spectacle. The craziness of Meg Merrilies was weird and imposing, and is the most telling passage in Walter Scott's "Guy Mannering." There was a fascination about the insanity of Alexander Cruden, who made the best concordance of the Bible that the world ever saw—made it between the madhouses. Some time ago, while I was visiting the insane asylum on Blackwell's Island, a demented woman came up to me and said, in most tragic style:

> "God moves in a mysterious way,
> His wonders to perform;
> He plants His footsteps in the sea
> And rides upon the storm."

But there was nothing grand, nothing weird, nothing majestic, nothing sublime about this simulation on the part of David. Instead of trusting in the Lord, as he had on other occasions, he gathers before him a vast audience of all generations that were to come, and standing on that conspicuous stage of history, in the presence of all the ages, he impersonates

The Slavering Idiot!

"And he changed his behavior before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands, and scrabbled at the door of the gate, and let his spittle fall upon his beard."

Taking the behavior of David as a suggestion, I wish to tell you how many of the wise, and the brave, and the regal sometimes play the fool. And, in the first place, I remark, that those men as badly play the fool as this man of the text, who in any crisis of life take their case out of the hand of God. David, in this case, acted as though there were no God to lift him out of the predicament. What a contrast between his behavior, when this brave little man stood up in front of the giant ten feet in height, and this time, when he debased himself, and bedraggled his manhood, and affected insanity in order that he might escape from the grip of the Gathites. In the one case he played the hero. In the other case he played the fool. So does every man who, in the great crises of life, takes his case out of the hand of God.

The life of the most insignificant man in this house is too vast for any human management. One time, returning from the West, I very easily got on the locomotive while passing over the plains, and talked with the engineer; but coming on toward the Alleghany Mountains, I thought I would like to sit on the locomotive as it came down from the mountains amid that most wonderful scenery on this continent. I asked the engineer if I might ride, but he courteously denied me, for there the grade is so steep and so winding and so perilous, that he must not have any one on the locomotive who may divert his attention when eye and hand and foot and brain must be concentred, ready for the most sudden emergency. Well, my friends, life is so steep and so perilous and so exposed to sudden surprises, that none but the Lord Almighty can guide and engineer it, and our disasters come from the fact that the Lord to manage the train. Keep off the engine! Be willing to let God pull you where He wants to pull you. You have no right for an instant to surrender your sanity and manhood as David surrendered his. Put your trust in God, and He will take you through and over the mountains.

I stood on the beach, looking off upon the sea; and there was a strong wind blowing, and I noticed that some of the vessels were going that way, and other vessels were going another way. I said to myself: "How is it that the same wind sends one vessel in one direction and another vessel in another direction?" I found out, by looking, that it was the difference in

The Way they had the Sails Set.

And so does trouble come on this world. Some men it drives into the harbor of heaven, and other men it drives on the rocks. It depends upon the way you have your sails set. All the Atlantic and Pacific oceans of surging sorrow cannot sink a soul that has asked for God's pilotage. The difficulty is, that when we have misfortunes of any kind, we put them in God's hand, and they stay there a little while; and then we go and get them again, and bring them back.

A vessel comes in from a foreign port. As it comes near the harbor it sees a pilot floating about. It hails the pilot. The pilot comes on board, and he says: "Now, captain, you have had a stormy passage. Go down and sleep, and I will take the vessel into New York harbor." After awhile the captain begins to think: "Am I right in trusting this vessel to that pilot? I guess I'll go up and see." So he comes to the pilot and says: "Don't you see that rock? Don't you see those headlands? You will wreck the ship. Let me lay hold the helm for awhile for myself, and then I'll trust to you." The pilot becomes angry, and says: "I will either take care of this ship or not. If you want to, I will get into my yawl and go ashore, or back to my boat." Now we say to the Lord: "O God, take my life, take my all, in Thy keeping! Be Thou my guide; be Thou my pilot." We go along for a little while, and suddenly wake up, and say, "Things are going all wrong. O Lord, we are driving on these rocks, and Thou art going to let us be shipwrecked." God says: "You go and rest; I will take charge of this vessel, and take it into the harbor." It is God's business to comfort, and it is our business to be comforted.

Herbert, the great thinker, philosophized about himself, philosophized about this world, philosophized about everything, then in his dying moments asked that only one word might be cut upon his tombstone, and that word "Infelicissimus"—most unhappy—descriptive of the state of the lives and of the deaths of those who take their case out of the hand of God. The only appropriate inscription for their banqueting hall and their equipage and their grave and the wall of their eternal prison-house—"Infelicissimus." In drooling, moral idiocy, they are scrabbling at the door of their happiness, which never opens; miserably playing the fool.

Again, I remark that all those persons play the fool, as certainly did this man of the text, who allow to stop their salvation. David was wise about a great many things, but his cuttings up in the text for a little while eclipsed his character. And I know wise men and great men, competent for all other stations, who are acting a silly and foolish part in regard to the technicalities of religion. They ask us some questions which we cannot answer categorically, and so they burst into a broad guffaw, as though it is of any more interest to us than it ought to be to them. About the Atonement, about God's decrees, about man's destiny, they ask a great many questions which we cannot answer, and so they deride us, as though we could not ask them a thousand questions that they cannot answer, about their eyes, about their ears, about their finger-nails, about everything.

A Fool can Ask

a question that a wise man cannot answer. Oh you cavilling men! Oh you profound men! Oh you learned men, do please admit something. You have a soul? Yes. Will it live forever? Yes. Where? You say that Jesus Christ is not a divine Saviour. Who is He? Where will you go after you leave your law books and your medical prescriptions and your club-room and your newspaper office—where will you go to? Your body will be six feet underground. Where will your soul be? The black coat will be off, the shroud on. Those spectacles will be removed from your vision, for the sod will press your eyelids. Have you any idea that an earthly almanac describes the years of your lifetime? Of what stuff shall I gather the material for the letters of that word which describes your eternal home? Shall it be iron chain or amaranthine garland? The air that stirs the besweated locks of your dying pillow, will it come off a garden or a desert? Oh quit the puzzling questions and try these Momentous Questions.

Quit the small questions and try these great questions. Instead of discussing whether the serpent in Eden was figurative or literal, whether the Mediterranean fish did or did not swallow the recreant prophet, whether this and that, and the other thing is right or wrong, come and discuss one question: "How shall I get rid of my sins and win heaven?" That is the question for you. Yea, there have been men who have actually lost their souls because they thought there was a discrepancy between Moses and Professor Silliman—because they could not understand how there could be light before the sun rose—the light appearing in verse 3 of Genesis, and the sun appearing not until verse 16—and because they do not know how the sun could stand still without upsetting the universe, and because they had decided upon the theory of natural selection. A German philosopher in dying had for his chief sorrow that he had not devoted his whole life to the study of the dative case. Oh when your immortality is in peril, why quibble? Quit these non-essentials, my dear brother. In the name of God, I ask you in regard to these matters of the immortal soul, that you do not play the fool.

What is that man doing over in Bowling

Green, New York? Well, he is going in for a ticket for a transatlantic voyage. He is about the spots—the red spots on the ticket—and he is quarrelling about the peculiar signature of the president of the steamship company, and he is quarrelling about the manner of the clerk who hands him the ticket. How long has he been standing there? Three weeks. Meanwhile, perhaps, twenty steamers have gone out of port, and I hear the shriek of the steam-tug that could take him to the last vessel that could bear him to his engagement in London. Still he stands in Bowling Green discussing the ticket. What do you say in regard to that man? You say he is a fool. Well, in that very way are many men acting in regard to the matters of the soul. They are cavilling about the Atonement, the red spots on the ticket—about the character of the minister who hands them the ticket—about whether it has a divine or human signature, and meanwhile, all their opportunities for heaven are sailing out of the harbor, and I hear the last tap of the bell announcing their last chance for heaven. Go aboard! Do not waste any more time in higgling and carping and criticising and wondering, and, in the presence of an astounded heaven, playing the fool.

I go still further, and say to you that those men play the fool who undertake to Pay Eternity for Time.

How little care do we bestow upon the railroad depot where we stop twenty minutes to dine. We dash in and we dash out again. We do not examine the architecture of the building, nor the face of the caterer. We supply our hunger, we pay our money, and we put on our hat and take our place in the train. What is that depot as compared with the place for which we are bound? Now, my friends, this world is only a stopping-place on the way to a momentous destination, and yet how many of us sit down as though we had consummated our journey, as though we had come to the final depot, when our stopping here is as compared with our stopping there as is twenty minutes to twelve hours—yea, as the one hundredth part of a second compared with ten thousand million years!

Would Spain sell us Cuba for a bushel of wheat? Would England sell us India for a ton of coal? Would Venice sell us all her pictures for an American school-boy's sketch? Ah! that would be a better bargain for England, Spain, and Venice than that man makes who gives his eternity for time. Yet how many there are who are saying to-day, "Give me the world's dollars, and you may have the eternal rewards! Give me the world's applause, and you may have the garlands of God. Give me twenty, or forty, or sixty years of worldly successes, and I don't care what becomes of the future. Go away from me, God and angels, and all thoughts of the future!" But and Cleopatra, and Æsopus, who had one dish of food that cost one million four hundred thousand dollars; and Lentulus, who had a pond of fish worth a hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars; and Scaurus, who bought a country seat for twenty-nine million dollars; and Tiberius, who left at death a fortune of one hundred and eighteen millions one hundred and twenty thousand dollars? Where are they?

What is the use of your struggling for that which you cannot keep? As long as you have clothes, and food, and shelter and education for yourselves and your children, and the means for Christian generosity,

Be Satisfied.

You worry, and tug, and sweat, and wear your self out for that which cannot satisfy. Whole flocks of crows' feet on your temples and cheeks before they ought to have come there. You are ten years older than you ought to be, and yet you cannot take along with you into the future world even the two pennies on your eyelids to keep them shut after you are dead. And yet you hold on to this world with the avidity of the miser who persisted in having his bonds and mortgages and notes of hand in the bosom of his dressing-gown while he was dying, and in the last moment held his parchment in such a tight grip that the undertaker after death must almost break the man's fingers in order to get the bonds away.

Men are actually making that choice, while there are others who have done far differently. When they tried to bribe with money Martin Luther, some one said, "There's no use trying to do that—that Dutch beast cares nothing for gold." When they tried, by giving him a cardinal's hat, to bribe Savonarola, he stood up in his pulpit and cried out, "I will have no red hat save that of martyrdom, colored with my own blood." These men chose Christ amid great persecutions; but how many there are in this day, when Christianity seems to be popular, who are ashamed of Christ and not willing to take the hardships—the seeming hardships—of His religion! And, alas! for them, for long after the crash of the world's demolition they shall find that in all these years they were turning their backs upon the palaces of heaven, scrabbling on the door of this world's treasure house, the saliva of a terrific lunacy on their lips—horribly and overwhelmingly playing the fool.

Once more, I say to you that those men play the fool who, while they admit the righteousness of religion, set it down for future attendance. Do you know how many times occurs in the Bible? Over two hundred times. One of the shortest words in the Bible, and yet one of the grandest in meaning and ramifications. When does the Bible say is the best time to repent? Now. When does the Bible say that God will forgive? Now. When does God say is the only safe time to attend to the matters of the soul? Now. But that word "Now" melts away as easily as a snowflake in the evening rain. Where is the "now" of the dead of last year? the "now" of the dead of last month? the "now" of the dead of last week? the "now" of the dead of yesterday? Time picked it up in its beak and flew away with it.

Swammerdam and other naturalists tell us there are insects which within the space of one minute are born, fulfil their mission, celebrate their nuptials, and die; but this wonderful "now" is more short lived than they. It is a flash, a stroke, a glance. Its cradle is its grave. If men catch it at all, it is with quick clutch. Millions of men have lost their soul immortal because they did not understand the momentum and the ponderosity of that one word. All the strategic powers of hell are exerted in trying to subtract from the energy and emphasis of that word. They say it is only a word of three letters, while there is a better word of eight letters—"to-morrow." They say, "Throw away that small word and take this other grand one;" and so men say, "Give us 'to-morrow' and take away from us 'now;'" and between those two words is and a great multitude throng that road, jostling and elbowing each other, hastening on swifter and swifter to die. For how much would you walk the edge of the roof of your house? For how much would you come out on the most dangerous peak of the Matterhorn and wave your cap? You say, "No money could induce me to do it." And yet you stand to-day with one foot on a crumbling moment and the other foot lifted, not knowing where you will put it down, while the distance between you and the bottom of the depth beneath you no plummet can measure, no arithmetic calculate, no wing of lightning cleave. And yet the Bible tells us that unless a man has a new heart he cannot get into heaven; and some of you are not seeking for that new heart. In Mexico sometimes the ground suddenly opens, and a man standing near the gap can see down an appalling distance. But, oh, if to-day, at your feet, there should open the chasms of the lost world, how you would fling yourself back and hold the pew, and cry, "God save me—now! now! now!"

I greet you to-day, my brother, in the very gate of eternity. Some of us may live a longer and some of us may live a shorter time; but, at the longest, life is so short that we all stand of the great future. The next step—all the angels of God cannot undo the consequences. Will your exit from this life be a rising or a falling? The righteous go up. The Saviour helps them. Ministering spirits meet them. The doors of Paradise open to receive them. Up! up! up! Oh, what a grand thing it is to die with a strong faith in God, like that which Stonewall Jackson had when, in his expiring moments, he said, "Let us cross over the river, and lie down under the shade." But to leave this world unpreparedly is falling—falling from God, falling from hope, falling from peace, falling from heaven—swiftly, wildly, forever falling.

So it was with one who had been eminent for his intelligence, but who had omitted all preparation for the future world, and had come down to his last hour. He said to his wife, seated by the bedside, "Oh, don't talk to me about pain; it is the mind, woman, it is the mind! Of all the years of my life, I never lived one minute for heaven. It is awfully dark here," he whispered, "it is awfully dark. I seem to stand on the slippery edge of a great gulf. I shall fall! I am falling!" And with a shriek, as when a man tumbles over a precipice, he expired. Wise for this world, about all the matters of his immortal soul he was, his life-long, playing the fool.

I will take the case of some one in the building to-day, and ask you what you think about that case. He has been all his and churches, so that he knows his duty. Christ has offered to do all for that man that a divine Saviour can offer to do for a dying soul. Heaven has been offered him, yea, been pushed upon him, and yet he has not accepted it, and to-day he sits deliberately allowing his chances for life to go away from him. What do you say of that one? "Hallucinated," says one; "Monomaniacal," says another; "Playing the fool," says another. Oh, how many there are taking just that position! There is such a thing as pyromania, an insanity which disposes one to destroy buildings by fire; but who would have thought that there was a pyromania of the immortal nature, and that any one could be so struck through with that insanity as to have a desire and disposition to consume the soul?

I cannot consent to have you lose your souls. Come with me, and as in the summer time we go down to the beach and bathe in the waters, so to-day let us join hands and wade down into the summery sea of God's forgiveness. Roll over us, tides of everlasting love, roll over us! Dear Lord, we knock at the door of mercy, not as the demented knock, not knowing what they want, but knocking at the door of mercy, because we want to come in, while others run their meaningless hands up and down the panels, and scrabble at the gate, in the presence of God, and men, and angels, and devils, playing the fool.

The Brooklyn Tabernacle was Thronged on Tuesday, February 15th, with spectators to witness the marriage of Miss Edith Ellwood Talmage, the third daughter of the pastor, to Mr. Allan Edloe Donnan, a young merchant of Richmond, Va. Admission to the Tabernacle was by ticket, but owing to the dense mass of people desiring to be present a large number of ticket-holders were unable to gain an entrance. The body of the church had been specially reserved for private friends. The marriage ceremony was performed by Dr. Talmage, assisted by his brother, Rev. Dr. Goyn Talmage, of Port Jervis. After the ceremony there was a reception at Dr. Talmage's residence, to which four hundred persons were invited. Among the distinguished guests were General W. T. Sherman, ex-Senator Colquitt, Cyrus W. Field, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, and Clinton B. Fisk.

PEACE MADE AT THE ALTAR.

A FAMILY feud was ended by a marriage in Kentucky recently. It is now ten years since an Ohio farmer removed to Kentucky and settled near Newmarket. Soon after his arrival he had a quarrel with a neighbor over a piece of ground. There was a protracted and costly lawsuit which the Ohio man won. The enmity increased between the two families, and there were several shooting affrays which resulted in serious, but happily not fatal, wounds on both sides. No opportunity was lost by either party to do the other an injury. Last Christmas, however, the Ohio man's daughter, who was being educated at Cincinnati, came home for the holidays and accidentally met the son of the Kentucky man who is in business in St. Louis, and who was also home on a visit. The two fell in love and after several meetings in Cincinnati they decided on being married and notified their respective parents. The old people had the good sense to see that it would be ridiculous to keep up the quarrel any longer in the circumstances. They met and were reconciled, and the two fathers went together to Louisville to attend the wedding, which took place on Wednesday, February 2. The Christian world might profit by their example. Feuds between churches and individuals are incongruous when they acknowledge a common bond of union in Christ (Eph. 2 : 14, 16).

A SLEEPY DRIVER.

A SLEEPING man on the edge of a precipice had a narrow escape from death in Georgia recently. The Enquirer of Columbus, Ga., of February 1st, states that a man who resides in Americus has had an experience he will never forget. He mounted his buggy late at night to drive home. Being very tired, he went to sleep, and allowed the horse to manage things his own way, as was his custom when he was tired. Instead of pursuing the usual route, the horse took a nigh cut up the railroad. The travelling was good until an unfinished trestle was reached. The animal carried the buggy and its contents to the end of the trestle, and was forced to halt. There he stood peering into the darkness on a precipice forty feet high, when the man awoke and comprehended the situation. As it was too dark to extricate the horse and buggy from the perilous position, the tired man was compelled to wait five hours for daylight. He did not sleep during all those five hours, tired as he was. There are many men whose whole life is like that journey. They close their eyes, silence their conscience, and let their appetites and passions carry them along the perilous road. Unhappily, very few of them awake before they plunge over the precipice to death eternal (Eph. 5 : 14, 15).

AN UNPLEASANT NEIGHBOR.

A WONDERFUL witch is declared to be living in Pennsylvania. A dispatch from Williamsport to the New York Sun states that in Lancaster County there is a woman, said to be eighty-five years old, whose house is the resort of persons for twenty miles around, who are in any kind of trouble. "She will, for a fee, give an applicant a charm to ward off lightning from his buildings, confound his enemies by bewitching them, making their wells run dry, or bringing any dire punishment upon them that the applicant will pay for. She will undertake the job of stunting the growth of a baby, destroying a rival's beauty, separating man and wife, or settling lovers' quarrels. Husbands take their wives, fathers their children, and young men their sweethearts to her for treatment for all ills and the removal of evil spells, and to obtain charms that will be potent in love and business. If a child is deformed, demented, blind, tongue-tied, or unnaturally afflicted in any way, it is taken to her at once. In her healing operations she uses no medicines, but depends upon her 'charms,' which consist of breathing on the afflicted parts, waving the hand over them, accompanied by a few muttered words, the purport of which no one understands. The condition without which she will not consent to operate on an applicant is implicit faith in and reverence for the operator." When that condition is complied with results follow which science cannot explain. It is evident, however, that the people are cured not by the woman but by their own faith, which would have cured them just as certainly if it had been exercised in a piece of wood or an image of stone or a bottle of Lourdes water. The sad fact is that men are willing to believe even to credulity, yet they will not believe on Him who can give salvation for soul and body (Mark 11 : 22–24).

A LAWYER RETAINED.

A DETECTED thief's cool proposal disarmed a lawyer's anger recently. A Texas journal states that an Austin lawyer, returning recently to his office after a brief absence, found a tramp there stealing some law books, which he intended to pawn. Seizing the intruder by the collar, the lawyer exclaimed: "You scoundrel, I'll have you sent to the penitentiary!" "Let go my neck, colonel," said he. "If you are going to have me tried, I reckon I'd better engage you as my lawyer, as you have the luck to be on hand." Whether the thief would have had a zealous advocate if the case had gone to trial may be doubted, but he was saved from the risk by the lawyer laughingly releasing him. The thief, however, evidently thought it would be to his interest. Not so wise are they who, knowing themselves to be guilty before God, and knowing, too, that they must appear at the judgment-seat, neglect the offer Christ makes to be their Advocate with the Father (1 John 2 : 1).

A CONSUMPTIVE EVANGELIST HEALED.

THE following testimony of a young man's healing, related recently at Bethshan, is published in this month's number of Thy Healer:

"I have not studied the subject of divine healing, but I know the Lord, and, having a very strong wish to become an evangelist, which so moved me that I could not resist it, I went to Captain Smith, who is the Secretary of the Evangelization Society, and told him what my desire was. 'But,' he said, 'you look so ill.' Then I told him the truth—that my lungs were affected—that I suffered from hemorrhage of the lungs and had thrown up much blood. 'But,' said Captain Smith, 'it is death to you, when in such a state, to go out preaching, and especially to go out as our men do, and work as they do; but,' he added, 'I will give you a note to Dr. Kidd, and you can go and consult him.' 'Well,' I thought to myself, 'I will go somewhere else than Dr. Kidd's for healing. If the Lord wants me to preach, He must heal me.' I then went to my room and in prayer said, 'If Thou, Lord, wilt have me preach the Gospel, heal my lungs.' It was on a Saturday morning that I saw Captain Smith, and it was on the Saturday afternoon I went to the Lord; and when I presented the note to Dr. Kidd, on Monday morning, the doctor examined my chest, but did not discover anything wrong. He examined me the second time, and then said, 'I can hardly believe what you have told me; you are as sound as a bell.' 'I can explain that, doctor,' I said, and I related to him what I have told you."

This young man has been preaching for the Evangelization Society now for two years.

A COURAGEOUS CHAIRMAN.

A LECTURE was delivered recently in India by a native teacher, in which he sketched the characteristics of the only religion which, in his opinion, had any chance of succeeding with the native races. The Indian Witness gives a report of this lecture, with the remarks of the chairman, Sir Charles Atchison, who, with remarkable penetration, put his finger on the weak point of the lecturer's argument.

"The religion of the future in India," said the lecturer, "must be one which will 'call out the mysterious faculty of faith,' which is the characteristic, par excellence, of the Hindu nature; 'and which shall discover and worship a divinity in mountain, river, tree; in man and animal; in fire, wind, and sky; in every striking object of nature.' It will also be conspicuously ritualistic; for, rites, ceremonies, symbols of all kinds, parables, and allegories, bells, vestments, incense, flowers, and ornaments have an indescribable charm for the Hindu mind.' It will be emotional, exuberant, ecstatic, inebriatic; for 'a monotheism of reserve and respectability, a cold, polite, formal religion will never suit the Hindu race.'"

Sir Charles Atchison said: "There have been national religions which have decayed, and I do not think that mere national sentiment and unity will be found to be an element of permanency in any religion. What strikes me is this, that what we require is not only to have the true monotheistic idea, but we require to grasp the truth in the relation of that idea to the individual mind. We are required not only to know the true God, but to know His relations to the individual soul; and that religion which shows how the life which is besmirched with evil can be purified, how the proud heart can be humbled, how the wicked will can be made wholly pure and righteous—in proportion as a religion strikes the truth in regard to these relations, that religion promises to be not only the religion of India, but the religion of the whole world."

A MISSIONARY'S HOME IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

A LETTER from Rev. W. F. Re Qua, received a few days ago, describes the early experiences of the self-sacrificing missionary and his devoted wife in their new sphere. Those experiences have been severe, as they expected—more severe, we may hope, than any that are to come. Still, their faith sustains them, and they are anxious to press forward with the work to which Mr. Re Qua believes himself called. An attractive opportunity has been afforded him to return to a more civilized sphere, but it has been declined, and he is still at McAllister, Ind. Ter.

"We have been housekeeping," writes Mr. Re Qua, with a cheerfulness that is wonderful in the circumstances—"We have been housekeeping in a room twelve feet by fourteen, which was supplied with more ventilating crevices than were necessary for health and comfort. We have battened them up now with paper, which has made it a little better, but in some of the severe cold weather lasting a week at a time we have suffered. But a house is building for our occupancy by the kindness of a citizen, who says he will donate one hundred dollars of its cost and give us time to pay the rest; this seemed to be absolutely necessary, as no house could be had to rent, and if there were, the rents are so high here that we should soon pay in rent as much as it will cost to build. I have preached twice every Sunday except one since coming here, and many times on week days. A number have made a profession of faith in Jesus, and among them some Indian young men. I am only waiting until the Lord shall send us means for a conveyance to go to the interior among the blanket or wild tribes. So intense is my longing to go that I have to pray for grace to wait. I shall need a little tent to camp out nights in the trips, as I shall often be many miles from any habitation. Well, dear reader, if you could only see the interest manifested among the Indians in our coming to them, how glad they appear, it would touch your heart.

"My wife also engages in evangelistic labor as before, with much acceptability, as health and family cares admit, and is now about organizing a W. C. T. U., which is much needed for work among the coal miners, many of whom get liquor from the smugglers. We have been driven to the Lord in prayer for our present needs, and He has come to our rescue through kind friends, readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which was timely, as it helped to pay for fencing around the house and to pay for having some land broken for a garden, which, if we can get seeds and fruit-trees, will greatly help toward a living, as vegetables are very expensive. Apples, peaches, pears, strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, and grapes grow finely here where they have been tried.

"We are trusting Jesus for all, and our faith has not once been daunted, for it 'stands in the power of God.' We have been much encouraged in our labors by recent remembrances, for which we sincerely thank readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

PROPHESYING WAR.

The Rev. Mr. Baxter Says France Will Conquer.

IRELAND TO BE FREE.

JEROME NAPOLEON THE COMING ANTICHRIST. THE END TO BE IN 1900.

[With the above head-lines the New York Herald, the leading daily paper in America, gave in substance the following remarks, in its issues on February 13 and 14, 1887 :]

THE Rev. M. Baxter, lately arrived from England, has come over to tell Americans that they have got just about thirteen years more in which to be wicked and paint things red, and then will come the fireworks. He is the editor of the London Christian Herald and a prophet.

A Herald reporter had a long conversation with the prophet in his office in the Bible House, New York, last evening, and the reporter has made up his mind to leave off cigarettes, give up all his bad habits, and join a church in hopes that he will be ticked through the millennium that is to begin in 1900 and last for a thousand years.

All the Signs.

Mr. Baxter looks like a prophet. He has a full beard, a thoughtful eye, and a crop of brown hair.

"It is a certain thing that there will be a great European war within a year or two," said he.

"How do you know?" asked the reporter.

"Because Daniel's Prophecies of a ten-toed Image and a ten-horned Beast in his second and seventh chapters foretell that about ten years before the End Cæsar's Roman Empire will be revived within ten political divisions, and this can only be effected by a general European war."

The End Not Yet.

"And how do you locate the date for the end of the world?"

"Not the literal end of the world—we don't believe in that—but the end of this dispensation and the beginning of the millennium. There are several dates that show the end will come in 1900, the period predicted by Matthew Henry, the great commentator, nearly two centuries ago. Perhaps the most simple and generally accepted is the Biblical statement, that as it took six days to make the world and there was a seventh day of rest, the world will last for six days of a thousand years each, and a seventh day of a thousand years that shall be the millennium. Chronological records show that there were about 4100 years from Adam to the birth of Christ, so that in the year 1900 A.D. the 6000 years will be fulfilled."

France to be Victorious.

"What will be the nature of the European war?"

"It is the war that is now brewing. France will conquer Germany and extend her possessions to the Rhine. The conflict will not be confined to these two nations, however. It will be a general European conflict, as the twenty-three countries that now exist within Cæsar's Roman Empire must be resolved into ten; the five in the western or Latin half being Britain, France, Spain, Italy, and Austria, and the five in the eastern or Greek half being Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, and the Balkan States. They will be in one confederation and will be all kingdoms, so that the Republic of France and Queen Victoria's reign have but a little longer to run. When that war occurs it will be the fulfilment of the first great sign."

"What will Become of Ireland?"

"It must be separated from England, as it was not in Cæsar's Roman Empire. Just what sort of government Ireland will have we do not know, but she certainly will have a Parliament of her own in Dublin. All this is prophesied by the ten-toed image and the ten-horned wild beast of Daniel 2 and 7. But then comes the little eleventh horn, signifying a rising king that waxes great and strong. The Beast is crimson, showing the red republic communism, and so on. That eleventh king will be the head of the communists. He will first come into power somewhere in Asia Minor, then become King of Syria, and will enter into a covenant with the Hebrews in Palestine, and later on will become Emperor of the Roman Empire. He will get his power through the communists and the Roman Church that will side with them, and then for about a year the Pope will have great temporal power, until the Emperor, 'the wilful King,' overthrows him. Then he will rule the whole world."

"Who will this Be?"

"In Revelation 9 : 11 it is stated that 'his name is in the Greek tongue Apollyon,' that is, Napoleon, probably Jerome, the present head of the Bonaparte family, as in appearance he exactly answers to the description in Daniel 8 of a king of fierce countenance, etc. He will be the Antichrist, and will persecute Christians, killing thousands of them by the guillotine during the three and one half years of tribulations all over the world."

"Will this country suffer?"

"The labor organizations will continue to grow stronger and stronger until within ten years from now they will overturn the Government and take the power into their own hands. Then will come famine, pestilence, earthquakes and terrible troubles, until the second coming of Christ, when the earth will be nearly depopulated and the righteous and their future descendants only left to enjoy the millennium of a thousand years."

Dr. McGlynn "Too Previous."

"Who will be the last Pope?"

"Probably Cardinal Lucien Napoleon. The course taken by Dr. McGlynn in espousing the cause of Socialism is the same course that will be taken by the Pope in several years' time. Dr. McGlynn is only a little ahead of the times. The Church of Rome is ultimately to side with the Socialists, and in return to be supported by them, as prefigured in Revelation 17."

"Are your prophetic ideas entertained to any extent among the clergy?"

"Those can hardly help but see the truth of the matter who study the prophecies, but, fearful of ridicule, they are timid about expressing their opinions on the subject."

A Prophet of Woe.

[The same newspaper gave the following report on February 14, of the lecture :]

The upper lecture hall of Cooper Union was filled yesterday by a crowd of curious people, attracted by an advertisement announcing that the Rev. M. Baxter, an Episcopal clergyman, would reveal a direful future for the world during the next thirteen years.

By an ingenious computation of dates and periods of time, based upon Revelation and the prophecies of Daniel, Mr. Baxter has reached the conclusion that the millennium will begin in 1900. In order to accomplish all the events prophetically called for it is a necessity to pile up such a series of misfortunes in the next thirteen years that no man not morally conscious of deserving salvation can look to the immediate future with the least satisfaction. In the first place, a tremendous European war is to begin, not later than 1889, resulting in the conquest of Germany by France and a general shaking up of other nations, until, within the limits of the former Roman Empire of the Cæsars, only ten kingdoms will remain. These are the nations typified by Daniel's ten-horned Beast. Great Britain is to lose Ireland and India, while France is to gain Belgium, Luxembourg, Rhenish Prussia, Switzerland, and Tunis, and such parts of Baden, Wurtemburg, and Bavaria as are not absorbed by Austria. Of course the present German Empire is to be practically wiped out.

Then will rise the Antichrist, who must be a Napoleon, whose name is taken from Apollyon in Revelation 9 : 11 and 13 : 18. By adding up the numbers attached to the letters of this name, care being taken to spell it "Napoleonti," in Greek characters, the number of the Beast, 666, is obtained. He will first be King of Syria for two or three years before establishing his authority over France. Prince Jerome, Mr. Baxter thinks, will be the Beast, for his character answers to that prophesied for the Antichrist. He will make a covenant with the Jews about 1893 for about seven years, mentioned in Daniel 9 : 27, and as the present dispensation will end seven years (seven years and two and a half months, to be precise) after that covenant is made, we shall have an exact date for the beginning of the millennium.

About 1895–6 will occur the second coming of Christ. Mr. Baxter, desiring to avoid minute precision, fixes the time as within two years and one week to two years and three weeks after the date of the covenant with the Jews. At the second coming 144,000 waiting Christians will be caught up alive into heaven.

About 1897 will begin the three and a half years of "great tribulation" described in Revelation, preceded by several months of universal war. The horrors of this time no tongue can tell. An English artist has feebly given a foretaste of them in a choice selection of highly-colored illustrations, which yesterday adorned the walls of the lecture-room, and no adequate idea can be given of what the world has to suffer without seeing these pictures; indeed, people of artistic tastes and sympathies felt in looking at them strong premonitions of agony, and were almost willing not to wait for the realization.

The lesson taught by these prophecies was to prepare for the second coming of Christ at once, and not to delay an instant.

A JAPANESE PRIEST CONVERTED.

THE Rev. J. B. Hail, writing from Osaka, Japan, to the Missionary Record, gives the following report of a testimony which was given publicly at Gobo by Wasa San, formerly a Buddhist priest :

"I was given, at an early age, to the priesthood (Buddhist). I was raised in a temple, and was diligently taught the doctrines and the ceremonies and ritual of the sect. I at last completed my course so far as to receive authority from my bishop to take charge of a temple. I received a call to the temple where I was raised, and had charge also of five others. I was clothed in silks and crapes. I prayed for the people and got lots of money for it. When any one died I read prayers for them and wrote a new name for them, and got well paid for it. But some of my friends said I was taking money from foolish people and professing to have power by praying for them to deliver them from purgatory. The worst of it was my conscience told me they were right. Besides, I did in secret those things which I preached against openly, and my conscience accused me daily, until at last I resolved to quit the priesthood.

"The Kocho being a friend of mine, through him I received the permit to quit. But now, having thrown up my temple, and with it Buddhism, I was lonesome, and, as I had always been a worshipper, my heart was hungry for God. I must have something to worship. But what? I had no faith in Buddah, none in Shinto. I was without God and without hope. At that time I came to Tanabe on business and stopped at the 'Kiyohechi Hotel.' That same night [providentially, as Peter went to Cornelius, Acts 10] the missionary came with Yamamoto San and put up at the same house. I heard the talking and came in and inquired about Christianity, and was told to read the New Testament. I finally got the same and read it, and found the God I sought. While a priest I could dress in silk and live on the fat of the land; now I am comparatively a poor man, but am happy with it all. Formerly I taught error and taught men to worship idols. Now I know the true God and rejoice to teach the truth."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Resignation of the Secretary of the Treasury, which has been frequently rumored of late, was definitely announced on February 16th by the publication of a letter from Mr. Manning to the President. That letter decisively negatives the reports current that Mr. Manning's retirement was due to a disagreement between him and the President. The Secretary evidently quits the cabinet with reluctance, and solely on the ground of physical inability to perform the duties of his office. Although he has happily recovered to a considerable extent from his serious illness of last year, Mr. Manning is manifestly sincere in saying, "There is an exhausting round of daily administrative tasks which, however subordinate and clerical, an efficient Secretary of the Treasury cannot or should not evade. These are tasks beyond my present strength." It is understood that this breakdown of health is largely the result of the Secretary's conscientious effort to attend personally to matters usually left to the care of assistants. The President, in accepting the resignation, expresses profound and obviously sincere regret, and is unstinted in his praise of Mr. Manning's work. The resignation is to take effect on April 1st. Up to the close of last week no nomination of a successor had been sent by the President to the Senate.

The Anti-Polygamy Bill Finally Passed the Senate on Friday, and was sent to the President. The conference report elicited strong protests from several Senators, who contended that it was not constitutional, and that it was an act of confiscation. Mr. Edmunds, in reply, said that the bill provided for the payment of all the debts of the emigrating company and the return to the stockholders of their investments, and that it was only the residue of the property, for which there was no claimant, that was to be escheated for the use of the common schools. The stringent provisions of the bill, if honestly administered, will go far to wipe out the blot of polygamy from the country.

The Nomination of a Successor to the Late General Hazen, Chief of the Signal Service Bureau, was sent to the Senate on February 15th. The President has selected Captain Adolphus W. Greely for the post. The appointment causes some surprise, as it involves a promotion from a Captaincy to the rank of Brigadier-General. It is, however, in one sense a regular promotion, as Captain Greely is next on the line, and has been identified with the bureau for eighteen years. The public cannot but be gratified by the nomination, for Greely's services and sufferings have not been forgotten, and deserve to be rewarded. It will be remembered that he was in command of the Arctic expedition which was located at Lady Franklin Bay, and which endured the horrors of starvation at Cape Sabine. His portrait and life appeared in this journal on August 21st, 1884, shortly after he and his surviving men were rescued. It may be hoped that the nomination will be confirmed by the Senate. That body owes Captain Greely some such compensation, for when he was starving at Cape Sabine it aided and abetted Senator Sherman in his attempt to delay the dispatch of an expedition for his relief.

The River and Harbor Bill, which Passed the House by an astute trick, has been increased in the Senate. The "amendments" added there call for an expenditure of nearly three millions, bringing the total amount to be appropriated by the bill up to $10,385,300. One of the worst features of it is that in one or two cases the items are merely first instalments on new work. The result will be that if an honest, economical Congress should ever be elected, it will have to decide whether more money shall be spent in completing comparatively useless works or whether the money already spent shall be wasted. Possibly, now that the Senate has added large items to the bill, there may be an opportunity for completing the debate which was cut off in the House, and an attempt made to reduce the total.

The Danger of Stoves in Railroad Cars in cases of accident, which was shown in the Vermont disaster on February 5th, as it has been in former calamities, has at last led railroad managers to consider the possibility of devising some other mode of heating the cars. An experiment is to be tried with steam on the New York Central and Hudson River Road. In the system to be tried, a main steam-pipe runs from the engine under the whole train. This pipe is tapped under each car, and the steam is taken into what practically amounts to a number of radiators in the car. Peculiarities of the system are the devices for joining the main pipe at the ends of cars. The coupling pieces are of metal, are packed with plumbago, and by telescoping into each other secure a joint which the inventor claims is perfectly air tight.

Remarkable Progress in Rebuilding the City is reported from Charleston, S. C. The News and Courier states that during the five months which have elapsed since the earthquake much has been done to restore the city to its former condition. The damages by the earthquake were roughly estimated at $5,000,000. The aid so lavishly and generously poured into Charleston has enabled those who could not do so with their limited means to rebuild their houses, while others who were able have also not been idle. Since the night of the 31st of August, 1886, the city has risen from its ruins. Remunerative work has been furnished to over five thousand home mechanics, while over fifteen hundred mechanics from abroad have arrived, many of whom will make Charleston their home. Of the $800,000 subscribed by citizens in the various States, $200,000 has been applied to the restoration of churches, $100,000 to rebuild the hospitals and almshouses, and the balance to erecting homes for those who would otherwise be homeless.

The Coming War in Europe Appears to be regarded as inevitable by the trans-Atlantic correspondents of American journals. The correspondent of the New York Times, whose observations and predictions have hitherto proved remarkably accurate, expresses his conviction on the subject without ambiguity. He says, after mentioning a number of isolated facts: "So, looking over the continent and seeing the bustle of martial preparations among the little as well as the big, everybody getting hastily ready to fight and nobody knows how a fight is to be prevented. All are agreed that if a single spark is struck the whole heavens will be ablaze from Armenia to Finland. Looking from the vantage ground of an insular standpoint, it is impossible to profess much hope that peace will be maintained." In France there was manifested last week a disposition to hope that Bismarck's attitude was merely assumed to scare the electors into electing Government candidates, but in Alsace, where the German is understood better, there is no such error. There every household is hurried with preparations for war, houses in Metz, Colmar, and Pfalsbourg being crowded to the attic with provisions, while business is said to be practically suspended. What the spark may be that will fire the combustible mass cannot be pointed out, but it may be a small one, and it is not without significance that such a spark is descried in the intimation given by Russia last week, that she has determined under certain probable circumstances to occupy Bulgaria.

The Trial of the Irish Members of Parliament whose portraits appeared in this journal on February 3d commenced in Dublin on Tuesday of last week. They pleaded not guilty to the charge of conspiracy to induce tenants to refuse paying their rents. The Crown then proceeded to swear in a jury for the trial of the defendants. Several Catholic jurors, including one named O'Brien, were ordered to stand aside. Counsel for the defendants protested, and for a while there was much commotion. Mr. O'Brien, one of the defendants, declared he would rather be sent to jail at once than be submitted to a trial before a jury composed so unfairly. Protests were made in the House of Commons on the same subject, but a motion respecting it was peremptorily suppressed by the Speaker.

The Case of Dr. McGlynn is a Prominent Subject of discussion in Roman Catholic councils at the Vatican. It would appear that he is condemned there rather for insubordination than for advocating socialism. A special correspondent of the New York Herald, cabling to that journal from Rome, says: "Father McGlynn's published defiance has not lost him the personal sympathy of his Roman friends. I have discussed his case with many ecclesiastics here, and there is only one opinion as to the mistake he has made. It is universally thought in Rome that the matters for which he has been removed from his charge went beyond the limits of social or political economy, and his coming is confidently expected. If he comes he will have a fair hearing. Nearly all the ecclesiastical authorities are quite disposed to treat him not only with justice, but with indulgent kindness."

The Celebration of Queen Victoria's Jubilee has already commenced in India by the release of twenty-five thousand inmates of prisons, being one third of the total number of prisoners in that country. On February 16th in all the chief cities of India imposing fêtes were held in commemoration of the jubilee. The celebration lasted three days. In all the Christian churches and in the native temples and mosques thanksgiving services have been held. In the newly-acquired territory of Burmah the jubilee was celebrated by a parade of troops and the firing of salutes. Sir Charles Bernald, Chief Commissioner, in the presence of the native officials, ex-King Theebaw and Chief Tsawbwa, made a speech, in which he reviewed the successful reign of the Empress Queen. He warmly greeted the Chinese officials present, assuring them that the interests of China would be protected. Robes were presented to six native priests, and minor titles were conferred upon a number of Burmese officials. In England it is a significant fact that there is less enthusiasm about the celebration than was expected. One prominent journal invited its readers to vote on the best way of celebrating the jubilee, but declined to go on with the voting when it was found that a large majority of votes were being cast for the proposal that the best way of celebrating the jubilee would be to invite her Majesty to abdicate.

The Rev. M. Baxter Delivered Three Discourses on prophecy last Sunday in Cosmopolitan Hall, Broadway and Forty-first Street, New York. There were good audiences at each service. His exposition, which clearly showed the indication of prophecy that in the coming struggle between France and Germany the issue of the last war would be reversed, caused a marked sensation among his hearers. His remarks were listened to with deep attention, and the questions addressed to him for further light at the close of his sermon proved that he had been closely and intelligently followed by his hearers. Mr. Baxter announced that two conferences would be held in the same building this day (Thursday), when ministers of the city and neighborhood would deliver addresses.

A Revival Work Has Been Commenced in Tennessee through God's blessing on the reading of this journal. A woman in the backwoods of Tennessee, writing to a friend who had sent her the HERALD, says: "I cannot express my thanks to you for sending me THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It was so much company for us during the cold weather; we could read when we could do nothing else. I think the neighborhood generally has been benefited by your act of kindness to me. It has been the means of arousing some Christians to active work, and has been the cause of several small revivals at home. You sent me the paper as a present, not knowing or thinking of the good it might do others. That is the way our lives are made up; a small act of kindness sometimes brings in a rich reward. I hope to do something for you that will give you as much genuine pleasure as the paper has given us."

The Death of Bishop Greene, of Mississippi, on February 13th, deprives the Protestant Episcopal Church of one of its most venerated and beloved leaders. The venerable bishop was in his eighty-ninth year, having been born at Wilmington, N. C., in 1798. He was ordained in 1820. He became Professor of Rhetoric in the University of North Carolina, of which he was a graduate, in 1837, and was elected first Bishop of Mississippi in 1849. Bishop Green was one of the founders of the University of the South at Suwanee. His gentleness and saintly character won for him the respect of the whole church, and when, in 1868, the Southern bishops appeared for the first time in nine years at the General Convention, it was Bishop Green's wise and delicate words that removed all acrimony and unbrotherly feeling.

A Girl Precipitated from a Toboggan Slide in Chicago sustained serious injuries on Friday last. She and her lover visited the slide, and after watching the toboggans for some time, resolved to make the trip. The girl insisted on steering, though warned that it needed strength and coolness. All went well until about half way down the incline, when the speed became so great that the girl lost all control of the toboggan, and it ran against the side rail of the slide. The force of the collision threw the girl completely over the rail to the ground below. In falling her head struck the wire of the electric light, cutting a gash that extended from the eye to the back of the head. Her right arm was broken in three places, and her left arm dislocated. The girl was taken to the County Hospital. Her injuries are such that, if she escapes death, she will be disfigured for life. She is not the first who has started on a downward path believing that it is easy to guide the course, and has been ruined. Many a soul has been lost by similar self-confidence (Prov. 28 : 26).

The News that the Large Ocean Steamship Wisconsin of the Guion Line was aground off Fire Island caused some excitement in New York on Wednesday of last week. She was known to have on board about one hundred and fifty passengers, the English mails, and a valuable cargo. The sea was very rough, and the life-saving corps made several unsuccessful attempts to reach her. Life lines were shot toward her but fell short, and a boat that was sent to bring off passengers was capsized after making only one trip on which but six were brought off. No injury was done to the ship except the loss of her rudder and stern-post, and at the next tide she floated off, and was towed into port. Seafaring men are puzzled to account for the accident, as the Captain of the Wisconsin took an observation only sixteen hours before she ran aground, and the course he laid out then, which should have taken him fifteen miles further south, was strictly followed. One naval officer explained it on the ground that the Captain had not made sufficient allowance for the strength of the current, which is variable at this time of the year. He said, "A captain never can know his course exactly, particularly near land. He must lay a course to avoid running risks as much as possible, and then cast his sounding-line when he comes near a coast." That appears to be a very good rule as to ships, as it certainly is in the voyage of life. There would not be so many of the spiritual disasters which bring reproach on the cause of Christ if Christian men were more careful to "avoid risks," and more frequently tested their present position instead of relying on past assurance (II Cor. 13 : 5).

A Life was Risked to Save a Nickel in New York last week. A belated traveller, desiring to go up-town on February 16th, attempted to steal a ride on the Elevated Railroad. Rather than go upstairs and pay the five-cent fare, he climbed one of the pillars under the Cortlandt Street station, and attempted to squeeze his body between the track and the platform. The aperture was too small, and the man was caught between the iron girders, and was unable to go forward or backward. His head and shoulders projected over the track, while his legs dangled in mid-air. Seeing a train coming, he shouted, and his cries alarmed the officials, who signalled to the engineer to stop. The engine was but a few yards away when it was brought to a stand. The man's life was only just saved. The press reports say that, though not intoxicated, the man had been drinking. That is probable, as we cannot conceive of a man in his sober senses endangering his life to save a nickel. His folly, however, was not so besotted as that of men who risk their souls to become millionaires (Matt. 16 : 26).

An Enslaved Man was Set at Liberty in Greenville, S. C., on February 9th. A dispatch to the New York World from Charleston states that a colored man living near Greenville heard that his brother, whom he had not seen since the war, when he was a child, was being held in slavery by a man in a lone farmhouse on the other side of Hog Back Mountain. He immediately started in search of him, and found him at length in utter ignorance of emancipation. The farmer had kept him secluded, and prevented him holding any communication with his friends. He was made to work hard, was often whipped, received no wages, few clothes, and was scantily fed. He is a large-framed man, with a dull unintelligent look, unable to read, and with not the slightest suspicion of being a free man. His master had taken advantage of his ignorance to keep him in servitude. How many captives of Satan are similarly held! They think the chains of evil habit or past sins cannot be broken, and do not know that Christ has already wrought their deliverance and offers them liberty (Gal. 4 : 4, 5).

A Man was Drowned in a Gutter in New York on Friday night. As a German resident was hurrying home through the storm about nine o'clock he stumbled over some object in the gutter at Forty-seventh Street and Avenue C. He stooped to find out what it was, and to his horror discovered that it was the body of a man. He notified a policeman, who summoned a physician, but it was too late, the man was dead. There were no bruises on him, and his watch and valuables had not been disturbed; it was evident, therefore, that in crossing the gutter he must have fallen, and being stunned, and falling face downward, was drowned before he could recover consciousness. The water was but a foot deep, but it had proved sufficient to destroy life. Had the man been on some cliff that overhung the sea, or on the brink of a mighty river, he would have been more careful; but he was heedless in walking near a common gutter that he could easily step across. Many spiritual calamities come in the same way; Satan's most successful pitfalls are those into which men fall when they are off their guard (I Cor. 10 : 12).

A Wife Committed Suicide to Avoid Disgrace in Boston last week. About a year ago she was married to a young sailor, and the couple went to live with the husband's brother in Boston. The sailor was frequently away on his voyages, but when at home he and his wife lived happily, and were evidently extremely fond of each other. During his last voyage, however, a young man who had known the wife before her marriage called upon her, and afterward visited her several times. Her sister-in-law viewed these visits with suspicion. On Thursday last she accused her of being unfaithful to her husband, and declared her intention of denouncing her to him when he returned. The accused wife protested that she was innocent, but knowing how difficult it would be to disprove such a charge, she dreaded her husband's return. All that night she lay awake weeping and bemoaning her cruel position, until by morning she was almost demented. She went out and bought poison, took it, and died, declaring her innocence and her entire devotion to her husband with her last breath. It is a pity that there was no one at hand to point the distressed woman to God. Had she been living in communion with Him she would not have been so disturbed by a false accusation, but would have committed her cause to Him who judgeth righteously, and waited for Him to vindicate her (Ps. 37 : 40).

BRIEF NOTES.

THE New York Bible Society presented 45,524 Bibles to immigrants arriving at Castle Garden last year.

A revival is reported from the Presbyterian Church in Annapolis, Md., which has been holding evangelistic services with good results. Already many persons have been gathered into the church, and the end is not yet.

Promises and money to the amount of $29,007 have been received toward Mr. Moody's Birthday Memorial Fund for his Northfield work. The treasurer of the fund is Mr. James Talcott, No. 108 Franklin Street, New York.

Immense audiences have been drawn to hear Mr. Moody in his evening meetings at the Western Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, Chicago, and in the afternoon for Christian workers at the Lincoln Avenue Congregational Church, in the north division of the city.

Ben Hogan's work at Woodland, Cal., has been much blessed. A letter to us from the Young Men's Christian Association of that city says: "Mr. Hogan has improved wonderfully the past four years; he is a very forcible and energetic speaker, and we as an association wish him prosperity and happiness wherever he may go."

A Faith Home, named "Beulah," has recently been opened in Grand Rapids, Mich. This Home was dedicated on February 10th. The founder of this Home is Mrs. Dora G. Griffin, who has herself been healed of eighteen years' partial blindness in answer to prayer. The Home is now open to the sick and suffering whom the Lord shall send. For further information address Mrs. D. G. Griffin, 91 Baxter Street, Grand Rapids, Mich.

The White Cross Society of New York City, the Rev. Dr. B. F. De Costa, President, will hold its second annual meeting in the Church of St. John the Evangelist, West Eleventh Street and Waverley Place, Sunday evening, February 27th. Several new tracts, envelope size, of the White Cross series have been issued by Messrs. E. P. Dutton & Co. at $1 and $2 the hundred. The Society is growing rapidly, and doing good work in New York.

The annual session of the Intercollegiate Young Men's Christian Association commenced on February 18th in Dwight Hall, of Yale College. The programme included prayer by the Rev. Dr. Barbour, of Yale; addresses of welcome by President Dwight and D. C. Huntington, President of the Yale branch of the association, and addresses by Mr. Elbert B. Munroe, who gave to Yale the funds necessary for the erection of Dwight Hall. A large number of colleges are represented.

Clergymen and Evangelists who will Allow Copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be placed in the seats of churches, or will have them distributed at the doors, will be supplied with assorted parcels of back numbers if they will write to the Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Gospel Union (or Gospel Army, as it has been styled in some places), of which the Rev. M. Baxter is President, has now mission stations in America in the following cities: Philadelphia, Pa.; Warsaw and Peru, Ind.; St. Paul, Minn.; Omaha and Lincoln, Neb.; Orangeville and Ottawa and St. Andrew, N. B.; and Charlottetown, P. E. I., in the Dominion of Canada, besides more than seventy mission stations in Britain. Evangelistic Gospel meetings are held at these stations generally every week evening and Sundays in halls rented permanently by evangelists, and many sinners are being converted by this Gospel work. Contributions, which are urgently needed for carrying on and extending the movement, should be sent to Rev. M. Baxter, 63 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

CHRIST'S WORK NO FAILURE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth: and the isles shall wait for his law."—ISAIAH 42 : 4.

Dearth of Human Leaders—What to Do when all Fail—The Lord's Servant—A Permanent Presence—His Work—Success Assured—I. An Enjoyable Truth—The Finished Work—The Work Yet to be Finished—Bad Raw Material—Good News for Blind Prisoners.

PREVIOUS verses at the close of the forty-first chapter indicate the utter failure of the hope of man from man. God Himself looked, and behold "there was no man; even among them, and there was no counsellor, that, when I asked of them, could answer a word." How often it is so in human history: man fails to find leadership and help in man! Great men are raised up now and then, and the tendency is to make idols of them, and so to trust in an arm of flesh. These die, and then their fellows look out in the Church, and in the world, for other men upon whom they may dote after the same manner; but it sometimes happens that they look in vain; none arise whom they can elect for leaders. Just now I think it is so in more departments than one. Look where you may, where will you see the man Who is Equal to the Crisis?

Somehow, in the providence of God, every hour has, in due time, had its man; but if our hopes are fixed in men, we must feel at this time sorely pressed.

In expounding the one verse which I have selected for a text, I shall need to open up the whole passage. Follow me, therefore, with opened Bibles, and obey the first word of the chapter, which is, Behold. Our great comfort is that the Lord Jesus Christ is always to be beheld. He ever lives and ever works for His people. We must view Him not merely as one who appeared upon the scene years ago, but as still living. He died in the heat of the battle, but He rose again to secure the victory. We do not found our hopes of a brighter future upon a dead Saviour; our hopes for the future of the world, and for the accomplishment of God's gracious purposes hang upon one who ever liveth, and is at this time in the place of vantage, carrying on His great work and warfare at the right hand of God. At the commencement of my discourse, I beseech you, dear brethren, to look to Jesus Christ the ever-living Worker. If you have been troubled and fretted by peering into these gloomy times and perceiving nothing that can raise your spirits, I pray you look about you no longer, but look up! There He sits at the right hand of God, even the Father, the appointed man, the glorious, chosen Deliverer.

The text declares concerning our Lord that "He shall not fail nor be discouraged." This leads us to consider what is the work which Jesus Christ has undertaken, in which He will not fail nor be discouraged. Our text directs us in this matter, for it tells us that He has come to "set judgment in the earth," and that "the isles shall wait for His law." The earth is to be delivered from misrule and sin, and men are to be submissive to his instruction and direction. "He shall not fail nor be discouraged;" but He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied.

As for the Lord's Second Coming, shall the world grow darker and darker till He comes? There are passages of Scripture and which may be taken to indicate it. On the other hand, shall the age grow brighter and brighter till He appears to bring the perfect day? Through the preaching of the Gospel shall there yet be periods in which multitudes shall be converted, and whole nations shall be saved? There are texts that look that way, and many a brave worker hopes as much. It seems to me pretty clear that truth and righteousness are to win the day upon the earth; the idols are to be abolished, war is to cease, and the great Jehovah is to be called "the God of the whole earth." This polluted earth is to be cleansed, and this round planet of ours, which to-day is darkened by sin, shall yet shine out, like a new-born sun, in all the pristine light which beamed from it when first it came from its Maker's hands. The Lord shall reign over all mankind, and a period of peace and rest and holiness shall be the fruit of His blessed sway. The Lord Jesus will not rest till He has subdued all things unto Himself, and put down all the spiritual wickednesses which now tyrannize over the world.

I do not think it necessary for me to go further into detail as to all that to do. What I have to say is this, whatever He has undertaken, He will perform; whatever commission He has received He will fulfil. "He shall not fail nor be discouraged" till all His work is done. Brethren, we get doubting sometimes. We ask, Is it all right? Are matters moving on? Behold Him who is at the head of all affairs, the director of the high politics of heaven, the great one upon whose shoulders rests the business of God in the salvation of men! Behold Him, and be comforted. You and I may fail; shame on us if we do! We may be discouraged; it will be our sin if we are; but He shall not fail nor be discouraged till He shall have wrought out every point of the promise of grace, and shall have accomplished every iota of the eternal purpose of love.

I. First, let this truth be considered and believed. Will you now thoughtfully turn it over in your minds? It is certainly which our Lord Jesus Christ has undertaken. The salvation of a single soul involves a miracle. The salvation of myriads upon myriads of the human race: what shall I call it but a mountain of marvels? Those of you who love your fellowmen often mourn your powerlessness with a single individual. What hard work it is to deal with our own countrymen! How are we baffled by their poverty, their ignorance, their misery, their sin! You have only to battle with a single vice, drunkenness, to wit, to feel what a monster is to be overcome. Only think for a moment of the social impurity of this city, and you are sick at heart as you remember it. Now, the Lord Jesus Christ has come to cleanse this Augean stable; and He will cleanse it. The stream of the river of life shall run through the foulest parts of the earth till even those horrible regions like the Dead Sea shall be reclaimed.

The task is rendered the more severe because our Lord Jesus at this present works largely by a church, which is a poor and for the accomplishment of His purpose. I sometimes think there are more difficulties connected with the Church than with the world; for the Church is often worldly, faithless, lethargic, and, I was about to add, inhuman. Might I not almost say as much, for she seems at times well-nigh destitute of tender sympathy for the lost and perishing? If a man has to do a work, he says to himself, "Give me good tools, at any rate. If I have to strike a heavy blow, do not trouble me with a broken hammer. If I have to write, give me a pen that will not hinder my hand." But, alas! the Church is too often false to her Master's purpose, and traitorous to His truth. Yet, brethren, the Lord will largely do His work and accomplish His good pleasure by such means as these. He will not fail nor be discouraged. The disciple may sleep, but the great Saviour agonizes over men. Let this battalion and the other waver as it may, He who holds the banner in the very centre of the fight will never be moved; He will hold the field against all comers. Yet, brethren, it may be that at times we fear that the Gospel is not prospering nor fulfilling the purpose for which God hath sent it. Looking back on past history, and looking out upon the present state of affairs, we are afraid that things are not going well. Possibly this may arise out of our Lord's way of working, which is so different from what our minds would choose. It is written in the second verse, "He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause His voice to be heard in the street." You are in an awful hurry, are you not? But He is never in haste. You would and noise, I know, but Jesus will not thus spread the Gospel. You would go out and fight all the enemies of truth, and set clamor against clamor, cry against cry; but "He shall not strive." You would shout and rage and rave; but He shall not cry. You would advertise to the ends of the earth; but He shall not cause His voice to be heard in the street.

When Mahomet commenced his enterprise he announced that Paradise was to be found beneath the shadow of swords, and numbers of brave men rushed to the battle; they swept everything before them, and stained continents with blood; they carried the name of Allah and Mahomet over Asia and Northern Africa, and seemed intent on conquering Europe; and yet the work done will not endure. The prophet and his caliphs did, indeed, strive and cry, and cause their voices to be heard in the street; but Christ's system is the very reverse of that; His weapons are not carnal. Behold His battle-axe and weapons of war! Truth divinely strong, with no human force at the back of it but that of holiness and love; a Gospel and mercy to men, proclaimed not by the silver trumpets of kings, but by the plain voices of lowly men. The Gospel seeks neither prestige nor patronage from the State; nor does it ask to be advocated by scholastic sophistry, or human eloquence. It does not even aim at becoming predominant by force of the learning or talent of its teachers. It has neither pomp to commend it, nor arms to enforce it. You, ardent spirit that you are, are all in a hurry; you are going to push the Church before you, and drag the world after you. Go and do it! But if the Lord works not after your fashion, be not greatly surprised; for it is written, "He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause His voice to be heard in the street."

Note well the spirit in which He works. He is gentleness itself, and that always: "A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench." You cannot work in hot haste in this spirit. Gentleness makes good and sure speed, but it cannot endure rashness and heat. We know reformers who, if they had the power, would be like bulls in a china-shop; they would do a great deal in a very short time. But the world's best Friend is not given to quench and bruise. Here is a bruised reed, and it is of no use to anybody; you cannot even get music out of it, much less lean upon it; yet He does not break it. Here is a smoking flax, a wick with an offensive smell, containing very little heat, and no light; yet He does not put it out.

But He will not fail nor be discouraged any the more because of His gentleness. Nay, let me tell you, brethren, it is the quiet man, the meek man, who is always hard to be turned aside from his purpose. When a man is passionate, and easily excited, you have only to wait a while, and he will cool down; perhaps chill down below zero. These will be easily managed by the devil, or somebody else, after the flame is over. Give me a man who deliberately makes up his mind, calmly sets to work, and patiently bears all rebuffs, and I know that what he sets himself to do will be done. He will work in God's way, and will not put forth his hand to snatch a premature success at the expense of principle. He is quiet because he is sure, patient because he is strong, gentle because he is firm. The man who cannot be provoked is the man who cannot be turned.

As you look at our blessed Master, patient and immovable amid all the battle and the strife, you may assure yourself that He will not fail nor be discouraged. I do not admire Napoleon, except in the matter of his cool courage, but for that he was noteworthy. They always represent him in the midst of the battle with folded arms. His eagle eye is on the conflict, but he is motionless as a statue. Every soldier in the imperial army felt that victory was sure, for the captain was so self-possessed. If he had been hurrying to and fro, rushing here, there, and everywhere, and making a great fuss about everything, they would have inferred that defeat was impending. But see him yonder!

All is Well.

He knows what he is at. It is all right, for he does not strive, nor cry, nor cause his voice to be heard; he is calm, for he can see that all is well. "He shall not fail nor be discouraged."

II. I want you to give me a few minutes while I say, let this truth be believed and enjoyed. I want you to enjoy the fruit of this truth, and to be made glad by it. First, enjoy it by recollecting that Jesus has finished the work for His people; that first work wherein He brought in everlasting righteousness, and bore the penalty of human guilt, and laid the foundation whereupon should be built the temple of God. Jesus has done all things well. He persevered in His life labor till He could say, "It is finished." From the hour when as a child He said, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" all through the contradiction of sinners, and the weakness, and the poverty, and the shame in which His life was spent, you never see about our divine Master any indication of failing or of being discouraged. He determined to go, for our sakes, to death and the grave, and to bear the shame of our sin and the curse of our guilt, and even to be put by the Father into darkness on our account. He set His face like a flint; and like a flint His face remained to the bitter end. He never turned aside. Let us bless Him this day for His persevering love. It is not a half-finished salvation that we behold on yonder bloody tree; it is not an incomplete redemption that we see in that rising again of Jesus from the dead.

Perfect People.

The next reflection which I want you to enjoy is this—He will finish the work in His believing people. He will not fail nor be discouraged until He has completely saved you and me. If I had been my own saviour I should have given up the work long ago. We meet now and then with supposed perfect people, but the most of us dare not whisper the word perfection. When I have overcome a whole body of sin, and have risen to be somewhat like my Lord, it seems to me as if a new body of death were formed about me. I kill one dragon, and lo, his body yields a crop of monsters. My evil nature seems to have coats like an onion, and when I have taken off one of them, it only lays bare another quite as offensive. Will it not be so to the end of the chapter? You may be growing better; I hope you are, but I shall be all the more hopeful that you are so if you fear that you are growing worse. If you think less and less of yourselves, it is probably true that you are growing in grace; but if you think more and more of yourselves, it is highly probable that you are growing in pride. There is a great difference between being puffed up and being built up.

I can clearly see that I shall fail and be discouraged if salvation rests with me; but here is my comfort—He will not fail nor be discouraged. If my Lord begins with me, He will never be beaten off from His purpose What bad stuff is our humanity! What wretched Raw Material for Sainthood!

It must be hard, treading and pounding such gritty clay; and I wonder not that both the hands and the feet of the great Worker were sorely wounded, since He had such clay to deal with. When He fashions us on the wheel, and we begin to assume somewhat of the form which He intends for us, yet we crack and spoil when we come to the oven, and all His work upon us seems lost. He has to grind us down again, to a powder, and begin with us again de novo, and fashion us once more. He will do it, brother. He will do it, sister. He has not grown weary of the work, neither is He discouraged by all our ill behavior. Before He began He knew all about it. Had He not been able to foresee all our shortcomings and backslidings, He might have been surprised into weariness; but He says, "I knew that thou art obstinate;" and again, "I knew that thou wouldest deal very treacherously." He foreknew all our ingratitude, backsliding, unbelief, and unworthiness, and therefore He will not fail nor be discouraged till His work in us is done, and we are fit for heaven.

Again, dear friends, He will finish His work by His people. Whatever the work is that is to be done by the Church, He will not fail nor be discouraged until it is performed. I do not know whether any of you have noticed in my text a very singular thing. If you have the Revised Version, the margin will give you some rather singular information. The text might be read thus: "A bruised reed shall He not break, and smoking flax shall He not quench: yet He nor be bruised." Though He deals with bruised reeds and smoking flaxes, yet He Himself is not crushed, nor does His light become a mere glimmer. To my mind, this is a deeply interesting use of words, and should not be allowed to slip. Christianity, just now, they say, is a mere smoke, the old fashioned doctrine, especially, burns very dim. Do not you believe it; the light of Jesus shall not darken or grow less. Those souls that can see His light will tell you that His face shines still like the sun. There is a glory about Him that is undiminished and undiminishable. He does not glimmer, and He is not crushed. He is no reed; His enemies will one day find that He carrieth a rod of iron. You may smoke like the flax, you may be broken like the reed; but He will never glimmer nor be a crushed reed, even to the end; wherefore comfort one another with these words.

And to conclude, I should not have treated the text properly if I did not say that it has in it great comfort to those of you who are as yet outside of the Church of God, and are not numbered with His people. Will you kindly read the sixth and seventh verses? "He shall not fail nor be discouraged," till He has done, what?—the divine will, and this is a part of it: "To open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house." "Oh," say you, "I cannot see Christ!" He to make you see. Turn your sightless eyeballs this way. Breathe this prayer, "Thou Son of David, have mercy on me." And if He saith: "What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?" answer, "Lord, that I might receive my sight." In one single moment Jesus Christ can take the scales from a blind man's eyes and let in such a flood of daylight that he shall see heaven itself. Lord, do it this morning. Oh, dear hearts, will you not each one cry, Lord, do it to me? Are you saying that, my friend? He will do it. He loves to hear a blind man's cry. Do you not remember in the New Testament how often He stood still when He heard a blind man's cry? Poor blind soul! cry to Him now. He shall not fail nor be discouraged, He will come to you, and save you.

"Ah!" saith one, "but I am worse than that, I am shut up in prison." Kindly read the seventh verse again: "To bring out the prisoners from the prison." You are miserable, without hope, shut up in an iron cage. He has come who will not fail nor be discouraged; he has come on purpose to fetch you out of the cage.

Ask Him to Break the Bars

in sunder. I see Him lay His pierced hand to that iron bar. You have filed it a long while, and it has broken the teeth of your file; you have tried to shake it in its place, but you could not stir it in the least. See what He does! He plucks bar after bar out of its place, as if they had been so many reeds, and you are free. Arise and take your liberty! The Son of God has made you free. If thou hast trusted Him, He has broken the gates of brass, and cut the bars of iron in sunder; thou art free, enjoy thy liberty. Leave thyself with Him. Go thy way, for as thou hast believed so shall it be unto thee. To the name of Him that will not fail nor be discouraged be glory forever and ever! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

MARGARET'S VISION OF ANGELS.*

OUR dear, precious Meg is dead and buried. She died just one week ago, and was buried yesterday in the churchyard here, just under the walls of the little gray church. It was by her own request that she was laid there instead of being taken down to the family burying-place. She had been quite bright for two or three days, even coming once to the dinner-table. That afternoon she had a long private talk with her mother. I went into the room unwittingly to bring Margaret some late violets I had found in the garden; and, as I did so, I heard my aunt say, in a tone of cheerfulness, "Dear daughter, you are fanciful. The doctor says you are better. We hope you will be able to be married before long."

"But something here tells me a different story," said Meg, laying her hand on her heart. "Dear mother, will you not promise it shall be as I desire? That can do no harm."

"Oh, yes, I promise," said my aunt; "but I shall see you go thither to be married first."

My poor aunt was soon undeceived. Betty was worn out, and lay down, but I did not; I felt so sure that something would happen before morning. It was a mild, bright, moonlight night, with a soft, intermittent breeze sighing among the trees. The sound did remind me of soft, downy wings hovering near; and as the cloud-shadows passed over the grassy slope, I almost fancied them the shadows of those same wings. It was just at the turn of the night when I heard Sharpless come quickly out of Margaret's room and knock at my aunt's door. Betty heard it, too, and was up in an instant. When we went in we found Meg sitting up in bed, her head supported on her father's breast. Her eyes were fixed with a strange, mysterious brightness, as on some wonderful and glorious sight; while on her face lay—ah, how well I knew it!—that awful gray shadow that never falls but once—the shadow cast by the wing of death. She never looked at us as we came in, or showed any consciousness of our presence, till her mother, taking her cold hand, said tenderly:

"Dear love, what do you gaze at?"

"Angels," whispered Margaret, "bright angels."

"Don't disturb her," said my uncle, hoarsely. "Let her be."

We stood around in silence, till the old white-haired vicar, whom Mrs. Miles had sent for, kneeled down and said the commendatory prayer. Then all at once Meg reached out her hands with a bright, happy smile, as of a tender little babe that sees its mother coming.

"I am ready—take me," she said, and in a moment she was gone.

My poor aunt fainted, and revived only to fall into fits of the most violent weeping. Betty was like one turned to stone. At last, however, I won her to tears, and she wept herself to sleep. I could not sleep, and as it grew light a little I went down to walk on the terrace that the cool air might refresh my burning forehead. I had been there but a few minutes when Chesterton came up the avenue, riding at full speed, his horse all in a foam and his groom hardly able to keep up with him.

"Tell me how was it," he said. "Why did no one send for me?"

I told him there was no time—that my aunt had apprehended no immediate danger, nor even the doctor.

"She was an angel, a white dove," he said, "and God hath taken her home lest she should smirch her fair plumage by contact with such a carrion kite as I have been all my life. But I am a changed man, Dorothy," he added. "My dearest Margaret hath showed me the way, and gone before me; and by God's grace the poor remainder of my days shall be passed as she would have it." And with that he fell to weeping, and I could but weep with him. Surely if darling Meg's short life has been the means of saving this soul, she hath not lived in vain.

THE HON. HUGH A. DINSMORE, U. S. Minister to Corea.

(See Portrait.)

IT is but recently that Corea, so long known as "the Hermit Nation," has consented to hold communication with the world outside its borders. It is a peninsula of Eastern Asia, on the extreme north-west of the Chinese Empire. A very limited intercourse with Japan and with China, which claims but cannot enforce suzerainty over it, is all that the Coreans know of foreign nations. Now, however, the doors have been opened, and it has become the duty of President Cleveland to select a fit person to represent the United States in this comparatively unknown land. The gentleman on whom his choice has fallen is Mr. Hugh A. Dinsmore, of Arkansas, whose portrait appears on this page.

Hugh Anderson Dinsmore was born in Benton County, Ark., December 24th, 1850. He is therefore thirty-seven years of age. His early years were passed in poverty, the result of the war, but he studied diligently, and was rewarded with the appointment of Clerk of the Circuit Court of Benton County, which he held for several years. After completing his period of office he went into partnership for the practice of law at Fayetteville, Ark. In the fall of 1878 he was elected Prosecuting Attorney. He was twice re-elected to this office, which he held three consecutive terms. In personal appearance Mr. Dinsmore is tall and vigorous-looking. We may hope that in his character and conduct the benighted Coreans may see not only the beneficent influence of civilization, but the blessedness of divine knowledge.

A MISSION SCHOOL IN PERSIA.

(See Illustration.)

EXPERIENCE has proved that the most fruitful form of mission work in heathen lands is that of the schools. Persia is no exception to this rule. Since 1870 there has been earnest and continuous effort to reach the children of Persia, and with marked success. The Presbyterian Board and the Protestant Episcopal Church have been conspicuous in this enterprise. There is less difficulty in instilling into the minds of the children the principles of Christianity, and the work of overcoming native prejudices is less formidable than with the men and women. The people, too, were desirous in many cities to have their children taught by the missionaries, so that work along this line has prospered. At Teheran the boys' school opened with forty pupils, and in 1874 a girl's school was opened with seventeen pupils. At Tabriz there are seventy-nine pupils of the two sexes. In all throughout Persia there are fully three thousand children now receiving Christian teaching. The picture on this page is of a fairly representative class of Persian children.

A REMARKABLE REVIVAL.

The Gospel Army in Lincoln, Neb.

A REMARKABLE movement is reported from Lincoln, Neb., as the result of God's blessing on the work of the Gospel Army, of which Rev. M. Baxter is president. The Lincoln Daily News of February 11th thus describes it:

The Gospel Army has now been in our midst a little over four weeks, and to quote the language of their captains, "We have come to stay till the strongholds of sin and Satan are pulled down and the name of Jesus be honored and glorified in every home, workshop, and store of this city." Judging from appearances, they will have a hard fight of it, as the opposing forces are strongly entrenched, powerful, and defiant. We observe one thing, however, viz.: that the prejudice against their methods which at first showed itself has now almost entirely disappeared, and Christians of nearly all denominations are bidding them "God-speed," and some, the Methodist in particular, are even uniting with and giving them substantial aid.

The soldiers attract considerable notice and some comment as they go about the streets, singly or by twos, wearing a bright red ribbon on their caps, with the words "Gospel Army" printed there in gold, and at night a parade is made through the principal streets, the drums keeping time while the soldiers sing some of their lively marching songs. During the past week the procession has been headed by a soldier carrying a handsome red satin banner bearing the inscription, "Holiness to the Lord," and this, we are informed, was presented by the ladies to Captain George Smith. At first there were no ladies in the ranks of the army, but of late two or three sisters, or "hallelujah lassies," have been brave enough to fall into line and parade with the boys.

The attendance on the services has been good from the start, and during the mild weather the old Baptist church, which the army has leased for three months, has been full to overflowing. Captain John Byers, the doughty Scotchman from Omaha, leads the meetings, and talks with great earnestness and much power, speaking from a wonderful and varied experience.

The meetings during this week have been unusually successful, the church being far too small to hold the crowds that come. In fact it is estimated that about as many people are turned away unable to gain admittance as finally fill the church, so that even standing room is at a discount. Captains Byers and Smith direct the movements of the soldiers, who sing with great earnestness and work with remarkable zeal to get sinners to the "penitent form." They have been assisted by Messrs. Edwards and Clay Cox of the M. E. Church, the latter singing with marked effect several stirring Gospel solos.

Altogether since the meetings began one hundred and twenty have professed conversion. The plan of work of the Gospel Army is to preach the Gospel to the poorer classes, those whom the churches do not reach. We understand that many "hard cases" have already been saved. The army is anxious to secure larger quarters, but find it impossible to get a large and permanent hall at present.

A DEPRAVED SAILOR'S DEATH.

"How far does your religion go, Spencer?" The question was put by the captain of a ship to a strongly-built man of some forty-five years of age, of intelligent face, strongly marked with lines of care and sorrow. "I have a request for you from that wretched fellow Boyd. It is about over with him, and he wants to make a confession and ask your forgiveness. From what he said to me just now I judge that no ordinary man in your circumstances could forgive him; but religious men sometimes do things that other men would not do. I shall not blame you if you refuse—I should refuse myself; but I give you his message, and you can do as you like."

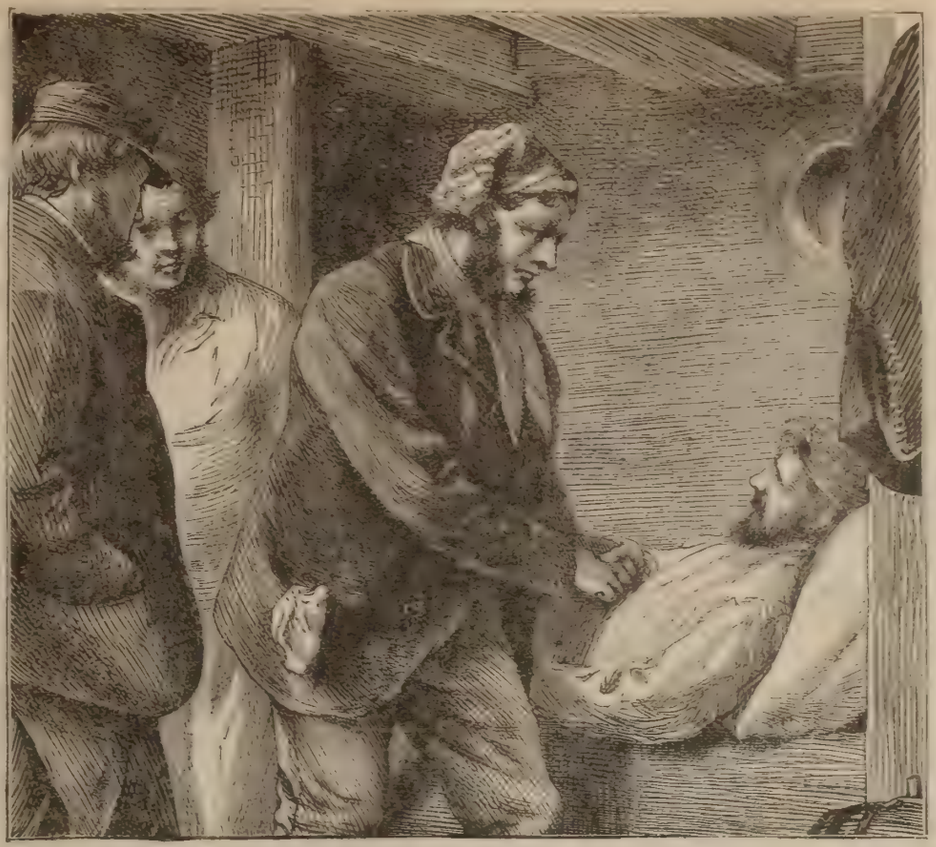
"Well, captain," said Spencer, "I can't answer right off. It will need a big effort. I'll go and pray, and I hope God will give me strength to do it. The man has desolated my life, but I could forgive him for that. The hard thing is that he has behaved cruelly to those I love better than my life; he has made them miserable for years, and that makes it hard to forgive. He married my daughter, as pretty a little woman as ever you saw, sir, kind, gentle, delicate, and sweet-tempered. Yet that great hulking brute behaved like a savage to her. When I saw on her neck and breast great bruises which his fists had made I prayed that I might never see him again lest I might kill him, and I should never have come aboard this ship if I had known that he was here. God has kept me from attacking him, and He has supported me when he has taunted and jeered at me as you heard him a week ago, and I have not laid a finger on him; perhaps He will help me to forgive him. I'll try."

"You are a good man, Spencer," said the captain. "There must be something in religion, or it could never work such a wonder."

About an hour afterward Spencer was taken by the ship's surgeon to the hospital cabin where the dying man lay. A bloody bandage was about Boyd's head, covering an ugly wound which he had received two days before from one of the sailors, who had caught him stealing from his chest, and the pallor of his face showed more clearly below it. Boyd was evidently dying, and there was not a man on board, or a being on earth, unless it was the gentle, loving wife who had suffered most at his hands, who would grieve when he died. He had sounded the lowest depths of depravity in the course of his thirty years of life. Dishonesty and lying were almost virtues compared with the meanness and vileness of some of his offences. No one had ever known him who had not suffered at his hands. Good men, deceived by his glib hypocritical cant, had thought him pious until their money had been borrowed or stolen by the contemptible villain. Fawning on the wealthy and the strong, coarse and brutal to the weak, false, cunning, cowardly, unprincipled, a man after the devil's own heart, Boyd had done his master's work in the world from boyhood to middle age. He was going to that master now to receive his wages of eternal misery, and was making, with characteristic craft, one last, clumsy effort to escape the consequences of his misdeeds. All this Spencer knew; but as a follower of Him who is kind to the unthankful and the evil, his duty was plain.

"Can you forgive me, Spencer?" Boyd said, as the wronged man came to his bedside. "I have not many hours to live, the doctor says, and I dare not die without your forgiveness. I don't deserve it, I know. I have—"



Boyd Forgiven by his Christian Father-in-law.

"Say no more," said Spencer, holding out his hand, which Boyd grasped eagerly. "My forgiveness is given freely through God's help. Now you must ask God to forgive you. It is awful to think of dying without that."

"Will you kneel down and pray for me?"

"That I will, gladly," said Spencer, and he knelt and pleaded for the wretch whose sands of life were fast running out. Afterward he tried to get him to pray for himself and to accept the salvation which is offered to the vilest. It was of no use. Terror at the thought of judgment and unavailing remorse tortured him, and he "found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears." The foolish hope which Boyd had clung to for years, that he could serve the devil all his life and cheat him at last by repenting on his death-bed, failed him now. The mental excitement irritated the wound in his head and brought on delirium. He died that night shrieking intermingled prayers and curses, and his body was cast into the deep, and none who saw his death and none who knew him and heard of it could have any ground of hope for him. A sorrowful conviction forced itself on all that he had "gone to his own place."

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

The Perils of the Deep.

WHILE Robert Atheling was searching the city for his brother and smoothing the way for his restoration, Alfred was on the Atlantic on his way to America, hoping there to begin a new life.

There came to him now something of the buoyancy which is the natural and rightful heritage of youth, but which he had sold for those unwholesome viands concocted by Pleasure's deceptive hand. He was already planning his course of action. He saw himself safely landed. He saw in the not distant future competence and character coming at the call of his ready and diligent pen. He would write to Aspen Garth and let them know this—that he meant to live a nobler and worthier life.

If only his conscience would be quiet; if only he could wipe out with the sponge of oblivion all his evil past! But we cannot so easily dispose of our yesterdays, and ever the way upward from wrong to right is steep and trying and rough for the traveller's feet. Still, if it is boldly tempted and wisely dared, in the might of God's forgiving grace, the brave though tired toiler will win the breezy table-lands and sunlit heights of honor and of truth. But neither can we carve out the sure course and bent of our to-morrows, and Alfred Atheling must go where Providence directs his steps. We will not forget that he is held to Aspen Garth with golden links, that "golden chain" of which the poet speaks, by which earth is bound around the feet of God.

The ship in which the young man sailed, a sailing ship, chosen for economy and for the smaller risk of observation and discovery, was called the Boadicea. It had only one thing in common with its brave namesake—it was destined to come to a sad and untimely end. It was an old, unseaworthy vessel, and, like many other craft sent out to sea with a reckless disregard of peril, it was far more likely to reach the bottom of the Atlantic than the harbor of New York. Alfred's observant eye soon took in the unpleasant fact that he and his shipmates in the Boadicea were floating in a mere "tinder-box," and that stress of weather was likely enough to end their voyage in mid-ocean, so frail were the planks between them and death.

Captain Lanyon, a rugged and stalwart old salt with grizzled hair and honest face, had himself been deceived as to the sea-going qualities of his vessel, and he had not been at sea a week before he rued the day that ever he set foot on board. His wrath and anxiety were all the greater because he had on board his adopted daughter, a fair, sweet girl whom he loved as his own soul.

"My lassie isn't mine, according to law," the skipper told Alfred, "but, according to love there's no two in the world that have a better right to each other. Is there, Inez?" One flash of his "lassie's" dark eyes gave answer enough to that question.

"I found her on the sea," continued the captain, in explanation of the relation between him and Inez. "She was fastened to a small raft on which there was also an old negro. He was so far exhausted with hardship, exposure, and privation that he died a few hours after he was brought on board. I asked him the name of the child and where she came from. His answers were very indistinct, for his mind was wandering. I managed to hear him say, 'Missee is massa's darlin'. On de ole plantation, massa say, "Cuffee, tek' care ob Inez." Tell him—Cuffee did—till—till—' and then the poor faithful fellow died and carried his secret to his grave among the sand and sea-shells many a fathom deep. And little Inez was left alone, a waif, without any link to bind her to any human being under heaven," continued the captain. "She could not talk plain, and what she could say was in some foreign lingo that nobody could understand. I somehow took her to my heart at once, and now for nearly a dozen years I've nourished her and cherished her, and I've had my reward."

His goodness had been well repaid, for the charming lassie, little more than a child in size and movements, loved him, honored him, half worshipped him with all the warmth of the southern climate in which she was born; for from the south her brilliant eyes, her raven tresses, and her dusky features had most assuredly come. Since the death of her mother, as she had called the captain's wife, little Inez had been doubly dear to Captain Lanyon, and was, indeed, the apple of his eye. From the beginning of this voyage the girl had "taken to" Alfred Atheling, and Alfred had heartily responded, glad enough of some companionship that might help to drive dull care away.

The artless girl won his sympathies. He put forth all his skill to interest and amuse her, and so the early days of their slow voyage passed pleasantly enough. Then came a serious change in the weather, and the captain began to fear whether the cranky Boadicea would ever outride a storm.

One evening Alfred and Inez were together in the cabin. Alfred was drawing clever comic caricatures with his pen, eliciting ripples of laughter from his young companion. The ship was rolling and tossing heavily, and as Alfred thought, was laboring and complaining beneath the strain. The light-hearted maiden had no thought of peril, but Alfred became seriously anxious and afraid. He was just about to go on deck to seek some assurance from the skipper, when Captain Lanyon himself came down the companion ladder with an alarmed look upon his face.

"Mr. Ravensworth," said he, for we must not forget that Alfred had assumed that name, "I want a word with you." The look on his face and the tone of his voice made Alfred's heart leap into his throat.

"I'll be back in a moment, Inez," he said, and went forth to hold serious talk with the skipper, outside the cabin door.

"We are going to see the last of this confounded old tub," said Captain Lanyon; "Heaven grant she may not see the last of us. She has sprung a leak, and by the way the water is rising in the hold, I don't believe the pumps can keep it under."

"What shall we do with Inez?" inquired Alfred, his first care being for the maiden whose merry laughter was still sounding in his ears.

"That's what I want to say," said the skipper, as well as he could, for a certain choking sensation that sadly interfered with clear articulation. "We shall have to take to the boats, I fear, and it is as well to be prepared. While I am seeing to that, will you make my darling your special care? Let her get her warmest clothing. Poor child! It will be hard lines for her. Help her so far as you can to prepare for roughing it. I shall have the boats well provisioned, so that if the worst comes to the worst, we can lower them at a minute's notice. Then we can only commit ourselves into the hands of God."

"To the hands of God!" thought Alfred, as he returned to the cabin. He felt as though those unclean hands of his, that sin-soiled heart, that wasted life of his, formed but a poor warrant for hoping that His hands would care for him. He did not know the mercy of God. He tried to pray, but it did not seem as though he could. Then he thought of the dear little maiden in the cabin and the dreadful peril that menaced her. "I can pray for her," he said. "God in mercy spare the child!" He felt the better for it, and well he might, for, as the Hebrew proverb has it, "Who prays for another petitions for himself."

Inez had intuitively divined the presence of danger; and when Alfred informed her that they might have to take to the boats, the little maiden neither paled nor trembled. She cheerily and briskly set about making her preparations with a quiet calm which touched Alfred to the soul.

She was then persuaded to try to sleep. Still quiet and self-contained, she repeated her nightly prayer. Then lying down on a large, comfortable rug which Alfred spread for her in a corner of the cabin, she slumbered as only they can slumber on the brink of peril who are conscious of a heavenly Father's care. Alfred softly stole away so as not to disturb her slumbers, and went on deck. His alarm deepened as he noted the roaring of the wind and the growing violence of the sea. He could hardly keep his feet on the reeling deck, and the noise of the creaking timbers fell heavy on his heart. He was met by the captain, who spoke to him in slow and serious undertones.

Captain Lanyon said to Alfred, with evident anxiety, "I am afraid the crew is not to be depended on. There's a spirit of disaffection which threatens to be serious. You will do your best for Inez?"

"At the risk, and, if need be, the cost of my life," said Alfred, grasping the captain's hand, and looking all he felt.

"Then take this pistol," responded Captain Lanyon, "and show a bold face. Keep your eye on me."

The men continued to labor at the pumps, and every effort was made to keep the cranky craft afloat, but there was a dead silence among the men, and they made signs to each other that boded mischief. So the long, long hours of the tedious night wore on, and Alfred, who had taken a long turn at the pumps, was wearily watching for the dawn. When the gray light began to show, Alfred's heart failed him at the sight of the still lowering sky and the still angry billows that beat heavily against the trembling ship.

"The water gains on us," said one of the sailors, emphasizing the remark with a coarse expression. "It's all up with the crazy old tub, an' it's no use pumping any more," and he folded his arms as one who should say, "I shall pump no more."

As Alfred looked on the faces of the men, some of them, at any rate, he read the fact that the peril from a lawless and reckless crew might be greater than even from a raging sea and a foundering ship, and quite as pitiless.

"I'll pump no more!" said another sailor with an oath, following the example of his comrade, and releasing his hold upon the handle; and in this act of open disobedience he was followed by the rest.

"Lower the boats!" cried Captain Lanyon, coming aft to direct operations. "Lower the boats, my men. We may save ourselves, the ship must go."

"Avast there, skipper!" said a brawny fellow with a fierce, defiant look upon his face. "That's a job—that's a job that needs primin' for. Before we lower the boats, we'll raise the rum-cask," and so saying, he strode toward the gangway, bent on getting at the spirits, which would have ruined all. Captain Lanyon drew a pistol from his breast, leaped in front of the companion-ladder, and stood before the ringleader with his pistol cocked and ready.

"Stand back," he shouted, "or I'll fire. I'll have no mutiny here. Go to your post. Boys," he said, as the leader slunk back from before the pistol and the captain's flashing eye, "please God, we'll all be saved yet, but not if we've got to have any drunken men on board. It's of no use," he added, as he saw on one or two faces signs of dissent. "I've stove in the rum-casks, and you could not get any if you went down. Besides, we've no time nor strength to spare. I'm going to have the boats lowered, and any man that don't obey orders is guilty of mutiny, and I know what to do with him."

The men hesitated a moment, not knowing their strength. Two or three were desperate enough to defy the captain, but they did not know how the others would go. The captain settled it.

"There is to be a fight, is there?" he said. "Well, I'm ready. Every man who has got enough sense to stand by his captain, come here." Atheling, pistol in hand, promptly took his place by the captain's side, and two sailors, Joe Hewitt and Will Trounce, stepped from the scowling crew and joined the two men aft. Hewitt held a heavy iron bar in his hand, while Trounce was armed with a formidable knife.

"Lower the boats," called out the captain again. The sailors looked at the determined four and then at each other. It was only for a moment, and then they went to their duty. It would have been madness to attack four armed men in such a crisis. They filled one of the boats and pulled away, leaving the other for the captain, Atheling, Hewitt, and Trounce, who, putting Inez in and seating themselves, soon left the ship empty. Scarcely were they clear than the Boadicea dipped stern foremost into the sea, and in a few moments the swirling waters hissed and boiled and eddied where the rotten craft had gone down, a victim to the shameless and murderous cupidity of the villainous owners who had sent her out to sea, and put in peril nearly a score of lives. It will be an evil hour for all their tribe when God maketh inquisition for blood!

The two boats containing the crew of the hapless Boadicea had each, by the captain's foresight been provided with a compass as well as with stores; and the steersmen were directed to keep as far as possible in the track of the liners in hope of rescue. Nothing could surpass the calm trustfulness of the gentle Inez, as she sat in the stern of the boat, warmly wrapped under an outer covering of tarpaulin, which kept her from being drenched by the spray of the angry waves. Alfred leaned over her and spoke a word or two of encouragement. The old skipper looked his gratitude, and said, "Inez, dear lassie, knows that we are in the hands of our heavenly Father."

Good keeping that, either on land or sea. As the dim dawn gave way to morning and a clearer light, the wind lowered a little, and the long ground swell of the Atlantic resumed its normal, stately flow. It was winter time, however, and Alfred and the captain feared lest Inez should not have powers of endurance equal to the continued strain. During the day the two boats kept together, and the men in the other boat seemed willing now to trust themselves to the guidance of Captain Lanyon, who had so far saved them from a cruel fate.

Measured rations were served out, both of food and water, as there seemed every probability of a long and trying probation before a chance of rescue came. Already the heart of Alfred was sick with the fear that it might never come at all. Inez, perilous as their situation was, showed no fear. As the sun went down and the stars came out she lay back looking up into the sky, and in the darkness they thought she must be asleep. Presently all were solemnized by the sound of her voice singing in clear, sweet tones:

> "Abide with me, fast falls the eventide;
> The darkness deepens; Lord with me abide:
> When other helpers fail and comforts flee
> Help of the helpless, Oh abide with me."

Not a word was spoken as the other verses of Lyte's charming even-song floated melodiously over the waters, until the last words were uttered and a deep, sonorous "Amen" came from manly throats.

Alfred Atheling's hand grasped the small white hand that lay outside the tarpaulin, and he whispered, "Thank you; it is good to be near one whose faith is strong."

"Look," said Inez, "how clear and bright the stars are. Do you know, they always seem to me as if they were the lamps of the angels keeping watch, and held up by them so that they may the better look down into the night; or are they the eyes of the angels themselves? they look so sweet and kind."

"There's a better Light than theirs looking down on us, my darling," said the skipper, looking upward first, and then into the dark orbs of Inez, "and that is the Eye of the good God that's over all."

Alfred Atheling looked and listened. At first he felt as though he dared not look up, lest from the Holy Place that Eye should look through him then and there. And yet at that moment there was that within him on which that Eye doth always look with delight, a softened penitence, a silent hunger after goodness, a deep craving for a higher and a nobler life in God's service. And still the stars shone down, softly and sweetly, like the benediction which Heaven smiles down on the "one sinner that repenteth."

ABRAHAM OFFERING UP ISAAC.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for March 6, Gen. 22 : 1-14. Golden Text, ver. 8.

Abraham's Removal—Resorts to Deception Again—Weakness in his Strongest Quality—Isaac Born — Ishmael's Jealousy — The Unwedded Mother's Usual Fate—God-given Names Prophetic—Anguish the Fruit of Unbelief—The New Trial—Prompt Obedience—Led by Faith not Reason—A Painful Question—A Prophetic Answer—The Provision.

AFTER the destruction of Sodom Abraham removed to Gerar, and there once again fell into his old sin of denying his wife, and a second time was put to shame before those who knew not God. It was again fear for his own safety which led Abraham into this sin. "The father of all them that believe" was acting in unbelief! Oh, how we learn from this that, but for the grace of God, we may fail where we are most strong, that we cannot trust to ourselves a moment, but only to His Keeping Power.

God kept His promise; within a year from the time when the three men appeared unto Abraham, Sarah, who was over ninety years of age, bore Abraham a son. Before his birth God had named him Isaac, which signifies "laughter." Abraham had laughed when God told him he should have a son in his old age, Sarah, too, had laughed, and with both it had then been a laugh of incredulity; but now Sarah laughed with joy, and said, "God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me." Now Abraham knew by sense what he formerly knew by faith—that God "calleth those things which be not as though they were" (Rom. 4 : 17). But in the midst of all the joy of Isaac's birth, a trial was in store for Abraham.

Something was Wrong and out of course in Abraham's household. His union with Hagar was neither of faith nor of obedience, and God would take measures that the wrong thing should be righted. When Isaac was weaned Abraham made a great feast. There was one present there who could not, and did not, rejoice. In the bitterness of his heart, in seeing himself supplanted as Abraham's darling son, Ishmael mocked. It was very natural; up to this time he had been the centre of regard, had been looked upon as the heir to all that Abraham possessed, and now all eyes were upon the infant Isaac, and the poor lad Ishmael, no doubt, felt himself grievously wronged. Sarah saw it, and made a demand which seems cruel in its severity; yet Sarah had the mind of God when she said, "Cast out this bondwoman and her son; for shall not be heir with my son, with Isaac." It would have been easy just now for a terrible breach to have come into this family circle; Abraham might have reproached his wife for heartless tyranny, and have shielded Hagar and Ishmael. But in the anguish of his soul he went to God, and God settled the matter. He said unto Abraham, "Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad, and because of thy bondwoman; in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice; for in Isaac shall thy seed be called. And also of the son of the bondwoman will I make a nation, because he is thy seed." By the very name He gave to Abraham, "Father of many nations," God had constituted the descendants of Abraham "nations," and, therefore, his sons heads of nations. Whatever name God calls His children by, it is prophetical; He cannot say more than He means.

The trial was a terrible one to Abraham, but in no other way could the wrong thing brought about by his unbelief be set right. It would have been easy to say Sarah suggested his taking Hagar, but Abraham sought no excuse; as the head of the house, God held him responsible. His heart must have deeply suffered, but here was a call to trust Hagar and Ishmael with God, and he rose to the occasion, and, with his usual promptitude, as soon as he knew the will of God, he "rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away: and she departed." Where? Nature would say, "To despair and death;" faith would say, "Into the hands of the God who loved her." Abraham had stood this severe test of his faith and obedience; he had committed into God's hands those who were so dear to him, had, at God's command, cleared his house of all the results of his unbelief.

But a man or woman of God not only goes on "from strength to strength," but also from trial to trial. Our Lord's contest with the devil in the desert only prepared Him for the pressure which comes out in the words, "O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you?" (Matt. 17 : 17). And that pressure prepared Him for Gethsemane, and Gethsemane for the cross. It was not all suffering; "Jesus rejoiced in spirit," knowing that He always did those things that pleased God (John 8 : 29); He could not but have a joyous heart;

But the Trial was also Constant.

Thus it was also with Abraham. Long years had he waited for the fulfilment of God's promise; all human probability of its fulfilment was at an end when his son Isaac was born; now the promise was fulfilled, was he to rest on his oars and see nothing but joy and sunshine? No, the trial of our faith is "much more precious than of gold that perisheth." Isaac was grown up, probably about twenty-five years of age, when "God did tempt (or try) Abraham." Abraham was at this time in real communion with God, for God is the first to speak, and he replies instantly, "Behold here I am." The communication which followed must have been startling to him, "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." How often, when something of the will of God which involves great sacrifice on our part has dawned upon us, we have argued with ourselves, "This is a mistake; God can't mean this; why, this would stop all my work for Him!" Sometimes a scheme which seems likely to be very fruitful for God, something for which we think He has been training us for years, something on which we had set our hearts, and that we believe, for God's sake, is suddenly demanded of us.

Now Abraham acted without questioning. He knew the voice of God, and that God could not make a mistake. The promises were God's, and God was responsible to bring them about. He had once made a great mistake by attempting to help God to keep His promises; now he would believe. "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said, That in Isaac shall thy seed be called:

Accounting that God was Able to raise him up, even from the dead: from whence also he received him in a figure." Yes; in Abraham there was no drawing back, no procrastination; he "rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son," the great burden of his secret purpose known only to him and God, and he "clave the wood for the burnt offering" which was to consume his best beloved on earth! Three days the firm step of the old man trod on, until God showed him the chosen spot, and then, laying the wood of the burnt offering upon Isaac (wondrous type of Jesus bearing His cross), he went with him to the spot, taking "the fire in his hand, and the knife." One severe trial came in the question of Isaac, "My father, . . . Behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?" "My son, God will provide Himself a lamb," was the prophetical answer of Abraham. God will provide.

Faith was Strained to the Utmost;

had he listened to reason for a moment he would have argued, "How can the promises of God be fulfilled if Isaac dies?" His heart would have rebelled, and he would have looked on God as a tyrant, who had given him a son, who was all the more dear because he had waited so long for him, and because his birth was so marvellous, only to take him away, who had awakened this parental love only to dash it to the ground. But Abraham did not see God through the circumstances, but the circumstances through God. He could trust where he could not understand, and he knew that God would provide. He did not know how God would act, but He who had brought about the birth of Isaac could also raise him from the dead if needful. The man of faith did not falter; with his own hands he built an altar, with his own hands laid the wood in order, with his own hands bound that well-beloved son, with his own hands laid him on the altar. Was not this enough? No, not yet; he stretched forth his hand and took the knife to slay his son; even thus far was he sustained by God.

It was Enough.

God saw the true heart which could trust Him to the full, and in an instant God did "provide Himself a lamb, caught in the bushes, for a burnt offering." The command sounded out from heaven, to be obeyed so readily by Abraham, "Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou anything unto him, for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from Me." The purpose of every trial is to bring out how much we value God, and how far we can trust Him. Theory never produces faith, it is when we are tried that we are put to the proof whether our knowledge of God is a mere theory, or

"Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is" (1 Cor. 3 : 13). "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you" (1 Pet. 4 : 12). A tried Abraham became a blessing to all generations of men after him; a tried Moses, a tried David, a tried Daniel have brought out on record the mightiness and love and grace of God, and their experience helps thousands every day. Thank God, it is worth the while to stand the trial of our faith.

SHUT IN.

"I watch and am as a sparrow alone upon the house-top." Psalm cii., 7.

"And yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me." John, xvi., 32.

Shut in, shut in from the ceaseless din
Of the restless world, and its want and sin;
Shut in from its turmoil, care and strife,
And all the wearisome round of life.

Shut in with tears that are spent in vain,
With the dull companionship of pain;
Shut in with the changeless days and hours,
And the bitter knowledge of failing powers.

Shut in with dreams of days gone by,
With buried hopes that were born to die;
Shut in with the hopes that have lost their zest,
And leave but a longing after rest.

Shut in with a trio of angels sweet,
Patience and Grace all pain to meet,
With Faith that can suffer and stand and wait,
And lean on the promises strong and great!

Shut in with Christ! Oh, wonderful thought!
Shut in with the peace his sufferings brought;
Shut in with the love that wields the rod;
Oh, company blest! shut in with God!

SEVEN NEWLY ELECTED UNITED STATES SENATORS.

THE HON. FRANK HISCOCK,
Senator-Elect from New York.

OF all the Senatorial elections of this year, the one in which the nation at large was most vitally interested was that of a successor to Warner Miller in New York. Politicians everywhere were watching it with the conviction that it would show more clearly than any event up to this time what may be expected in the Presidential struggle of next year. Experience in late years has proved that, so evenly balanced is the power of parties in the country, New York gives the casting vote for President in the Electoral College. What that vote may be in 1888 largely depends on whether the Republican Party in the State is united, as it was in supporting Garfield in 1880, or divided, as it was on the candidacy of Blaine in 1884. So fierce and acrimonious has been the feeling between the two sections of the party during the past two years that there seemed little probability of reconciliation. The election of a Senator consequently had a double importance. It would show whether the sections were drawing together, and it would also be an indication as to the future, because the influence of the newly-elected Senator would be a potent one. A virulent partisan would be sure to widen the breach, while a man approved by both sections would work for peace. The latter is the result that may be expected from the election of the genial man whose portrait is at the head of the group on our first page this week.

Frank Hiscock, while belonging to the Stalwart section of the party, has never been so extreme in his opinions and conduct as to excite the animosity of the Half-Breeds. At the time of his election he represented the Twenty-fifth District of New York in the Forty-ninth Congress. He is fifty-three years of age, having been born in Pompey, N. Y., September 6th, 1834. He received a good academic education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1855. Beginning practice in Onondaga County, he rapidly rose into prominence as a keen lawyer and good speaker, and was made district-attorney of the county. In this capacity he served from 1860 to 1863. In local and State politics he became a prominent figure, and, among other distinctions, was a member of the State Constitutional Convention of 1867. His first election to Congress was in 1878, and the Republicans of his district re-elected him to the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, and Forty-ninth Congresses.

From the beginning of his Congressional career Mr. Hiscock has been popular with his fellow-members, and his ability has made him a party leader in the House. He was one of the most prominent candidates for Speaker of the Forty-seventh Congress. It is eminently gratifying that a man of experience and ability is to be sent from the Empire State to the United States Senate as a colleague for Mr. Evarts. The representation of New York in that chamber will now, at least, be respectable.

Mr. Evarts, notwithstanding his imperfections, is a statesman of acknowledged eminence, and of Mr. Hiscock, even those who do not agree with him admit that in mental force, experience, and capacity for legislative work he is well equipped, and that he has an unblemished personal reputation, and in his career in the House has won and has deserved the respect of all parties for his candor, courtesy, and fairness as well as for his unquestioned ability.

COLONEL MATTHEW S. QUAY,
Senator-Elect from Pennsylvania.

THE successor to John I. Mitchell's seat in the Senate is a man well known in the political circl s of his State. He is best known as a practical politician, having been Chairman of the Republican Committee, and in that position has shown marked aptitude in managing political combinations. He is regarded as a strong ally of the Cameron section of the party, but in his new position, honorable and responsible as it is, he may properly be expected to sever those ties and act independently and with due recognition of the claims upon him of the whole State.

Matthew Stanley Quay is fifty-four years of age, having been born at Dillsburg, York County, Pa., September 3d, 1833. He was named after General Matthew Stanley of Brandywine Manor, Chester County. He is descended on both sides from one of the oldest Scotch-Irish families in the State, his ancestors having settled in Chester County in 1715. In 1840 his father, who was a distinguished Presbyterian clergyman, removed to Beaver, and the son, after several years' preliminary study, was sent to Jefferson College, Canonsburg, where he graduated with distinction at the age of seventeen years. Proceeding at once to Pittsburg, he commenced the study of law. Before he had completed his studies he travelled in Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, where he taught school and lectured, afterward completing his legal studies at Beaver. In 1854 he was admitted to the bar, and in 1855 appointed Prothonotary of the county. He was re-elected in 1856 and in 1859. This position he resigned to accept a lieutenancy in the Pennsylvania Reserves, then organizing for service.

In August, 1862, he was selected to command the One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers, nine months' service, and continued in command until asked to serve as State Agent at Washington. His resignation had been accepted prior to the battle of Fredericksburg, yet he went with his regiment into the battle, and by distinguished bravery there won complimentary mention in general orders. He filled the place of State Agent with satisfaction, and in 1863 was made Military Secretary by Governor Curtin. In 1865 he resigned to take a seat in the Legislature, to which he had been elected by Beaver and Washington counties. He served in the House with distinction, and was Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

In 1869 Colonel Quay was Secretary of the Republican State Committee, of which he was subsequently made chairman. For a long time he was editor of the Beaver Radical. In 1873 he was Secretary of State under Governor Hartranft, and he advertised the new constitution in every newspaper of note in Pennsylvania. This cost the State a large sum of money, but it made Mr. Quay many stanch friends. The office he is now holding is that of State Treasurer. Mr. Quay is an ardent Protectionist.

JOSEPH R. HAWLEY,
Senator from Connecticut.

SENATOR HAWLEY is already well known in the United States Senate, having sat there since 1881. He is sixty-one years of age, having been born at Stewartsville, Richmond County, N. C., October 31st, 1826. Until he was eleven years of age, was educated at the little log school house in Cherau, N. C. At this time he removed to Connecticut with his parents. He entered the Sophomore Class at Hamilton College in 1844, and was graduated in 1847. As a student he held high rank. He is a trustee of Hamilton College, and one of its Doctors of Laws.

After his graduation he read law at Cazenovia, N. Y., taught school for two winters, and then studied law at Hartford, where he began what proved to be a remunerative practice in partnership with a well-established lawyer.

Hawley first became prominent in politics in 1850 during the exciting agitation about the Fugitive Slave Law. In 1856 he worked for Fremont and Dayton. The Hartford Press, of which he became proprietor in 1856, and which was merged in the Courant in 1857, was the field for his first journalistic and literary work. He is still one of the proprietors.

Upon the outbreak of the war, Hawley was the first man in Connecticut to enlist. He served as Captain in the battle of Bull Run. In 1864 he was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General of Volunteers. In August, 1865, a "general officer's regulation sword" was presented to him by his friends in compliment to his good soldiership. The succeeding month he received promotion to the rank of Major-General of Volunteers by brevet.

Upon his return from the war, General Hawley was elected Governor of Connecticut. He filled a vacancy in the Forty-second Congress, and at the succeeding election was elected to the House of Representatives, and again to the Forty-sixth Congress. In 1881 he was elected to the Senate.

THE HON. CUSHMAN K. DAVIS,
Senator-Elect from Minnesota.

THE successor to Samuel J. R. McMillan is a man of superior ability as a lawyer and debater. He was born in Jefferson County, N. Y., in 1838, and is therefore forty-nine years of age. After acquiring the rudiments of eduction he went to study at Carroll College, Waukesha, Wis., an institution now extinct, the experiment tried there not being found promotive of longevity in the life of a college. Carroll College was a notable instance of co-education in the United States. The girls did the cooking, and the boys provided the meat and groceries. After graduating, at nineteen years of age, Mr. Davis studied law, first in an office and afterward at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, where he received his diploma in 1857. Last July he delivered the address to the graduating class at the seat of learning where he earned his degree of LL.B. He is said by those who know him to be a man of singular force of character, a powerful reasoner, and a vigorous and convincing speaker. In 1868 he had removed to St. Paul, where he was appointed United States District-Attorney. He succeeded in winning the confidence of his fellow-citizens, and became very popular. They nominated him for Governor in 1873. He was elected, and gave the State an excellent administration.

HENRY L. DAWES,
Senator from Massachusetts.

SENATOR DAWES now enters on his third term in the Senate. It is a curious fact, which seems almost ludicrous, that he owes his election to Democratic votes. The Democrats in the Massachusetts Legislature, realizing that it was impossible to elect a member of their own party to the Senate, wisely exercised their right of choice by choosing from among the Republican candidates the man whom they felt would uphold the honor of the old Bay State. While the Republicans were divided and were casting fruitless ballots, the Democrats took the question in hand, and settled it to the general satisfaction by re-electing Senator Dawes.

The venerable statesman is now seventy-one years old, having been born at Cummington, Mass., October 30th, 1816. He was graduated from Yale College, began life as a school-teacher, and edited two country newspapers. At the same time he fitted himself for the legal profession, and was admitted to the bar in 1842. He began his public career in 1848 as a member of the lower branch of the Legislature, and was returned in 1849 and 1852. In 1850 he was a member of the State Senate. He was elected to the Thirty-fifth Congress in 1858, and was re-elected to the Thirty-sixth, Thirty-seventh, Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty second, and Forty-third Congresses. In 1875 he declined to be a candidate for election to the Forty-fourth. In the House of Representatives he served ten years as Chairman of the Committee on Elections, commencing with the Thirty-sixth Congress—during the most important years in the history of the country—through the war and reconstruction period. He was also many years Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

In 1875 Mr. Dawes was elected to the national Senate to succeed Charles Sumner, whose unexpired term had been filled by William B. Washburn. He took his seat on the 4th of March, 1875, and was re-elected on the expiration of his term in 1881. In the Senate Mr. Dawes has served on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. He was appointed on a special committee to investigate the Indian disturbances in the Indian Territory, upon which he made a valuable report. The entire system of Indian education due to legislation was created by Mr. Dawes, and is a result of his personal work.

CHARLES B. FARWELL,
Senator-Elect from Illinois.

THE successor to the late Senator John A. Logan is the millionaire merchant and ex-Congressman, Charles B. Farwell. He is a native of Painted Post, N. Y., and is sixty-four years old, having been born July 1st, 1823. At fifteen, after completing his studies at the Elmira Academy, he removed from New York State to Illinois, where he worked on a farm and assisted in the survey of the public lands. In 1844 he made his residence at Chicago, and began business as a banker and real-estate agent. He prospered, and became a prominent man in the city. He was elected clerk of Cook County in 1853, and again in 1857. After completing his second term of office Mr. Farwell devoted his energies to business. He was appointed a member of the Illinois State Board for the Equalization of Taxes in 1867. The next year he was made chairman of the Board of Supervisors. He was elected a member of the House of Representatives in 1870, and was re-elected in 1872. While in Congress he served with ability on some of the leading committees, and was chairman of that on Manufactures. He was not a speech-maker, but was always active and influential in shaping legislation.

The ex-Congressman and member of the Senate is nearly six feet in height, is stout, and has a large, round, full head. His forehead is broad and high. His eyes are a clear blue-gray. The lower part of his broad face is hidden by a grown and gray full beard and mustache. Mr. Farwell has the reputation of being a very generous man. It is stated that he has never been known to turn a deaf ear to any legitimate appeal for charity.

FRANCIS B. STOCKBRIDGE,
Senator-Elect from Michigan.

AMONG the most notable absences from the Senate in the next Congress will be that of Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, whose place will be taken by Francis B. Stockbridge. The newly-elected Senator was born in Bath, Me., in 1826. At the age of twenty-one he went to Chicago, and was employed as a clerk at a lumber dock. He saved some money, joined some lumbermen at Saugatuck, Mich., started a mill or two, and in 1850 went to Saugatuck to live. He was unsuccessful in business, but he did not give up, nor relinquish anything of his energies, though he had a hard struggle. The tide turned in 1868, and Mr. Stockbridge began to prosper. About this time he became interested in politics and felt an ambition to go to the Legislature, and he was elected to the Michigan House of Representatives in 1869, and made a good record. In 1871 he was chosen State Senator, and ever since he has been engaged in politics.

It is a noteworthy fact that as his prosperity increased Mr. Stockbridge set himself to the task of redeeming his commercial character. Though the Bankruptcy Court had freed him from responsibility for the debts he incurred in two disastrous business ventures, he sought out every man who had unsatisfied claims against him and paid every dollar with interest. He is now reputed to be worth seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. One secret of his popularity in Michigan is that he has helped hundreds of men in business and aided scores in other ways —some, perhaps, who were undeserving. There is a saying in Western Michigan that Stockbridge is on everybody's note and everybody's bond.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Words of a Dying Queen.—A Christian gentleman, speaking at an evangelistic meeting, remarked: "When Queen Mary of England was lying on her death-bed, news of the capture of Calais was brought to her, and so much was she affected by it that it hastened her death, and but a few minutes before she passed away she turned to one of her attendants and said, 'After my death the word Calais will be found written deep on my heart!' Similarly should it be with the Christian. On his heart there should be stamped not only in death but throughout life the name of Jesus, and we should strive to live so that we may not disgrace that name—the name of the King whom we serve, and the Saviour who has redeemed us even with His blood."

An Idiot's Reason Restored.—The Rev. Mr. Haslam said: "A poor idiot boy was in the habit of attending our mission. He was first attracted by the singing and the organ, being passionately fond of music. We thought that the meeting had no other attraction for him, but one night at the close I found him kneeling at a bench with his head buried in his hands. I seated myself by his side, and told him how Christ had taken his place. I repeated it two or three times before he raised his head, but then, when urging him to give his heart to Christ, he slowly looked up at me as if the truth were dawning upon his poor, dulled brain, and then quickly springing to his feet he exclaimed while he ran from the hall, 'I will, I will, I will.' And, strange to say, yet true, he came back with his reason restored, and his faith in God more firmly fixed."

Story of a Soldier's Wife.—Mr. Robertson observed: "I was passing along one of the streets of Glasgow recently, when a hand touched my shoulder, and looking round I saw a woman who said, 'Mr. Robertson, why do you never come to see me?' I had never seen her before to my knowledge, and told her so, when she said, 'I wish you would call upon me to-morrow afternoon and speak to me about my soul, for I am afraid I am not saved.' The next afternoon I was sitting in her house retailing the old, old story of Jesus and His love. After I had unfurled the blood-stained banner of God, we knelt in earnest prayer, and after rising from our knees this was her story: 'I am a soldier's wife, and ten years ago I was in India. I mixed much with a number of officers' wives there who were Christians, and I, not to be an odd one, professed to be saved too. I was simply trying to hide myself from God in keeping company with these religious women, for in reality I knew nothing of Christ as a Saviour until to-night. Year after year these thoughts have rankled in my mind, giving me no real rest or peace.'"

Running Away from a Converted Draper.— Mr. Judd remarked: "Unconverted people often feel very much troubled when they come into close contact with a godly or holy person. I remember when I was yet unconverted, I knew a young man, a draper's assistant, and he was, even before his conversion to Christ, a sober, upright, morally good young man. When I heard of his conversion, I said he was good enough before. What need had he of conversion? and I wondered what possible difference it could make in him. Now, he and I were very great friends, and we used often to spend the evening together, and I, in spite of his conversion, still liked him very much; yet from the time of his conversion I never went to see him, and if I chanced to meet him, as I often did, I went down one of the side streets—just bolted down that I might avoid him. One day, coming home from the bank where I was employed, I came upon him close to the house where I resided. There were no streets convenient to sneak down; I had either to go forward and meet him, or turn right back. I hesitated for a moment, and then turned back and walked as fast as I could to the first street, went down it and took a roundabout way home. I even visited his house, taking care to go when he was out, and sat there in fidgets lest he should return. And why was I thus afraid to meet him? Because I knew he would ask me about my soul, and the devil who had possession of me knew that if he met the Lord Jesus his reign was over; and he wished to keep me a close prisoner that I might not have the opportunity of choosing to serve Christ. But the time came when I exchanged the chains of Satan for the glorious liberty of Christ."

A Pool Among the Mountains.—Mr. J. G. Forbes related: "On the top of the Mourne Mountains in the North of Ireland there is a clear, cool pool of water. The hill on which it is situated is very high and steep, and when you have labored to the top you feel very tired, hot, and thirsty, especially if it be a warm day. How gratefully you drink of the clear, cool water, and you think that if you had met with it half way up the hill the ascent would have been much easier completed. The peculiar thing about this well is that on the warmest day in summer the water is always cold, almost ice cold; and on the coldest day in winter the water will not freeze, but is exactly the same all the year round. The well is a spring, or rather a running stream which suddenly emerges from the earth, showing itself at this place, and immediately disappearing. When I looked at that I thought, should this not teach Christians a lesson? Should not brotherly love springing from Christ flow constantly, refreshing all with whom we come in contact, and leave us clear and calm, loving and kindly affectionate one toward another."

A Profitable Disappointment.—A Minister observed: "A gentleman came to me one Sunday night and said, 'I intend to sit under your ministry.' Before parting with him I inquired, 'Are you saved?' 'Thank God,' he replied, 'I don't need saving.' I was rather taken back at his evident presumption, but answered, 'Are you not a sinner?' 'No, sir, I am not.' 'Will you do one thing for me?' I then asked. 'As I mean to take you for my spiritual adviser, I will do anything you wish,' he replied. And then I asked him to read a chapter of the Bible every day. He promised, and took his departure. A month or so passed away, and I again had an opportunity of speaking with him on this subject. I inquired how he was getting on in his spiritual life. 'Not so well as I thought I should,' he replied, sadly; 'I am not so satisfied with myself as I used to be.' 'I thank God for that,' I replied. A few weeks afterward he entered my study, and laying his head on the table he exclaimed, 'Oh, sir, I am lost; I am lost.' He had looked into God's law and had seen himself as in a glass. He there laid all his righteousness aside, and Christ graciously clothed him with His own spotless robe."

Wages for the Devil's Servants.—A Christian worker said: "There was a young man, the son of respectable and wealthy parents, well educated, and, up to a certain time, of stainless reputation. He was employed as teller in an important bank, and at first acquitted himself to the full satisfaction of his employers; but, gradually, he was led into bad company, first, to the theatre, then to the ball-room, and, lastly, to the gambling saloon. He spent and lost more money than he could afford, and not daring to ask his father for more, and confess his evil ways, which had now become so sweet to him, he took some money from the bank, at first little—just enough to pay off his most pressing debts and enable him to win back enough to repay all. But he did not win, and soon he again dipped into the coffers of the bank; nor was that the last time; again and again was the same thing done, until he was too far involved to think of recovery. Then, realizing that all was lost, he took as much as he could lay his hands on, and disappeared. But he was tracked, apprehended, and brought back; and now he is reaping the reward of his sin and folly in prison. The devil often pays his servants an instalment of their wages in this life."

THE SWELLING OF JORDAN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Feb. 27, 1887.

" If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses? and if in the land of peace, wherein thou trustedst, they wearied thee, then how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan?"—Jer. 12 : 5.

Not in a petulant but in kindly terms I must complain that a wrong has been done me, and the cause of honest journalism, by that is going the rounds of hundreds of papers with my name appended, a sermon entitled " Frauds Detected ;" text, Numbers, ch. 32, v. 23 : " But if ye will not do so, behold, ye have sinned against the Lord : and be sure your sin will find you out." Not one sentence of that pretended sermon did I preach. If this were the only offence of the kind I would not speak of it. Such a fraud is not only a wrong to me but to the gentlemen who, at these tables, Sabbath by Sabbath, take accurate report of what is said and done ; and is a gross wrong to the newspapers which give every week my sermon in full to their readers, and often at great expense to themselves. The only fault I have to find with the newspaper press of this country is, that they treat me too well. But I cannot be made responsible for entire sermons not one word of which did I preach ! But now I turn from personal explanation to the more important subject of the text.

Jeremiah had become impatient with his troubles. God says, " If you cannot stand these and persecutions, what are you going to do when the greater trials and persecutions come? If you have been running a race with footmen and they have beaten you, what chance is there that you will outrun horses?" And then the figure is changed. You know in April and May the Jordan overflows its banks, and the waters rush violently on, sweeping everything before them. And God says to the prophet, " If you are overcome with smaller trials and vexations, which have assaulted you, what will you do when the trials and annoyance and persecutions of life come in a freshet?" " If in the land of peace, wherein thou trustedst, they wearied thee, then how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan?"

I propose, if God will help me, in a very practical way to ask—if it is such a difficult thing to get along without the religion of Jesus Christ when things are comparatively smooth, what will we do without Christ amid the overpowering upon us? If troubles, slow as footmen, surpass us, what will we do when they take the feet of horses? and if now in our life-time we are beaten back and submerged of sorrows because we have not the religion of Jesus to comfort us, what will we do when we stand in death, and we feel all around about us " the swelling of Jordan"?

The fact that you have come here, my brother, my sister, shows that you have some things you believe in common with myself. You believe that there is a God. There is not an atheist in all this house. I do not believe there ever was a real atheist in all the world. Napoleon was on a ship's deck bound for Egypt. It was a bright starry night, and as he paced the deck, thinking of the great affairs of the State and of battle, he heard two men on the deck in conversation about God ; one saying there was a God, and the other saying there was none. Napoleon stopped and looked up at the starry heavens, and then he turned to these men in conversation and said, " Gentlemen, I heard one of you say there is no God ; if there is no God, will you please to tell me who made all that?" Ay, if you had not been persuaded of it before, you are persuaded of it now ; for the shining heavens declare the glory of God, and the earth shows His handiwork.

But you believe more than that ; you believe that there was a Jesus ; you believe that there was a Cross ; you believe that you have an immortal soul ; you believe that it must be regenerated by the spirit of God, or you can never dwell in bliss eternal. I think a great many of you will say that you believe it is important to have the religion of Jesus Christ every day of our life, to smooth our tempers and purify our minds, and hold us and all the vexations of life. You and I have seen so many men trampled down by misfortunes because they had no faith in Jesus, and you say to yourself, " If they were so easily overcome by the trials of life, what will it be when greater misfortunes come upon them—heart-breaking calamities, tremendous griefs?" Oh, if we have no God to comfort us when our fortune goes, and we look upon the grave of our children, and our houses are desolate, what will become of us? What a sad thing it is to see men all unhelped of God going out to fight giants of trouble ; no closet of prayer in which to retreat, no promise of mercy to soothe the soul, no rock of refuge in which to hide from the blast! Oh, when the swift coursers of trouble are brought up, champing and panting for the race, and the reins are thrown upon their necks, and the lathered flanks at every spring feel the stroke of the lash, what can we do on foot with them? How can we compete with them? If, having run with the footmen, they wearied us, how can we contend with horses?

We have all yielded to temptation. We have been surprised afterward that so small an inducement could have decoyed us from the right. How insignificant a temptation has sometimes captured our soul! And if that is so, my dear brother, what will it be when we come to stand that prostrated a David, and a Moses, and a Peter, and some of the mightiest men in all God's kingdom? Now we are honest ; but suppose we were placed in some path of life, as many of God's children have been, where all the forces of earth and hell combine to capture the soul? Without Jesus we would go down under it. If already we have been beaten by insignificant footmen, we would be distanced ten thousand leagues by the horses. Ah! I don't like to hear a man say, " I could not commit such a sin as that. I can't understand how a man could be carried away like that." You don't know what you could do if the grace of God lets you. You know what John Bunyan said when he saw a man staggering along the street, thoroughly embruted in his habits. He said, " There goes John Bunyan but for the grace of God." I can say when I see one utterly fallen, " There goes De Witt Talmage but for the grace of God." If we have been delivered from temptation it is because the strong arm of the Lord Almighty has been about us, and not because we were any better than they. It is a great

Folly to Borrow Trouble.

If we can meet the misfortunes of to-day, we will be able to meet the troubles of to-morrow ; but suppose now if through a lack of the religion of Jesus we are overthrown by small sorrows, does not our common-sense teach us that we cannot stand up against great ones? If we cannot carry a pound, can we carry a thousand pounds? If we are discomfited coming into battle with one regiment, a brigade will cut us to pieces. If we are unfit to cope with one small trial, won't we be overcome by greater ones? If the footmen are too much for us, won't the odds be more fearful when we contend with horses?

I thank God that some of His dear children have been delivered. How was it that Paul could say, " Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing ; poor, yet making many rich ; having nothing, yet possessing all things"? And David, the Psalmist, soars up into the rock of God's strength and becomes thoroughly composed amid all his sorrows, saying, " God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in the time of trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, though the mountains be cast into the midst of the sea, though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountain shake with the swelling thereof.

But my text suggests something in advance of anything I have said. We must all quit this life. However sound our health may be, it must break down ; however good our title may be to houses, land, and estates, them. We will hear a voice bidding us away from all these places. We will have to start on a pilgrimage from which we can never come back. We will have seen for the last time the evening star, and watched the last summer cloud, and felt the breath of the spring wind for the last time. Hands of loved ones may be stretched out to hold us back, but they cannot—go we must. About all other exits and changes we may trifle, but not about this. Stupendous moment of life-quitting. Oh, when the great tides of eternity arise about us, and fill the soul and surround it, and sweep it out toward rapture or woe, ah! that will be " the swelling of Jordan" !

We Must Surrender

I know people sometimes talk very merrily about the departure from this life. I am sorry to hear it But men do make fun of the passage from one world to another Byron joked a great deal about it, but when it came he shivered with horror. Many an infidel has scoffed at the idea of fearing a future world, but lying upon his pillow in the last hour his teeth have chattered with terror. I saw, in Westminster Abbey, an epitaph a poet ordered to be put upon his tomb :

" Life is a jest,
And all things show it ;
I thought so once,
But now I know it."

I thought how inapt that, in a place of sepulchre, men should try their witticisms. A great German having rejected Christ, in his last moment said, " Give me light, give me light!" Oh, we may be smart with our witticism about the last hour, but when it comes, and the tides are rising, and the surf is beating, and the winds are howling, we will each one, my brethren, find for himself that it is " the swelling of Jordan" ! Our natural courage won't hold out then. However familiar we may have been with scenes of mortality, however much we may have screwed our courage up, we want something more than natural resources. When the north-east wind blows off from the sea of death, it will put out all earthly lights. The lamp God-lighted is that can stand in that blast. The weakest arm holding that shall not be confounded ; the strongest one rejecting that shall stumble and die. When the Jordan rises in its wrath, the first dash of its wave will swamp them forever. We feel how sad it is for a man to attempt this life without religion. We see what a doleful thing it is for a man to go down into the misfortunes of life without Christian solace : but if that be so, how much more terrible when that man comes face to face with the solemnities of the last hour! Oh, if in the bright sunshine of health and prosperity a man felt the need of something better, how will he feel when the shadows of the last hour gather above his pillow! If, in the warmth of worldly prosperity, he was sometimes dismayed, how will he feel when the last chill creeps over him? If while things were comparatively smooth he was disquieted, what will he do in the agonies of dissolution? " If in the land of peace, in which he trusted, they wearied him, what will he do amid the swelling of Jordan?"

Oh, I rejoice to know that so many of God's children have gone through that pass without a shudder! Some one said to a dying Christian, "Isn't it hard for you to get out of this world?" "Oh, no," he says, "it is easy dying, it is blessed dying, it is glorious dying!" and then he pointed to a clock on the wall, and he said, "The last two hours in which I have been dying I have had more joy than all the years of my life." A general came into the hospital after the battle, and among the wounded there was

and the general said, "Ah! my dear fellow, you seem very much wounded. I am afraid you are not going to get well." "No," said the soldier, "I am not going to get well, but I feel very happy," and then he looked up into the general's face and said, "I am going to the front." Oh, I have seen them, and so have you, go out of this life without a tear on their cheek! There was weeping all around the room, but no weeping in the bed; the cheeks were dry. They were not thrown down into darkness, they were lifted up. We saw the tides rising around them and the swelling of the wave. It washed them off from the cares and toils of life; it washed them on toward the beach of heaven. They waved to us a farewell kiss as they stood on deck, and floated down further and further, wafted by gales from heaven, until they were lost to our sight—mortality having become immortality—

"Life's duty done, as sinks the clay,
Light from its load the spirit flies;
While heaven and earth combine to say,
How blest the righteous when he dies!"

What high consolation to you that your departed friends were in the swelling of Jordan! The Israelites were just as thoroughly alive on the western banks of the Jordan as they had been on the eastern banks of the Jordan; and our departed Christian friends have only crossed over—not sick, not dead, not exhausted, not extinguished, not blotted out, but with healthier respiration, and stouter pulses, and keener eyesight, and better prospects, crossed over, their sins, their physical and mental disquiet, all left clear this side, an eternally flowing, impassable obstacle between them and all human and Satanic pursuit. Crossed over! Oh, I shake hands of congratulation with all the bereaved in the consideration that our departed Christian friends are safe!

Why was there years ago so much joy in certain circles in New York when people heard from their friends who were on board the City of Brussels? It was thought that vessel had gone to the bottom of the sea; and when the friends on this side heard that the steamer had arrived safely in Liverpool, had we not the right to congratulate the people in New York that their friends had got Safely Across?

And is it not right this morning that I congratulate you that your departed friends are safe on the shore of heaven? Would you have them back again? Would you have those old parents back again? You know how hard it was sometimes for them to get their breath in the stifled atmosphere of the summer; would you have them back for next summer? Didn't they use their brain long enough? Would you have your children back again? Would you have them take the risk of temptations which throng every human pathway? Would you have them cross the Jordan three times in addition to crossing it already, and cross it again to greet you now, and then cross back afterward? for certainly you would not want to keep them forever out of heaven. If they had lived forty or fifty years longer, would they have been safe?

"Pause and weep, not for the freed from pain,
But that the sigh of love would pull them back again."

I ask a question, and there seems to come back the answer in

The Heavenly Echo.

"What, will you never be sick again?" "Never—sick—again." "What, will you never be tired again?" "Never—tired—again." "What, will you never weep again?" "Never — weep — again." "What, will you never die again?" "Never—die—again." Oh, ye army of departed kindred, we hail you from bank to bank! Wait for us when the Jordan of death shall part for us. Come down and meet us half way between the willowed banks of earth and the palm-groves of heaven.

"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,
And cast a wistful eye
To Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie."

But there is one step still in advance suggested by this subject. If this religion of Christ is so important in life and so important in the last hours of life, how much more important it will be in the great eternity! I need not stand here and argue it. There is something within your soul that says now, while I speak, "I am immortal; the stars shall die, but I am immortal." You feel that your existence on earth is only a small piece of your being. It is only but it is ten thousand miles beyond. The slab of the tomb is only the milestone on which we read of infinite distance yet to be travelled. The world itself will grow old and die. The stars of our night will burn down in their sockets and expire. The sun, like a spark struck from an anvil, will flash and go out. The winds will utter their last whisper, and ocean heave its last groan; but you and I will live forever! Gigantic—immortal. Mighty to suffer or enjoy. Mighty to love or hate. Mighty to soar or to sink. Then, what will be to us the store, the shop, the office, the applause of the world, the scorn of our enemies, the things that lifted us up, and the things that pressed us down? What to John Wesley are all the mobs that howled after him? What to Voltaire are all the nations that applauded him? What to Paul now the dungeons that chilled him? What to Latimer now the flames that consumed him? All those who through the grace of Christ reach that land will never be disturbed. None to dispute their throne, they shall reign forever and ever.

A Mile to the Grave,

But alas! for those who have made no preparation for the future. When the sharp-shod hoofs of eternal disaster come up panting and swift to go over them, how will they contend with horses? And when the waves of their wretchedness rise up, white and foamy, under the swooping of eternal storms, oh, what will they do "amid the swelling of Jordan"?

If I could come into your heart this moment, I would see that many of you, my friends, had Vowed to be the Lord's.

I know not what sickness it was, or what trial; but I verily believe there is not a man in the house but has some time vowed he would be the Lord's. It might have been at the time when your child lay sick you said, "O Lord, if Thou wilt let this child get well, I will be a Christian." Or it might have been in some business trouble, when you have said, "O Lord, if Thou wilt let me keep my property, I will be a Christian." You kept your property, your child got well, the peril passed. Are you a Christian? We say, "O Lord, do so, and I will do so." The darkness passes, the peril goes away. We are as we were before, or worse; for oh, how often I have seen men start for the kingdom of God, come up to within arm's reach of it, and then go back farther from God than they ever were before, dropping from the very moment of their privilege into darkness forever! Oh, how ungrateful we have been!

A Rescue by a Dog.

There was a steamer on one of the Western lakes heavily laden with passengers, and there was a little child who stood on the side of the taffrail, leaning over and watching the water, when she lost her balance and dropped into the waves. The lake was very rough. The mother cried, "Save my child! Save my child!" There seemed none disposed to leap into the water. There was a Newfoundland dog on deck. He looked up in his master's face, as if for orders. His master said, "Tray, overboard, catch 'em!" The dog sprang into the water, caught the child by the garments, and swam back to the steamer. The child was picked up by loving hands, the dog was lifted on deck, and the mother, ere she fainted away, in utter thanksgiving to that dog, threw her arms around its neck and kissed it; but the dog shook himself off from her embrace, and went and laid down as though he had accomplished nothing. Shall a mother be grateful to a dog that saves her child, and be ungrateful to the Son of God who, from the heights of heaven, plunged into the depths of darkness and suffering and woe that He might lift us up out of our sin and place us on the Rock of Ages?

Oh, the height, the depth, the length, the infinity, the horror of our ingratitude! Don't you treat Jesus like that any more. Don't you thrust Him back from your soul. He has been the best Friend you ever had. You will want Him after awhile. When the world is going away from your grasp, and all the lights that shine on your soul are going out, and the friends that stand around you can do you no good, and you feel your feet slipping from beneath you—oh, then you will want Him—the loving Jesus, the sympathetic Jesus, the pardoning Jesus—to stand close by you, and hold you up "amid the swelling of Jordan!"

DR. TALMAGE ON THE EARTHQUAKE.

AT his Friday evening talk, last week, Dr. Talmage said: "What a rough time this old earth is having! The earthquake day before yesterday in Southern France, hurling 2000 people into some other existence, is only one of a series of volcanic agitations. Geologists tell us our planet has been in convulsions ever and anon since it was born, and it does seem to me as though it had been in chills and fever without end—now so cold it chattered with the white teeth of glacier, and now hot until the hemispheres seemed afire. 'Firm as the everlasting hills' should be rejected as a figure of speech, for the hills are neither firm nor everlasting.

"The people assembled two nights ago at Nice, France, to celebrate a floral scene in which they pelted each other with bouquets. A beautiful carnival, entitled the battle of flowers, was followed by the falling of hills and a tumbling of catastrophes that might be called

The Battle of Horrors.

Two or three years ago our climate was all disturbed and frenzied by what were called electric showers in the sun. Every little while a comet shoots through our night with enough force to obliterate us with one sweep of its tail. Caracas down, Lisbon buried, Java cracked open. Charleston terrorized, and San Francisco again and again frantic; it is evident that God has no special controversy with any city or any land, for all lands have felt the tread of the earthquake. My impression is that there will be no long-continued cessation of these subterraneous attacks, but of them until the planetary demolition. It is a shaky, rheumatic, epileptic old world, and it will die in one of these stupendous fits. It is a poor place to make permanent investment. There is an old lion of destruction, and he will not rest quiet much of the time, and he plunges against the bars of his cage. Last August he put one paw against the Western Hemisphere and that made everything rattle from Florida to New York, and now he puts his paw against the Eastern Hemisphere and France and Italy rock from side to side. No one can chain the raging internal monster or bid him lie down except the One who made the lions crouch before Daniel in the Babylonish cavern."

Referring to the Millennial period (predicted in Isaiah 11:6–16, and other passages) which will be inaugurated after the Second Coming of Christ, Dr. Talmage said: "All forces, brutal, atmospheric, aquatic, volcanic, shall yet be in complete accord with the redeemed human race. and there shall be nothing to hurt or destroy in all God's holy mount, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

The 6,000 Years from the Creation Indicate It—Bishop Russell's Opinion—The Early Prevalence of this View—The Terminating Focus of the Chronological Dates of the Bible—Archbishop Usher's Miscalculation Rectified—A Tabular View of the 6,000 Years—Remarks Explanatory of the Periods.

THE expression "End of the world," in the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, where the question was asked, "What shall be the sign of Thy coming and of the end of the world?" does not signify the annihilation or demolition of our material earth, but simply means the End of this Age or Dispensation—that is to say, the end of the world socially, politically, and ecclesiastically, but not materially or physically; for the Greek word aioon there translated world means age, or economy, or dispensation, and does not mean the solid earth or globe, for which the Greek is gee or kosmos.

The ablest prophetic expositors hold that certain prophetic periods in Daniel and Revelation, which are spoken of as being so many days, will not only be literally fulfilled at the Final Crisis as days, but that they also have a figurative precursory fulfilment as so many years—their longer year-day fulfilment being a rehearsal on a larger scale of their ultimate literal-day fulfilment; so that the 2,520 days or seven times (i.e., seven years), the 2,300 days, the 1,335 days, the 1,290 days, the 1,260 days or 3½ times (i.e., 3½ years), the 396 days or the year and month and day and hour, and the 360 days or a time (i.e., one year)—mentioned respectively in Daniel 4:23, 8:14, 12:12, 11, 7; Revelation 11:2, 3, 12:6, 14, 9:15, 10:6—are all fulfilled as 2,520 years, 2,300 years, 1,335 years, 1,290 years, 1,260 years, 390 years, and 360 years, although they will also have an ultimate Literal Refulfilment, as so Many Days.

The Scriptural authority for taking prophetic periods of days typically to signify just so many years is found in Numbers 14:34, where the Lord Himself declared the forty days during which the spies explored the Promised Land to signify also forty years of their future wanderings in the desert. He said, "After the number of days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, EACH DAY FOR A YEAR, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years." Again, Ezekiel was commanded to lie on his side for forty days, to typify forty years' chastisement of the Jews. "Lie again upon thy right side, and thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days, I HAVE APPOINTED THEE EACH DAY FOR A YEAR (Ezekiel 4:6).

Two of the following periods—namely, the 6,000 years, and 2,500 years or Jubilee of Jubilees—differ from the other dates of 2,520, 2,300, 1,335, 1,290, 1,260, 390, and 360 years, in respect of their not being obtained by the application of the year-day principle, as the others are.

It is important to notice, that although the End of this Dispensation seems indicated by these prophetic dates to be about the end of this nineteenth century, and that therefore the future seven years' Covenant between the future Syrian King Napoleon and the Jews (Daniel 9:27) which is to be made seven years and 75 days before the End, may be expected to be made as soon as about 1893, yet if the Covenant is made later, the End of this Age will be proportionately later.

I. The 6,000 Years from the creation of man are on good grounds understood to terminate in the Second Coming of Christ and the Millennium. It is a belief of great antiquity that the SIX DAYS of creation foreshadowed the six periods of a thousand years each, during the Patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian dispensations, and that the SEVENTH DAY of rest typified the seventh period of a thousand years of the millennial dispensation. This idea was entertained among the Jews long before the birth of Christ; and Scripture warrant for it has been afforded by the statement that "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years" (II Peter 3:8), and that "there remaineth therefore a rest (sabbatismos, a keeping of a Sabbath, a Sabbatical septenary) to the people of God" (Hebrews 4:9). This seventh period of a thousand years—the Millennium—is shown in the nineteenth and twentieth chapters of Revelation to commence with the resurrection of the righteous, the Advent of Christ, the chaining of Satan, etc.; and after its termination the battle of Gog and Magog, the resurrection of the wicked, and the burning of the earth take place.

Bishop Russell

says on this subject: "The tradition that the earth, as well as the religious state of its inhabitants, is to undergo a great change at the end of 6,000 years, has been found in the writings of Pagans, Jews, and Christians; because six days were employed by Almighty God in the creation of the globe, after which He rested on the seventh day; and as with Him one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day, it was concluded by the Cabalists and Jews that the world was to continue 6,000 years; and on the conclusion of this period there would succeed a Sabbath of a thousand years of corresponding length, a Millennium of rest and of peace. This idea has been traced in the Sibylline oracles, in the poems of Hesiod, in Plato, and prevailed long before the birth of Christ, relative to a momentous change which is supposed to await the earth after a period not exceeding 6,000 years. We find this expectation expressed by the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Greeks, the Romans—orators, poets, philosophers; and the only difficulty we experience in the examination of the records collected from the literature of ages is to account for so great unanimity of sentiment where we cannot discover any source of information, or any authority which so many different writers would consent to acknowledge for a conclusion so remarkable."

The Infidel Historian Gibbon

testifies to the prevalence of this opinion during the first four centuries of the Christian era. He says (chap. 15):

"The ancient and popular doctrine of the Millennium was intimately connected with the second coming of Christ. As the works of the Creation had been finished in six days, their existence in the present state, according to a tradition * which was attributed to the prophet Elijah, was fixed to six thousand years. By the same analogy it was inferred that this long period of labor and contention, which was now almost elapsed, would be succeeded by a joyful Sabbath of a thousand years; and that Christ, with the triumphant band of the saints and the elect who had escaped death, or who had been miraculously revived, would reign upon earth till the time appointed for the last and general resurrection. So pleasing was this hope to the mind of believers, that the New Jerusalem, the seat of this blissful kingdom, was adorned with all the gayest colors of the imagination. A felicity consisting only of pure and spiritual pleasures would have appeared too refined for its inhabitants, who were still supposed to possess their human nature and senses. A city was therefore erected of gold and precious stones, and a supernatural plenty of corn and wine was bestowed on the adjacent territory. The assurance of such a millennium was carefully inculcated by a succession of fathers, from Justin Martyr and Irenæus, who conversed with the immediate disciples of the apostles, down to Lactantius. Though it might not be universally received, it appears to have been of the orthodox believers." Gibbon further states that after the fourth century this view began to decline, the Papal corruptions completely obscured it; but since the great revival of religion at the time of the French revolution of 1793, increased attention has been given to the prophecies regarding the Millennium, and the views of the Primitive Church respecting it have again become prevalent.

There is another striking type meriting observation in this connection. As God concluded the six days of Creation by forming the literal body of the first Adam out of the dust of the earth, and breathing into it the spirit of life, so, at the conclusion of the 6,000 years, at the second coming of Christ, God will, by His resurrection power, raise to life and form the mortal dust of His deceased saints into the mystical body of the Second Adam—the glorified church of Christ—and breathe upon them the Holy Spirit in immeasurable abundance.

This expectation of the second advent of Christ at the end of 6,000 years acquires additional importance from the fact that they appear from

to terminate somewhere about A.D. 1,900, for the birth of Christ was about 4,100 years after the Creation. All the periods that make up this 4,100 years are explicitly stated in Scripture, excepting one interval of about 60 years, from Cyrus' first year B.C. 530 until Artaxerxes' reign (Nehemiah 2), and the length of this interval is decided by Rollin's Ancient History, and the Histories of Herodotus, Xenophon, Prideaux, etc. The commonly received Chronology of Usher, which has usually been adopted in the marginal references of Bibles, places Christ's Nativity about the year 4,004, but the recent researches of Clinton and others show that Usher missed out at least 100 years out of the whole period of the Judges, making that period to be about 350 instead of 450 years, as stated in Acts 13:20. Usher gives B.C. 1,444 in Joshua 14 as the date of the dividing of the land of Canaan and the beginning of the period of the Judges, and B.C. 1,094-5 in I Samuel 12 as the date when the era of the Judges ended, and Saul was made king. Now this gives only 350 years as the period of the reigns of the Judges, whereas Paul said, in Acts 13:20, "He divided their land to them by lot, and after that, He gave them Judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years (450), until Samuel the prophet; and afterward they desired a king, and God gave them Saul by the space of forty years, etc." Later chronologers, avoiding the errors of former writers, and basing their computations upon the statements of Scripture, arrive at the closing years of this nineteenth century as

The End of the 6,000 Years.

Thus the 6,000 years have been computed by the subjoined writers, who have carefully traced and examined each link in the chronological chain to terminate at the following points of time: about 1870 by Rev. Dr. Seiss, in his valuable lectures on the "Last Times," and by Rev. Dr. Mahan, in his "Palmoni;" about 1872 by Rev. C. Bowen, whose tables were published in 1851 in Elliott's "Horæ Apocalypticæ," and by Rev. James Scott, in his "Millennium Vindicated," and also by Edward Flower in his "Wonders of Divine Arithmetic," and by P. H. Gosse, in "The 6,000 Years;" about 1875, by Rev. W. Thurman, in his "Sealed Book of Daniel Opened;" and 1881 by R. Brothers, in his "True Age of the World" (published in 1794), and by Sylvester Bliss, in his "Sacred Chronology;" about 1897 by Thomas Lidyat; about 1905 by Ribera.

Matthew Henry, the Commentator whom the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon calls "the Prince of Commentators," maintained in the Chronological Index to his large five-volumed Commentary on the whole Bible, which he began to publish about A.D. 1,700, that the year A.D. 1,900

* This tradition was that "the earth should be 2,000 years without the law, 2,000 years under the law, and 2,000 years under the Messiah." One or two hundred quotations to the same effect, from the fathers and other writers, are given in Taylor's "Voice of the Church."

would probably be the commencement of the Millennium of 1,000 years, which consequently he computed to extend from 1,900 to 2,900. But he predicted that the three and a half years Slaying of Christ an Witnesses, their "almost utter extirpation" (as he explained Revelation 11 : 7-14 to signify) would be just previous to A.D. 1,900. His remarks are quoted more fully among our observations further on respecting the 1,260 years.

The subjoined table of the Scripture periods shows that the 6,000 years terminate about A.D 1,900 ; and that we have, in fact, almost arrived at

of the world's week of 7,000 years. The six days are nearly ended, and the seventh day of 1,000 years about to commence. The correctness of the following chronological table can be verified in a few hours by referring to the Scripture passages quoted.

			Total from the Creation of Adam to the End of this Age in A.D. 1900	6000

The following remarks are explanatory of the periods comprised in this table :

(1) The 1656 Years

consist of the generations from Adam to the close of the Flood which are given in Genesis 5 and 8 : 13, 14, as follows : Adam to Seth, 130 years ; Seth to Enos, 105 years ; Enos to Cainan, 90 years ; Cainan to Mahalaleel, 70 years ; Mahalaleel to Jared, 5 years ; Jared to Enoch, 162 years ; Enoch to Methuselah, 65 years ; Methuselah to Lamech, 187 years ; Lamech to Noah, 182 years ; Noah to the close of the Flood (Genesis 8 : 13, 14), 600 years. These intervals altogether amount to 1,656 years.

(2) The Period of 222 Years between the Flood and Terah's birth is given in Genesis 11 : 10-23, as here subjoined. The Flood to Arphaxad, 2 years ; Arphaxad to Salah, 35 years ; Salah to Eber, 30 years ; Eber to Peleg, 34 years ; Peleg to Reu, 30 years ; Reu to Serug, 32 years ; Serug to Nahor, 30 years ; Nahor to Terah, 29 years. Total amount, 222 years. The further period of 205 years (which added to 222, makes 427 years) is shown thus : Terah did not beget Abraham until he was 130 years old, as is shown by Genesis 11 : 32, 12 : 4, for when he died, at the age of 205 years, Abraham, who then migrated to Canaan, was 75 years old.

(3) The 430 Years' Sojourning

(Exodus 12 : 40) of Abraham and his posterity commenced with Abraham's going forth to Canaan, Genesis 12 : 1-5 (2,048 B.C.), when God made a covenant with him (Galatians 3 : 17), and ended with the Exodus, after which the Law was given at Sinai (Exodus 19 : 1). Dr. Hales renders Exodus 12 : 40 according to the Masorite, Samaritan, and Septuagint versions, "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel (and of their fathers) which they sojourned in the land of Egypt (and in the land of Canaan) was 430 years."

(5) In Acts 13 : 20 we read, "He gave unto them Judges

About the Space of 450 Years until Samuel the prophet" (including, of course, Samuel's judgeship) : and this approximately corresponds with the periods mentioned in the Book of Judges, and is held to be the correct account by Clinton, Hales, Cunninghame, Bliss, Bowen, Shimeall, etc. It is noticeable that there is thus exactly 580 years from the Exodus to the fourth year of Solomon, when the temple began to be built, and any definition of this period as being 480 years must be a mistake for 580 years.

(6) This Period of 494 Years consists of the reigns of the kings from Saul, David, Solomon, Rehoboam, etc., to Jehoiakim's fourth year, which are given in Kings and Chronicles as follows : Saul, David, Solomon, each 40 years, Acts 13 : 21, II Samuel 5 : 4, II Kings 11 : 42 — Rehoboam, 17 years, I Kings 14 : 31, 15 : 1, II Chronicles 12 : 13—Abijam, 3 years, I Kings 15 : 1, 2—Asa, 41 years, I Kings 15 : 9, 10—Jehoshaphat, 25 years, I Kings 22 : 42—Jehoram, 8 years, II Kings 8 : 17—Ahaziah, 1 year, II Kings 8 : 24, 26—Athaliah, 6 years, II Kings 11 : 1, 2, 3, 20, 21—Jehoash, 40 years, II Kings 12 : 1—Amaziah, 29 years, II Kings 12 : 21, 14: 1; 2—Azariah (called Uzziah), 52 years, II Kings 15 : 1, 2, II Chronicles 26 : 1, 3—Jotham, 16 years, II Kings 15 : 32, 33—Ahaz, 16 years, II Kings 16 : 1, 2—Hezekiah, 29 years, II Kings 16 : 20, 18 : 1, 2—Manasseh, 55 years, II Kings 20 : 21, 21 : 1—Amon, 2 years, II Kings 21 : 18, 19—Josiah, 31 years, II Kings 11 : 26, 22 : 1—Jehoahaz, 3 months, II Kings 23 : 31—Jehoiakim, 3 years, II Kings 23 : 34, 24 : 1, Jeremiah 25 : 1, 12 ; Daniel 1 : 1. These reigns altogether amount to 494 years.

(7) The 70 Years' Captivity is here commenced in Jehoiakim's third or fourth year (Daniel 1 : 1-11, Jeremiah 25 : 1, 46 : 2), when the King of Babylon defeated the King of Egypt, and Jehoiakim became subject to Babylon instead of Egypt (II Chronicles 36 : 6). This is the epoch at which these 70 years are also commenced by Bliss, Birks, Browne, Chapin, Clinton, Cunninghame, Habershon, Hales, Jarvis, Usher, and the Duke of Manchester. Zedekiah, who afterward reigned 11 years, was the mere deputy and vassal of Nebuchadnezzar, being left to rule over the few Jews that remained at Jerusalem. It is universally allowed that Cyrus' first year was the end of the 70 years, as intimated in II Chronicles 36 : 21-23, and Ezra 1.

(8) Out of this 82 Years

62 years is the only link in the chronological chain of 4,100 years from Adam to Christ that is not precisely defined in Scripture. The deficiency is, however, supplied by historical authorities, such as Herodotus, Josephus, Petavius, Ctesias, and Rollin's Ancient History, etc. From them it appears that Cyrus (Ezekiel 1 : 1), after the death of Darius the Mede, reigned as sole monarch for 7 years. Then Cambyses (or Ahasuerus, Ezekiel 4 : 6) reigned 7 years ; and Smerdis (or Artaxerxes, Ezekiel 4 : 7) reigned 7 months. After this Darius Hystaspes (Ezekiel 6 : 1) reigned 36 years, and Xerxes continued on the throne for 12 years, according to Rollin's Ancient History : being succeeded by Artaxerxes Longimanus (Ezekiel 7 : 7), from whose twentieth year in 445 B.C. the 70 weeks (Daniel 9 : 24), or 490 years, are dated by commentators. Cyrus' first year, the end of the 70 years' captivity, appears to have been about the year 527 B.C. Then the commencement of the 70 weeks or 490 years being about 445 B.C. leaves about 82 years for this interval from Cyrus' first year to Artaxerxes Longimanus' twentieth year.

(9) The 70 Weeks (Daniel 9 : 24) have been generally understood since the earliest ages of the Christian Church to signify 490 years (a day being sometimes put for a year—Genesis 29 : 27, Numbers 14 : 34, Ezekiel 4 : 6). They commenced their fulfilment about 445 B.C. (Nehemiah 2), when Nehemiah went up in King Artaxerxes' twentieth year to "restore and build Jerusalem." As respects its subdivisions of 7 weeks, 62 weeks, and 1 week, the 7 and 62 weeks were to reach "unto Messiah the Prince" (Daniel 9 : 25), when Christ was first publicly presented to Israel as their Messiah, by His riding upon an ass into Jerusalem as their predicted Prince about A.D. 38, just before His crucifixion ; and in A.D. 70 Jerusalem was destroyed (verse 26). Then the last week will follow at the close of the Gentile dispensation with "the Prince that shall come" (the Antichrist, Napoleon), making a 7 years' covenant with the Jews and breaking it in midst of the 7 years, and being himself destroyed at their termination. Thus the past year-day fulfilment of the prophetic period of Daniel's sixty-nine weeks of years, or 483 years from King Artaxerxes twentieth year until the public presentation of Christ to Israel as their "Prince" in A.D. 38, furnishes the last link in the chronological chain—viz., 483 years from Artaxerxes twentieth year to the year of the crucifixion of Christ in A.D. 38, which the learned chronologist, the late Duke of Manchester, and others believed to be the year of the crucifixion.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Veto of the Dependent Pension bill gave rise to a vigorous debate in the House on Thursday last. The speakers hurled personal abuse at each other without any consideration of the dignity of the House. More than once a speaker was interrupted by some one or other member who flatly, and in unparliamentary language, charged the speaker with falsehood. In the end, however, the bill failed. The vote for passing it over the veto was 175, and for sustaining the veto, 125. As the number for the bill did not reach the necessary two thirds, it was declared lost. Thirty-two of the votes for sustaining the veto were cast by Northern Democrats. Thirty-nine Democrats voted for the bill. Twenty-seven members who voted for the bill when it was passed, voted against it on Thursday. General Bragg, of Wisconsin, was the chief speaker against the bill, while in its favor Messrs. Henderson and Hepburn, of Iowa, were prominent advocates.

The Election of a New Presiding Officer of the Senate took place on Friday last. Mr. Sherman's term in the Senate expires on March 4th, and though he has been elected for another term he technically ceases to be a senator this month. It was therefore necessary to have some one in the chair who holds over into the next Congress. Senators Ingalls and Harris were nominated, and the vote was taken, when 29 votes were cast for Mr. Ingalls and 26 for Mr. Harris. It would be unkind to Mr. Ingalls to speculate on the motives that led to his being selected for the office. Probably he perceives them as clearly as do the public, and will not fall into the mistake of supposing that his election is intended as a mark of honor, or carries with it the indorsement of the Senate of his speeches.

Congress Practically Declared for a Policy of retaliation on Canada, last week, in the Fishery dispute. The Senate passed its bill unanimously, and the House passed its substitute by a vote of 252 to 1. With so much unanimity in principle it will be singular if the bill should fail through a dispute between the two branches of Congress. The difference between them is that the House desires to give the President power to "forbid the entrance or importation, either by land or water, into the United States, of any goods, wares, or merchandise from the aforesaid Dominion of Canada or Newfoundland, or any locomotive, car, or other vehicle from the Dominion of Canada," and also provides a three-mile limit against Canadian fishermen, while the Senate bill contemplated the exclusion only of fish, and proposed retaliation, if necessary, merely upon fishing vessels. It is asserted by eminent statesmen and lawyers that if the President used the power which the House proposes to place in his hands, he would violate one of the articles of the Treaty of Washington. During the House debate there was some boasting about the ability of the United States to "whip" England in the event of a war, which was probably meant exclusively for Irish ears, and which was beneath the dignity of Congress. Retaliation itself is childish, and if the statesmen on both sides had exercised ordinary sagacity, the dispute would have been arranged without resorting to any such policy.

The Cause of the Hartford Railroad Disaster, on February 5th, is stated by the Vermont Railroad Commission to have been a defective rail. The Commissioners having made a minute and careful inquiry, announced their conclusion last week. The broken journal of the forward car they believe to have been a result, not a cause, of the accident. It was of standard strength, and its fracture is fully accounted for by the jumping of the car on the ties. It may be hoped that the railroad companies throughout the country will make an attempt to comply with the recommendation which the Commission incorporates in its report as to the heating of the cars. After commenting on the fact that many who lost their lives in the accident might have been saved if the cars had not taken fire, the Commissioners recommend all roads in Vermont to adopt steam-heating from the engine before next winter, unless in the mean time some better method is perfected. The Commission urges the railroads of the State to hold a conference with connecting roads so as to make the changes soon.

The Experiment of High License in New York appears likely to be tried. That it will also try its promoters, if adopted, may be safely predicted. There can, however, be no question that it has the indorsement of the most highly-respected classes in the State—men, who, for many years have been known as avowed enemies of the liquor traffic. At an enormous and enthusiastic meeting held in Chickering Hall, New York, on Friday last, ex-Chief-Justice Noah Davis strongly advocated the measure, though he did not conceal his preference for a law that would abolish the traffic altogether. That, however, being in his opinion impracticable, he regarded the question as lying between high and low license, and, that being so, preferred the former. He was supported by eminent clergymen, philanthropists, and public men. The measure before the Legislature, in its present stage, proposes to fix the cost of a liquor license at $1000, a malt liquor and cider license at $100, and a druggist's license at $100. Dr. Talmage, being a Prohibitionist, is a strong opponent of the measure which he contemptuously characterizes as "an imbecile compromise."

A Startling Suggestion is Made by Mayor Hewitt, of New York. If he had made it before his election it would have cost him many votes. In a letter to the meeting held on Friday to discuss the High License bill, Mr. Hewitt said: "I have come to the conclusion that the law should be modified so as to permit the selling of beer and light wines on Sunday afternoons in such places as shall be specially licensed for that purpose. In view of the fact that a very large portion of our population come from countries in which the Sabbath afternoon is used for recreation as well as rest, and that the privilege of taking light refreshment in social gatherings is rarely abused by them, it would, in my judgment, contribute very much to the ease with which we could prevent violations of the law, if this concession to the habits and wishes of a portion of our people could be made." Happily, the Mayor can do nothing toward obtaining this concession, and the fact of his advocating it will not be forgotten should he ever again be a candidate for office. The law requiring the saloons to be closed on Sunday must be retained, because some day public opinion on the subject will be sufficiently educated to insure the election of officials who will enforce it.

The German Elections will Give Bismarck a clear majority in the Reichstag. The German rule that a candidate must poll an absolute majority of all the votes cast in his district before he can be duly elected, involves the necessity of new elections in many places. Definite results already known, however, leave exactly one half of the members of the new Reichstag distinctly pledged to the support of the Septennate, without reckoning re-ballots. The supplementary elections have been fixed for March 2d. Although a majority of the districts in which new elections were to be held yesterday are certain to be carried by the opposition candidates, the total result will give Prince Bismarck a working majority independent of the Centre members, many of whom will either vote for the Septennate or abstain from voting. In spite of Government influence, Alsace and Lorraine manifested a strong anti-German feeling. The votes cast for French candidates were 72,480, and for German, 16,022. Although the general result is a victory for Bismarck, and it was predicted that such an issue would allay apprehensions of war, that effect has not been produced. War is still evidently expected at an early date, and all the nations are making preparations for it. European correspondents of the daily press in America concur in describing Europe as resembling a vast gunpowder magazine, which a spark will explode.

The Number of Deaths from the Earthquake in the Riviera, on February 23d, was not accurately ascertained at the close of last week. A partial list of sixty Communes, out of three hundred visited by the disturbance, was issued, but even in those there was reason to fear that many bodies were still buried under fallen buildings. The distress throughout the Riviera is terrible. Government assistance, supplemented by private benevolence, is being extended to the homeless, but the suffering is too widespread for any effort to cope with at the outset. Some of the details of the calamity, extracted from the cable reports, with a picture of Nice are given on page 140. Prophetic students will see in the appalling narrative a suggestion of what will shortly occur when the three great earthquakes spoken of in Revelation shake the world.

The Trial of the Irish Members of Parliament charged with conspiracy, has ended in a hung jury. After being out two hours the jury informed the court that there was no possibility of coming to an agreement. The judge, therefore, discharged them. It is stated that they stood nine for conviction to three for acquittal. A similarity of names misled the Crown lawyer in his challenges, and he succeeded in having a juryman favorable to the Crown struck off when he supposed that the man was a Nationalist. This blunder doubtless contributed to the result. The judge's charge was admitted to be fair, though at the commencement of the trial his ruling showed evident bias against the defendants. The prosecuting counsel conducted the case at a disadvantage. He defended Mr. Parnell when that gentleman was being tried, and made a vigorous speech against the Government. When prosecuting Dillon and his colleagues, last week, he was twitted with his former speech, and the effect of his address was neutralized.

Mr. H. M. Stanley's Expedition for the Relief of Emin Bey is now lost to the ken of the civilized world. In plunging into the interior it has no communication with the coast. Mr. Stanley says that the party have embarked on the steamer Madura. Among them are Tippu Tib, the Arab trader, and forty of his followers. Couriers have gone overland with letters to Uganda, while others have been sent to Stanley Falls to meet the native chiefs. An advance force will push on to Wadelai the third day after arriving at Stanley Falls without the Arabs. The force of Tippu Tib will proceed by way of Kasongo and Lake Tanganyika to Stanley Falls. Mr. Stanley's telegram continues: "If I do not arrive before, I hope to reach the Cape by March 9th, 1888, where telegrams may be addressed to me. Good-by."

The Rev. M. Baxter Delivered Three Discourses on the Coming Great Events of prophecy at Masonic Temple, Ninth and F Streets, Washington, D. C., on Sunday last. The audience at each meeting was large, and much interest was manifested in the lecturer's exposition. Next Sunday he will preach again in the same place. Last Thursday the Prophetic Conference in Cosmopolitan Hall, New York, was largely attended, and Mr. Baxter's interpretations were discussed by several clergymen.

A Jewish Family was Received into the Methodist Church at Milwaukee, Wis., on February 20th. At the morning service the mother and her five sons and daughters publicly renounced Judaism and professed faith in Christ. The lady said, in giving her testimony, that during a recent period of severe domestic affliction, while in great sorrow and loneliness, she found comfort in the Christian faith, and, after many mental struggles, she decided to renounce the religion of her people. The ceremony of receiving her into her new Church affiliation was witnessed by an immense gathering of spectators. The incident is the more remarkable because the Jewish community in Milwaukee is ultra-orthodox, and is very strict in its policy of non-intercourse with Christians.

The Rev. W. F. Re Qua Writes Hopefully of his work at McAllister, Ind. Ter., where many encouraging tokens of God's blessing on his effort are being granted to him. He also expresses his thankfulness to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for their timely help during the severe weather. He is now making an effort to establish a school for Indian children. There are several orphans, whose intelligence promises good results for educational work, and many other children whose parents would welcome such an enterprise. One of the Indians has offered to give land for the purpose, and Mr. Re Qua believes that by combining manual training—teaching the boys gardening and the girls sewing, the school would soon become self-supporting. A small fund for building will, however, be required before attempting it.

A Clergyman Acting as Temporary Nurse was surprised recently in his occupation. The Springfield Republican states that a Boston minister a few days ago had occasion to look up a very poor family, and climbed up four flights of stairs in a noisome tenement house on his errand. His tap at the door was answered by Dr. Phillips Brooks with a baby in his arms. Inquiry revealed the fact that the woman had been very sick and sorely needed fresh air, but had no one with whom to leave her little baby. Phillips Brooks found her out, gave her tickets for a horse-car ride and was staying tending the baby while she enjoyed it.

An Opportunity for Sleeping in Church was afforded recently by a clergyman at Newburyport, Mass. The Herald of that city says that among the congregation of a suburban church two Sundays ago were several persons who were asleep during the sermon. The clergyman noticed it and made a pause. He said that as some had fallen asleep he would give them a chance to have a nap. He sat down and the sleepers were aroused. After an interval of a few minutes he resumed his discourse to a congregation very much awake. The most serious thought in connection with slumbering hearers is that their somnolence is possibly a sign that they are spiritually asleep or they would be too eager for Gospel food to fall asleep in church (1 Cor. 11 : 30).

A Farmer was Disillusioned in a Bank in Georgia recently. The Chronicle of Augusta, Ga., states that a well-known bank-cashier in that city was visited by a farmer who, having heard that money was cheap, had come to see about it. Said the farmer, "Mr. Cashier, is it true that money is abundant and cheap?" The cashier answered in the affirmative. "Can I get some?" queried the countryman. "Certainly," replied the moneyed man. "Well, just lend me a hundred dollars for six months." The cashier said, "You can have the money—we have plenty of it—but it is necessary for us to have collateral." The farmer winced and responded, "Collateral! What is that?" The matter was explained. Then the planter of the soil, illuminated on the subject of political economy, with a broad grin, rejoined, "Ah, I see how it is, Mr. Cashier. Money is plentiful and not high, but it is this collateral that is scarce and hard to get!" He went away disappointed. It was not in his power to comply with the conditions of the bank. That is never the case with those who seek eternal riches. None go away from Christ disappointed but they who will not give up the world (Matt. 19 : 22).

A Child's Repudiation of Responsibility is mentioned by the Boston Transcript. It shows how quick children are to learn a lesson from the inconsistencies of their elders. A well-known clergyman's little daughter has just been put to bed, and upon the stillness comes a tiny voice in the nightly prayer. Then silence, soon broken by these words: "And, dear Lord, this afternoon I saw out upon the cold sidewalk a poor little girl, and she had no shoes or stockings on—and—and"—another silence, as though staggered by the immensity of the problem—"it's none of our business, is it, God?" If the child had been speaking of a subject which has lately engrossed the attention of many Boston clergyman her question would not have been very inappropriate, but in this matter she was certainly wrong. The Bible is very explicit about the duty of those who have this world's goods and see their brother in need (1 John 3 : 17).

A Cigarette that Cost a Fortune was Smoked by a young man in Dakota recently. The St. Paul Globe states that a very wealthy, and somewhat eccentric, old gentleman, residing in Massachusetts, journeyed to Dakota recently to look up a grandson, to whom he designed to leave his fortune if he found the young man worthy. On reaching the flourishing town where the youth lived the old gentleman made a quiet investigation and the young man was pointed out to him lounging in the door of a saloon smoking a cigarette. He did not make himself known, but took the first train for home and changed his will in favor of a public educational institution which he was sure would put his fortune to a good use. If the young man had expected the coming of his grandfather it is safe to believe that he would not have been found so engaged in such a place. He acted as many Christians are doing who forget that Christ will soon come suddenly into the air to summon His watchful and expectant servants (Matt. 24 : 48–51).

A Man is Being Tried for Being Alive in Boston, Mass. It is charged that a short time ago he took out a policy in an Accidental Insurance Company, in which the company was bound, in the event of his being killed by accident, to pay his intended wife $5000. Three weeks after the policy was issued the company was notified that the man had been accidentally drowned while rowing on the river at Beverly. There was no doubt about the boat in which he had gone out having been upset, and the man had certainly disappeared, but the company suspected that he had swum ashore and was concealing himself until the $5000 had been paid. Detectives were employed and the man who was sworn to be dead was found alive. He was arrested and held for trial. The man is now being tried for being alive when he was alleged to be dead. His offence is typical. When Christians who profess to be dead to the world are eager in the race for wealth, quick to resent an insult, or vindictive toward those who injure them, they prove that their declaration that they are dead to the world is fraudulent (Rom. 6 : 2, 6).

An Artificial Larynx for a Young Lady in New York is being constructed under the superintendence of a distinguished physician. She is now absolutely dumb in consequence of an operation recently performed upon her at the German Hospital, in Fourth Avenue. She went there suffering from a cancer in the throat, and the surgeons perceived that the only way to save her life was to remove the larynx, that cartilaginous music-box which contains the vocal chords and is known to the general world as "Adam's apple." The patient was put under the influence of anæsthetics and the operation performed. She bore it well and has steadily improved ever since. The wound has entirely healed, and she breathes through a silver tube inserted for the purpose without other apparent discomfort than the inability to utter a sound. The peculiar piece of machinery which is to be placed in the young woman's throat as soon as she is able to bear it is constructed of gutta-percha, and is a close imitation of the natural article. It has membranes similar to the vocal chords, and while all the folds of the larynx cannot be counterfeited, it is yet believed that the patient will be able to make intelligible sounds with some degree of accuracy. The result is awaited with much interest. It is significant that the most sanguine hopes about the artificial larynx are that with it the lady may be able to make herself understood. No one imagines that it will be equal to the natural organ. That, like all the Creator's work, is perfect in a mechanical point of view. The only improvement possible is a moral one, as in the case of men whose profane and mendacious speech has become habitual, and oaths and lies drop from their lips almost automatically. That improvement Christ works when He gives a new heart (Ps. 120 : 2-4).

BRIEF NOTES.

MR. HELLER, the earnest Evangelist from Newark, N. J., has been addressing meetings at Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington.

The Rev. Dr. William Irvin, a graduate of Princeton, in 1859, and now pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Troy, has accepted the Secretaryship of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions.

Rev. E. W. Oakes is holding successful meetings at Manchester, N. H. A hall has been taken for him, which is becoming a centre of aggressive work among non-church-goers. Some very remarkable conversions have taken place.

A series of daily noonday religious meetings, commenced on Monday last, and will be continued during Lent for business men, at the Church of the Strangers—Dr. Deems, pastor. The Rev. Dr. Rainsford, rector of St. George's Church, is conducting them this week. The services last about an hour.

Dr. Horatius Bonar, the veteran prophetic expositor, now of Edinburgh, but for many years of Kelso, Scotland, the author of some of our most popular hymns, has made arrangements to retire from active ministerial life. Dr. Bonar was ordained in 1837. He this year, therefore, completes his fifty years in the ministry.

The revival in Indiana is spreading from place to place. The Presbyterian Church in Franklin has added to its membership in a few weeks ninety-seven new members. In Greencastle, Ind., about seventy persons have been received; in Monticello, twenty-five, and in Grace Church, Evansville, twenty-five.

The enlargement of the Brooklyn Tabernacle has become a matter of necessity. At every service, when Dr. Talmage preaches, the aisles and corridors are packed with dense masses of people unable to get seats, and large numbers cannot get within the doors. It is proposed to make an extension in the direction of Third Avenue on land occupied by houses.

The Rev. George F. Pentecost, D.D., who has resigned the pastorate of the Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., to resume evangelistic work, commences services at Cleveland, Ohio, next Sunday. His visit is in response to an invitation of eight ministers and their churches, located in the centre of the city. These churches are now holding union prayer-meetings in the several churches in preparation for Dr. Pentecost's coming.

Mr. D. L. Moody, who is now laboring in Chicago, has received promises for the whole of the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars wherewith to erect the large building in that city for the training of Christian workers. Mr. Sankey, speaking on the subject last week, said: "Mr. Moody is confident of good results. This is to be just what its name implies—a school for the training of Christian workers. The ablest and most practical teachers known will be secured, and the institution will be placed upon a firm, substantial basis. Mr. Moody believes that Chicago is the best place to try the new work. The field is certainly a large one. If we are successful there, we propose to advocate the same system in other cities, and will try and have similar buildings erected in NewYork, Philadelphia, and Pittsburg."

The Gospel Union (or Gospel Army, as it has been styled in some places), of which the Rev. M. Baxter is President, has now about twelve mission stations in the United States and Canada, besides more than seventy mission stations in Britain. Evangelistic Gospel meetings are held at these stations generally every week evening and Sundays in halls rented permanently by evangelists, and many sinners are being converted by this Gospel work. Contributions, which are urgently needed for carrying on and extending the movement, should be sent to Rev. M. Baxter, 63 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

ETERNAL LIFE WITHIN GRASP.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Lay hold on eternal life."—1 Timothy 6 : 12.

"Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life."—1 Timothy 6 : 19.

The Daily Warfare—A Fierce Conflict—Eternal Life a Reality—Can be Secured on Earth Only—I. Believe in It—Unrenewed Men Dead—Life from the Holy Spirit—Transforms the Being—II. Possess It—Grasped by Faith—Exercised in Love—Increased by Growth—III. Watch Over It—IV. Fulfil It—A Spartan Mother's Reproof—V. Expect It.

"Lay hold on eternal life." Observe that this precept is preceded by another—"Fight the good fight of faith." Those who lay hold on eternal life will have to fight for it. The way of the spiritual life is no easy one; we shall have to contest every step of the way along which it leads us. "Contest the good contest of the faith" would be an accurate rendering of the passage; and a contest it is against the world, the flesh, and the devil. If we live unto God we shall need to war and tread down the powers of death and hell. We fight the good fight by firm faith in the Lord our God: "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even your faith." That fight is the fight of faith, fought for the faith, and by the faith. The article should be inserted, and then the words are—"Fight the good fight of the faith." "Contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints." "Hold fast the form of sound words." It is worth fighting for, even if we come to resistance unto blood. When I say unto you, "Lay hold on eternal life," do not imagine that this is to be done in a dream, or accomplished without arousing your utmost energies, nor even then without that divine assistance which only faith can receive.

As my text follows the command to "fight the good fight of the faith," it teaches us that the best way of contending for the faith is, for ourselves personally to lay hold on eternal life. You cannot defend the faith by mere reasoning; victory does not come through an array of arguments which have been aforetime used by men of learning; you must yourself possess the inward life, and exhibit the force and power of it in your daily conduct, if you would be successful in the holy war. Men who forget the divine life soon cast away the divine truth. If the life be not in us, we may make what profession of orthodoxy we like, but we shall, in all probability, before long, turn aside, like others, unto crooked ways. Well are the two commands joined together: "Fight the good fight of the faith, lay hold on eternal life." It reminds me of our Lord's words, "I am the way, the truth, and the life."

My brethren, there is a higher and a better life than that which is known to the most of men. There is an animal life which all possess; there is a mental life which lifts us up above the beasts; but there is another life as much as the mental life is above the mere animal life. The bulk of men are not aware of this, and when they are told of it they do not believe the statement. Men whom they would believe upon any other subject, honest and true men, are, nevertheless, regarded as a sort of madmen when they begin to talk about a spiritual life. How should the carnal mind discern that which is spiritual? for it can only be spiritually discerned. But there is such a life, as many of us know assuredly, and this is the life eternal, which we are bidden to lay hold upon.

Dream not that any of you will ever obtain eternal life hereafter unless you receive it in this life. Unless you are partakers of it now, tremble for the consequences. Where death finds you eternity will leave you. Thus I read the Word of God, let others read as they may. The only laying hold on eternal life that can be practised by us must be commenced now; it is now brought to light by Christ Jesus in the everlasting Gospel; beware how you put it from you. Grip it now; lay hold of it now; and hold on to it. "Lay hold on eternal life."

I. "Lay hold on eternal life," that is,

Believe in It.

You cannot lay hold on it unless you know it to be a reality. We do not lay hold on shadows, or fictions, or fancies; there must be something substantial and tangible for us to lay hold upon. It is needful, therefore, to begin by a realizing faith. That we may believe in this life, let me say that Holy Scripture constantly describes men unrenewed by divine grace as being dead; they are "dead in trespasses and sins." They "shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them." The natural life of fallen men, though it be cultivated to the highest degree, so that they become sages and philosophers, is nevertheless nothing better than death as compared with the inner life which is called eternal.

This life is produced by the operation of the Holy Spirit within the heart. The Lord Jesus said to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." It is by the new life wrought of the Spirit that we enter the kingdom. The infusion of the new life is the new birth, and the entrance into the kingdom. We are created anew in Christ Jesus; or, to use another expression, we are quickened and raised from among the dead.

What a difference this quickening has made in those who have received it! What it is! It brings with it new perceptions, new emotions, new desires. It has new senses; there are new eyes, with which we see the invisible; new ears, with which we hear the voice of God, before inaudible. Then have we a new touch, with which we lay hold on divine truth; then have we a new taste, so that we "taste and see that the Lord is good." This new life ushers us into a new world, and gives us new relationships and new privileges. The Lord Jesus, who makes all things new, sits upon the throne of the soul, and is the centre of new power and rule. Do you know this life?

The spiritual life has instinctive aspirations after holiness, even as the old natural life has desires after evil. It has new pains and new passions; new joys and griefs. A heavenly fire burns upon the altar of the renewed soul which will utterly consume all that is contrary to holiness. As our God is a consuming fire, so is the life of God within the soul of man; ultimately it will destroy, by the spirit of burning, all the accumulated mass of original and acquired sinfulness. Much of smoke may blind our eyes and make us weep during the process; but the end is beyond measure to be desired.

I scarcely need to tell you that this life is one of high enjoyment. Truly it is a life of battle against the old death; but the life itself is as Peaceable as It is Pure.

The spiritual life has in it all the elements of heaven. There is a fulness of joy about it, inasmuch as it brings us into communion with the Ever-blessed One. On high days and holy days some of us have said, as a dear sister said to me last Thursday night, "I am happy as God Himself can make me." We can say, "God my exceeding joy." The Lord's visits fill us with such calm content and overflowing peace, that we rejoice with joy unspeakable. Those who know this happiness may truthfully be said to live; but those who know it not have missed "the life which is life indeed."

I want you all to get this idea into your heads—I mean all of you who have not learned this fact as yet; there is a life superior to that of common men—a life eternal, to be enjoyed now and here. I want this idea to become a practical force with you. Stephenson got the notion of a steam-engine into his brain, and the steam-engine soon became an actual fact with him. Palissy, the potter, had his mind full of his art, and for it he sacrificed everything till he gained his end; so may you, by the teaching of the Holy Ghost, lay hold upon eternal life as being a blessed possibility; and may you be moved to seek it! Oh, that the Lord Himself would convince you this morning that the life spiritual and eternal is no fancy of enthusiasts, but a literal fact, a matter worthy of your very best consideration! In this way you will begin to "lay hold on eternal life."

II. But this is not enough; it is merely the door-step of the subject. "Lay hold on eternal life;" that is to say, Possess It.

How is eternal life grasped? Well, it is laid hold of by faith in Jesus Christ. It is a very simple thing to trust the Lord Jesus Christ, and yet it is the only way of obtaining the eternal life. Jesus saith, "He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die. Believest thou this?" By faith we have done with self, and all the confidences that can ever grow out of self; and we rely upon the full atonement made by the Lord Jesus, whom God has set forth to be a propitiation; it is thus that we come to live. Faith and the new life go together, and can never be divided. God grant that we may all lay hold on eternal life by laying hold of God in Christ Jesus!

This life once laid hold upon is exercised in holy acts. From day to day we lay hold on eternal life by exercising ourselves unto godliness in deeds of holiness and loving kindness. Let your life be love, for love is life. Let your life be one of prayer and praise, for these are the breath of the new life. We still live the animal and mental life, but these must be the our innermost life must be spiritual, and be wholly consecrated to God. Henceforth be devotion your breathing, faith your heart-beat, meditation your feeding, self-examination your washing, and holiness your walking. Let your best life be most thought of, and most exercised. Be not content to use your eyes, but practise your faith in God; neither be satisfied to exercise your limbs in moving your body, but in the power of the new life mount up with wings as eagles, run without weariness, walk without fainting. Lay hold on the eternal life by exercising it continually, and never allowing it to lie dormant.

In laying hold upon it, remember that it is increased by growth. Zealously grasp more and more of it. Do not be afraid of having too much spiritual life. Lay hold on it; for Christ has come not only that we may have life, but that we may have it more abundantly. My brethren, we are none of us what we might be; let us reach after something higher. "To him that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance;" let us not forget this encouraging word of our Lord. You that have much life have the promise of more. We may covet earnestly this heavenly treasure. We are quickened, but mayhap our life is sickly; let us bask in the beams of the Sun of Righteousness, for He hath healing beneath His wings. Let us lay hold of the fullest measures of eternal life, and go from strength to strength.

III. Thirdly, "Lay hold on eternal life."

Watch Over It,

guard it, and protect it. Most men will preserve their lives at any cost. Unless they are drunk or mad, they will do anything for dear life; "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life." Let every believer regard the life of God within him as being his most precious possession, more valuable by far than the natural life. It would be wise to lay down a thousand natural lives, if we had them, in order to preserve the spiritual life. It is infinitely better to suffer than to sin, to lose property than purity. God has given us this priceless jewel, let us guard it as the apple of our eye.

Brethren, if we starve at all, let us starve our bodies and not our spirits. If anything must be stunted, let it be the baser nature. Let us not live eagerly for this world and languidly for the world to come. Having the divine life within us, let us not neglect to feed it and supply its wants. Here is a man that gives up attendance upon religious services in the week because he hungers to increase his business; he buys brass with gold. Another quits the place where he enjoys a Gospel ministry to go at a larger salary to a place where his soul will be famished; he barters fine flour for husks. Another goes into all sorts of evil company, where he knows that his character is injured and his soul imperilled, and his excuse is that it pays. O sirs, is it so after all, that this eternal life which you profess to possess is of trifling value in your eyes? Then I protest before you that you do not possess it at all. How could you thus play the fool if the Lord had made you wise unto salvation? "Lay hold on eternal life," for this is the chief good, for the sake of which you may quit inferior things. To that end the apostle bade Timothy flee to that life. "Thou, O man of God, flee these things." A man that is very careful of his life will not remain in a house where fever has been rife. He looks to the drains, and all other sanitary arrangements, and if these are hopelessly bad he quits the house. No measure of cheapness or convenience will make him risk his life. Have you heard of men in their senses who will hunt for dens of fever and cholera, and wantonly enter them? On the contrary, visitors are scared from a city or district by the mere rumor of cholera or other infectious disease. You who profess to be men of God must flee these things which are injurious to purity, to truth, to godliness, to communion with God, for these are detrimental to your best life.

Then the apostle tells Timothy to seek after everything that would promote his eternal life. He says, "Follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness;" seek after that which will exercise and develop your highest life. Frequent those hills of holiness where the atmosphere is bracing for your newborn spirit. I notice how people who are sickly will quit their homes and journey far for health. Not only will they sojourn upon the sunny shore of the Mediterranean, but they will encounter the pitiless cold of the Alps in midwinter at St. Maritz or Davoust in the hope of restoration. If physicians would only guarantee prolongation of life, men would emigrate to inhospitable Siberia or banish themselves to Greenland's icy mountains. Men will do anything for life. Shall we not be eager to do all that we can to foster our spiritual life? Christian people, do nothing that will damage your heaven-born lives. Act in this according to the highest prudence.

IV. But now, fourthly (and with the same brevity), "Lay hold on eternal life," that is, Fulfil It.

Labor that the time of your sojourning here shall be occupied, not with this poor, dying existence, but with the eternal life. Fulfil the higher and the eternal life in every position of society. The chapter opens with advice to servants, who then were slaves. Their earthly life was wretched indeed, but the apostle bids them live, not for this present life, but for the eternal life. Inasmuch as they could glorify God by continuing to bear the yoke, and would not glorify Him by rising in insurrection against their masters, he bade them remain in their position until better times might come. He would have them by divine grace fulfil the relationship in which they found themselves. And this is what the Gospel says to every one of us:

Honor Your Station

by glorifying God in it. When the famous Spartan warrior Brasidas complained that Sparta was so small a state, his mother replied to him, "My son, Sparta has fallen to your lot, and it is your duty to adorn it." Christian man, adorn the doctrine of God, your Saviour, in all things Wherever you are found, endeavor in that place to live out eternal life. Be not so anxious to change your position as to use it for eternal purposes. What if I am a servant, yet I am the Lord's freeman; let me live as such. What if I am poor, yet am I rich toward God, and let me enjoy my portion. Lay hold on eternal life all the more eagerly if in this temporal life thou hast little to lay hold on.

Fulfil this better life, also, by leaving alone those questions which would swallow up the hour. Brethren, you can go and interfere in all the controversies of the day if you like, but beware of the consequences. You can be a party politician if you like, or you can be a man of culture, loving speculation better than revelation, if you think fit; but, if you you will do nothing of the sort, but "lay hold on eternal life." I like that expression of Mr. Wesley's preachers, when they were asked to interfere in this or that political struggle, they replied, "Our work is to win souls, and we give ourselves to it." Oh, that churches would listen to this just now! They are going in for amusements, and the church is vying with the theatre. Oh, that we would lay hold on eternal life, and seek the salvation of men. Eternal life in our churches would soon cast out the rubbish which is now defiling them. Jesus in the churches would purify the temple of the puppets, as once He cleansed it of the traders.

Further, the apostle bids us do this so as to surmount the temptations of selfishness. He whose life's object is to accumulate money is not a Christian. No man can serve two masters; and if Mammon be his master Christ is not his Master. To live for this world is to be dead to the world to come. As the alchemist was said to transmute brass and copper into gold (though he did no such thing), so there is which can sublime gold and silver into everlasting treasure. These talents are not to be despised, but put out to interest for the Lord. We can use them for helping on the work of the Lord, and by distribution to the poor and needy. I would that all men at this hour abounded in almsgiving, but specially those who are followers of the loving Jesus.

V. Last of all, and I have done,

Expect It.

By the two hands of faith and hope lay hold on eternal life as the great reward of the righteous. Look for the crown of life which fadeth not away. The time comes when this mortal life shall be utterly swallowed up in life eternal. Let me suggest to you, my beloved brothers and sisters, that we think much about the life to come. We shall soon be there in the endless home, let us send our thoughts thither like couriers in advance. To-day you know the straits of poverty, but you are going where the streets are paved with transparent gold. You now know the aches and pains of this frail flesh, but you are going where perpetual youth and vigor shall cause all pain to flee away. You are passing quickly along the journey, think much of that journey's end. Remember the rest which remaineth, the perfection which is promised, the victory which is secured, the communion which is provided, the glory which is dawning. Think much of your home; every good child will do so.

"Ah!" says one, "I wish I were already in heaven." Do not be in a hurry.

The Best Expectancy is that which doth with patience wait. Our esteemed brother, Mr. Lockhart, tells a story of one of his members, of the name of Carey—a royal name that! She was very sick and near to die, but she expressed a desire to live, at which he was somewhat astonished, for he knew her to be so well prepared to depart. She wished to stay here a while for a good and laudable reason. There was one thing which she could see here on earth, which she could not see in heaven, and she wished to remain here to see it again and again. "What is that?" Mr. Lockhart asked. "It is the tear of repentance on the sinner's cheek; I want to see a great many more of those before I go home." And so do I. Oh, my unconverted hearers, I would willingly stop out of heaven to weep for you till you weep for sin.

My brethren and sisters around me would be willing to wait also, even until Jesus comes, if we could, by our waiting, help to give you repentance. Tears of repentance bedewing the cheeks of sinners are the diamonds of angels and the jewels of saints. Oh, that my beloved helpers may see many drops of the dew of repentance this morning when they come round among you; and may Jesus see them, and speak peace to repenting hearts. Poor sinners! we would stop out of heaven for such as you, even as Jesus came out of heaven for such as you. Believe on the one appointed Saviour, and enter into eternal life, and we will dwell in heaven together. The Lord grant it. Amen.

INCIDENTS OF THE WAR.*

Ladies in a Cellar.

GENERAL HANCOCK, after deciding to attempt the passage of Swift Creek, had instructed me to write to the ladies of a house immediately at the crossing, who, as he had learned, were there unprotected, informing them that their estate was likely to be the scene of a severe conflict the next day, and offering them transportation to the rear. This was done, and, to save time, an ambulance was sent along. A reply to the letter was received an hour later—a very courteous appeal from the ladies not to make their place the scene of conflict, stating that one of the members of the household was sick and could not well be moved, and requesting that the army would take some other route. It being not altogether convenient to alter the plans of the Army of the Potomac at so short a notice, it was necessary to reply that the second corps could not well change its line of march, and that if they valued their lives they would retire. I not only sent the ambulance a second time, but requested the able and humane medical director of the corps, Dr. Dougherty, to visit them and see that the sick member of the household suffered no harm. Dr. Dougherty went, but speedily came back. He had pronounced the sick lady in a condition to be moved without the slightest danger, but his opinion had been received with indignation not of the speechless variety. I myself received a letter in which the opinions of the household concerning the Congress, President, people, and army of the United States were set forth with the utmost distinctness. The epistle closed with informing me that if any of the family were killed on the morrow their blood would rest upon my soul forevermore. Inasmuch as the only possible chance of their being injured was by shots from cannon manned by Confederates, it was difficult to apprehend the logic of this denunciation. The upshot was that the ladies sick and well stayed in the house, having moved down into the cellar. As our signal officers used the roof for purposes of observation, the Confederate cannoneers were particularly attentive to it. The house was repeatedly struck, but none of the family in the cellar were hurt.

An Officer's Dash Through the Lines.

During that night General Couch desired to communicate with General Meade and to transmit an important dispatch from General Hooker, and for this purpose dispatched Major Burt of his staff up the left bank of the river. The manner in which this spirited young officer discharged this duty deserves to be put on record as a monument of enterprise, pluck, and good riding. At about eleven o'clock on an intensely dark and rainy night, Major Burt set out, rode to Hartwood Church, thence to Kelly's Ford, thence over the river to General Meade's headquarters, a distance of at least thirty-five miles. Delivering his message, and receiving General Meade's reply, he stopped only long enough to change horses, when, it being now morning, he rode straightforward down the river bank toward, into, and through the enemy's lines, being mistaken, from his fearlessness and directness, for one of their own people—a mistake which was only discovered when Burt, putting spurs to his horse, plunged into the river at the United States Ford, where he was at once covered by half a dozen rifles. Swimming his horse through the shower of balls, the gallant young rider reached the opposite bank, galloped over the crest, and appeared at the corps headquarters after one of the finest pieces of staff work ever performed.

THE SCENE OF THE APPALLING EARTHQUAKE LAST WEEK.

(See Illustration.)

On this page is a picture of Nice, the beautiful city well-known to health-seekers and travellers in Southern Europe. It is the capital of the French department Alpes-Maritimes, stands at the mouth of the Paglione, and has a resident population of about 60,000. There were many more persons there last week enjoying the festivities with which people, in that and other localities in which the Roman Catholic Church is the church of the masses, take their fill of pleasure before entering on the observance of Lent.

On Wednesday of last week (Ash Wednesday), at five minutes before six in the morning the city was violently shaken by an earthquake, and the streets were filled with terror-stricken crowds rushing to open places for safety. An hour before the earthquake many of the people, whose faces were now blanched, were at a grand masked ball, and the revelries were in full swing. The illuminations, the fireworks, and the torchlight processions culminated in a perfect saturnalia when the figure of the carnival was burned in a magnificent blaze on the Place de la Préfecture. Some had only just returned and retired to rest when the shock came. In a cable despatch to the New York Herald are related the experiences of several American travellers who were at Nice at the time. Mr. John Lowery's description is particularly graphic. He and Mrs. Lowery were staying at the Hôtel Westminster. He was awakened on Wednesday morning by a noise overhead just as if an iron safe were being moved. He thought at first it might be burglars or a noisy party returned from the ball. "But," he proceeds, "a few seconds later I heard a noise such as might have been caused by ten thousand great iron safes all moving about at the same time. This noise culminated in the most terrible crash imaginable. I was tossed out of bed with a sudden jerk, and I said to myself, 'This must be an earthquake!' I ran across to Mrs. Lowery's apartment, and explained that an earthquake was going on and that there was no time to lose. We jumped out of a window, and, rushing across the Promenade des Anglais, took possession of the bathing-machines. Just as we left the Hôtel Westminster the hotel cracked open and the upper stories came down with a tremendous crash."

The scene in the streets, as described by eye-witnesses, was one of horror and dismay. All the houses swayed to and fro like cradles, and from the chimney-tops to the foundations the walls cracked. Women, shrieking like maniacs, appeared at the windows in their night-dresses. The sky seemed to be all in flames. It glared with a blood-red color. Two more shocks succeeded each other at brief intervals, and the entire population rushed frantically into the streets, all in their night-dresses. Men, women and children jostled against one another. Fashionable beauties were cheek by jowl with beggars and servants. Each was fully confident that the last hour had come.

Few persons had the courage to return to hotel or home that day. In some cases the buildings were so cracked or twisted that a collapse was momentarily expected, and every one dreaded another shock. The Lieutenant-Governor, General Jamais, ordered tents to be erected. Under the shelter of the huge canvas coverings men, women and children gathered, lying on mattresses brought from their homes. Some fashionable residents on Wednesday night slept in their carriages in the open air, some in bathing-machines drawn up on the beach, while hack-drivers rented their vehicles for the night at five hundred francs ($100) as sleeping-places. The rush for the railroad was general. Passengers fought their way to the cars as each train drew up, and women and children were in some cases unable to get away for two days, and remained all that time on the platform of the depot with their tickets in their pockets.

Nice was not the only place shaken. The disturbance extended through the district called the Riviera of Genoa, which is situated on the shores of the Mediterranean, across the frontiers of France and Italy. The beautiful pleasure resort of Monaco escaped the worst features of the volcanic wave. Still, the panic was great. People were eating, drinking and camping out of doors. Baron Rothschild chartered a sleeping-car for the use of his family and himself. Gambling, however, went on almost as if nothing had happened.

Killed in a Church.

The correspondent of the New York Herald cables that "the populous province of Porto Maurizio bore the full brunt of the earthquake. Of its 106 Communes scarcely one escaped. It suffered severely from loss of life and property. At Bajardo, a small town of 1500 inhabitants, several shocks were felt at about twenty minutes to seven o'clock. At the first the inhabitants rushed in mad affright to the parish church, where they fell on their knees. The priests moved about trying in vain to calm their fears. Suddenly a severe shock caused the massive walls of the church to bulge and in another moment the sacred edifice collapsed, burying beneath its ruins several hundred, of whom 300 were killed or mutilated.

"At Mentone" houses are shattered like those in a bombarded city. The windows are blown out and the roofs knocked off. The earthquake was capricious, the old town being little injured. Most of the big hotels escaped. The Villa Carei was totally wrecked, but the Hôtel des Ambassadeurs, next door, had not even a glass broken.

"A Narrow Escape.

"Accounts of incidents are beginning to come in, especially those of hair-breadth escapes. Among others is that of Miss Chapelez, an American young lady, who was literally buried alive for some moments in the ruins of the Villa Natal, at Nice, but was eventually happily rescued. Mr. Hathaway, son of the American Consul, was among others injured. The King and Queen of Würtemberg remained in their villa and are still there. The Duc de Nemours and the Princess Blanche d'Orleans are encamping in the garden of the Villa Graziella, in which they were living. The duke had all his papers removed to the garden, with the characteristic remark, 'We must defend ourselves on the spot.'"

The Prince of Wales was at Nice a few days before the earthquake, but had quitted it for Cannes. On Wednesday morning, when the news of the calamity reached England, Queen Victoria telegraphed an anxious inquiry to the prince at Cannes, to be reassured that His Royal Highness had not been injured, and informing him that the Government requested him to return home at once, so as to allay the anxiety of the people regarding his safety.

Margaret Tells Mr. Crawford's Secret.

HOW MR. CRAWFORD WAS PAID.

(See Illustration.)

YOU might have searched every city and village of the State without finding a cleaner, brighter, more comfortable room than that in which Farmer Redfern sat down to supper one summer evening. His wife's happy face was opposite to him, and his daughter Margaret's light footstep could be heard in the kitchen across the hallway as she flitted to and fro, putting the last touches to the work of preparing the evening meal. Looking at all his surroundings, one would have said that Farmer Redfern must be a happy man, and if any family had the happiness to be without a skeleton in the cupboard it was the Redfern family. But in spite of appearances, the skeleton was there.

It was destined to peep out this evening before supper was put on the table. As the farmer sat quietly waiting a young man was ushered in, having requested speech with Mr. Redfern.

"My name is Crawford," he said; "I am a friend of your son, sir, and my business relates to him."

Instantly Mr. Redfern's face clouded over. It was easy to see that he had little reason to welcome visitors who announced themselves friends of his son. "That fact ought to be a passport to my regard, Mr. Crawford," he said, "but as you are one of Edgar's friends you will easily understand that it is not. Edgar, I am sorry to say, has caused me a great deal of anxiety, and latterly has brought shame and disgrace on a name unsullied until he bore it. I hear of his drinking and gambling, and I know that he is heavily in debt; I hope it is not an appeal for money that you have come to make."

"No," said Mr. Crawford, "I bring no appeal for money. I know that all you say is true. I am sorry to have to admit it. I have an appeal to make, however, but it is for mercy and forgiveness. I will tell you how the case stands now, and I hope you will see your way to grant both." Mr. Crawford leaned forward with clasped hands and pleaded earnestly for his friend. "You see, sir, Edgar is weak. He was a stranger to city life and was led astray. He was very popular and was much courted. It is so easy to go wrong. Edgar has fallen lower than you know. Debt is not the worst. He has been vicious, and has been so dissipated that he has lost his situation. His friends deserted him then and he fell into sickness, loneliness, and poverty. He is recovering now from a severe illness, and I believe he is a changed character. You are a religious man, Mr. Redfern, and you will, I know, have faith in the permanence of the change when I tell you that he has accepted Christ as his Saviour and is now rejoicing in Him.

"He will write you all this himself, but he would not do so when I urged him because he has made so many promises of reformation which have been broken, and he wanted to prove by his life what a radical change this is before telling you of it. In fact, he is ashamed of himself, and feared that you would not believe him."

"I expect I should be sceptical," Mr. Redfern admitted. "He could not expect anything else."

"He did not; and therefore would not write. But I have seen much of him and I assure you this is genuine. The thing I am anxious for is that you encourage him by taking him by the hand at the outset, and practically help him by having him home and letting your wife and daughter nurse him back to health in this delightful air."

Mr. Redfern hesitated. So many promises had, indeed, been made and broken. Before he replied, and while Mr. Crawford eagerly waited for his answer, Margaret, who had entered unperceived, said, "Father, Mr. Crawford has not told half the story. He has brought me a letter from Edgar, and I have read it while he has been talking. It is he whom we have to thank for this blessed news. Edgar says that when all alone, without a cent, and almost dying, Mr. Crawford came to him, brought him a doctor and a nurse, and has watched over him and given him Christian counsel. Edgar says that under God he owes to him his life and his soul."

Mrs. Redfern's face glowed with love and gratitude to the young man as Margaret spoke, and from the farmer's face fell the cloud of doubt. He rose, and extending his hand, said, "May God bless and reward you, my young friend, for your brotherly kindness to the fallen. Yes; let Edgar come by all means. He shall receive a hearty welcome. My heart is too full to say what I feel for you. I shall never forget your goodness, but I can never repay it. Let us see more of you; this home will never have a more welcome guest."

Farmer Redfern was taken at his word. Some months afterward when Edgar, well in body and regenerated in soul, had been reinstated in the position he had lost, and Mr. Redfern still persisted that he could never repay his son's benefactor, Mr. Crawford intimated that while he did not admit that he was Mr. Redfern's creditor, but ascribed all the glory to God, there was a way of most effectually discharging any claim that might lie on the farmer's conscience. Mr. Redfern listened, and afterward talked with his daughter Margaret about the mode of payment suggested by Mr. Crawford. It seemed that she knew all about it beforehand and fully approved. So, to the delight of all the parties, Mr. Crawford received the payment he coveted—the sister of his friend as his wife, and he thought himself much overpaid.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

Rescued.

NEVER did castaway mariner on an ocean rock scan the horizon with such a longing heart and searching gaze as did Alfred Atheling, and that by no means on his own account only, but for the sake of the gentle Inez, whose powers of endurance were almost at an end.

Suddenly the deep silence which had fallen upon them was broken by Will Trounce, the keen-eyed mariner who had more than once boasted for Inez's comfort that he could see a full-rigged barque at all but impossible distances. "A sail! a sail!" said he, and it may well be believed that the honest tar put all the soul he had into the cheering news.

Immediately the oar was high uplifted. The red shawl was hoisted, and then first one and then another shouted across the deep. It was unheeded, perhaps unheard, and the twilight was settling down so that they were most likely unseen. Captain Lanyon bethought him of his pistol. By his direction the little crew gave one loud simultaneous shout; then he fired his pistol, once, twice, thrice, with little intervals between.

Strange to say, just then there came a sudden darkness, and the strange craft on which all their hopes were set vanished utterly from their sight. Their new-kindled expectations of deliverance seemed blighted. A faint cry of pain was uttered by Inez. Alfred turned to cheer her, but her strength had failed her; collapse had come, and the poor girl fainted on his friendly arm. The young man was certain that she could never endure another long, long night upon that wild and wintry sea.

Again the captain fired his pistol in the air, and now that the darkness had deepened, its flash was clearly seen. In a few moments a rocket rose up quite near them, whizzing upward with a swift and rushing sound which fairly startled the occupants of the boat, and helped to restore to consciousness the maiden in the stern. The light of the rocket illumined the surface of the sea all around them, lit up their faces, and revealed the hull and masts of a ship close at hand. Again our waifs gave an answering shout, and a sympathetic cheer from the ship told them that help had really come.

"Thank God!" said Captain Lanyon, who at set of sun had felt that his hope was set too, for he saw that his darling's strength was gone, and his warm heart was sore within him.

"Thank God!" said Alfred Atheling, heaving a long-drawn sigh of relief, thankful most of all on account of the gentle and suffering maiden lying so listless and helpless on his breast.

With three experienced mariners like Captain Lanyon, Joe Hewitt, and Will Trounce on board the little skiff, it was not long before they reached the welcome ark which had come down in the dark to their relief, and the willing hands of those on board the ship were soon congenially employed in hoisting them on deck.

"Look here, mates," said Joe Hewitt, to the sympathetic tars who were conducting them to the cabin, "I reckon this 'll bring a bit o' special luck to this ere barque, let alone the marcy that it's brought to us. For why? Good reason, you're entertainin' an' angel unawares. Them's my sentiments." "An angel i' everything but wings," said Will, "an' she would ha' had them afore mornin', I'm thinkin'."

Both Inez and Alfred, as it now appeared, now that the strain was over and reaction had come, were very ill. All unused to such sharp exposure, they had suffered severely. The captain of the vessel had the maiden placed in his wife's cabin. Alfred was otherwise cared for, and both were invalids that it was essential to treat as such. The "seasoned timbers" of Captain Lanyon and his two comrades had enabled them successfully to endure the test.

In the course of the evening Captain Lanyon told his host the story of the Boadicea and its fate, and of their subsequent wanderings on the sea. That which roused the listening skipper to boiling point was the description of the ill-fated ship, and how poor a fight she made of it when the sea began to try her. The story elicited some very strong expletives from the indignant listener, more forcible than graceful by far.

"I call 'em murderers, reg'lar downright assassins. Owners that'll send craft like that to sea, because they're covered by insurance, regardless of what becomes of the men that mans 'em—they have no consciences, and their hearts are as callous as the coat of an alligator. I suppose that Boadicea o' yours was just about as rotten in her timbers as soaked junk in a leaky barrel."

"She was very craky an' cranky, too," said Captain Lanyon, a little more moderately.

"Rotten, sir! rotten, I tell you, as sure as my name's Crumpit—every beam an' plank an' stay. But I'll warrant not half so rotten as the men that owned her. Rotten as medlars all such rascals are, and the devil 'll meddle with them to some purpose. If he doesn't, then I say it's no use havin' a devil, that's all. What do you say?"

"I'm afraid it's too true. They deserve the most severe punishment," said Captain Lanyon.

"Punishment!" said the irate Captain Crumpit, "hangin's too good for 'em. I should like to gather together a fleet o' them floating coffins. Then I would put owners, merchants, middlemen, underwriters, everybody that has a hand in keeping the ghastly sailor-traps afloat, an' send 'em out of harbor in a reg'lar double-reefed tops'el gale o' wind. It would rid both sea and land of a pack of rubbish, and save thousands of precious sailors' lives."

Captain Crumpit was greatly relieved by this indignant outburst, and more calmly proceeded to give Captain Lanyon some information in return. "You are on board the Good Intent," said he, in answer to Captain Lanyon's inquiry. "As good and well bottomed a ship, ay, and as well managed, though I say it myself, as any ship that dips her nose into salt water. We've a cargo of wheat on board, so packed that ten bushels of it can't shift whatever kind of sea we have. We're from New York, and we are bound for the port of London, and as for where we are at this present moment, why, I expect and hope to smoke a pipe with the Buoy at Nore in a week or ten days, God willing."

When Alfred Atheling heard that, willy-nilly, he must return to that hateful city, the scene of his own wrong-doing, the place of his greatest peril, with all his new-born hopes and purposes concerning a redeemed life unfulfilled, his pain and disappointment were intense, and he wished that he had gone down with the old Boadicea into the depths of the sea. The depressing effect which this discovery had upon him retarded his recovery, and all the time that he remained on board the Good Intent, he was weak and ill in body, sad and sick of heart. There was one thing of which he was sure, whatever 'hap the day might bring,' by the help of God, if he could not evade the far-reaching arm of justice, he would never again act the fool as in the misspent and wasted past.

"Ralph Ravensworth," said he with a sigh, "shall never carry the disgrace that made Alfred Atheling unfit for wear."

It was well for his prospects in the fulfilment of that vow that the young man's heart, while these thoughts were passing through his mind, went out in longing to his mother, while his thoughts went up to God.

Inez Lanyon still suffered too, and had to keep her berth, with little alternations to the captain's cabin. Nothing could exceed the rough but kindly skipper's attention to his guest. "It's a rough cage," he said, "for such a dainty bird to be shut up in; but it's better than that bit of a cockleshell you were tumblin' about in when we picked you up; and a plaguey sight better than that creaking old coffin the Boadicea. The Boa-dish-you I should ha' called her, for she'd nearly dished you, an' ta'en you down to Davy Jones in her in'ards, like a boa constrictor. However, all's well that ends well, an' the old tub's gone. She's 'boa-deceased' now, thank goodness. Ha, ha, ha!" and Captain Crumpit laughed heartily at his own joke.

"You've got a good, well found, sound bottomed, likely looking craft under you, Captain Crumpit," said Captain Lanyon one day, as they were pacing the deck. "There's some comfort and pride in handling a ship like this." "Ay, ay, captain," the other said, "I'm proud of her; there isn't a stronger or a sounder craft afloat. She's a bit heavy in her build, and isn't altogether so easy to handle as some; but then she isn't skittish, and she can be depended on in rough-and-tumble kind o' weather. The fact is," said he, pausing in his walk, and looking at his companion as though he had something to say worth hearing, "the Good Intent is like her owner, sound from stem to stern. If you can say that of a shipowner, you may be quite sure that he'll have his vessels built on the same lines an' kept on 'em, till they can't very well be trusted for age an' wear. Then he'll break 'em up and not sell 'em for some scoundrel to make a sailor's coffin of."

"I should like, now that my cranky old tub has gone to the bottom, to get a vessel owned by a man of that sort," said Captain Lanyon, with a smile.

"Why," said Captain Crumpit, "it might happen to be possible. The owner of this has got several craft of his own as well as this. They are all in the corn and timber trade mostly. I'll answer for it that every ship's got a good character, because the gov'nor's got a good conscience, an' that's an article not too common either on sea or land. If it had been in your case, you would have been dropping anchor in the port of New York by this."

"Who did you say was the owner of the Good Intent?" inquired Captain Lanyon, still thinking of possible employment under such an admirable man.

"Why, he's a Quaker corn and timber merchant, whose warehouses line the Thames side in Smith Street near by London Bridge. His name's Ephraim Hartgold, and he deserves to have such a name, for if ever mortal man in this world had a heart of gold, it's the owner of the Good Intent. I dare say he'll board us off Gravesend, for Ephraim Hartgold has a knack of minding his own business pretty smartly, especially so far as his ships are concerned. Now, mark my word, if you happen to be on deck when he comes, the first words you'll hear him say will be—'Well, Captain Crumpit, what cheer? Are all the hands come back with you safe and sound?' That will be about the size of it; an' I verily believe that he would sooner hear a good acount of the men that man the vessel than about either the ship or the cargo. What's the consequence? There's not a man or lad on board the Good Intent, from skipper to cabin boy, that doesn't honor him, or that would spare any amount of pains to serve his interests."

This excellent character, so heartily and spontaneously accorded, made Captain Lanyon more than ever anxious to be taken into the good Quaker's employ, and he determined to try his chances at the earliest opportunity. Soon afterward the Good Intent, favored with a fair wind and a flow-tide, passed the Nore, and anchored off Gravesend, as usual, to wait for further orders.

No sooner did Alfred Atheling hear the anchor-chains rattle through the hause-holes as the vessel hove-to than a full sense of his peril, exaggerated by his fears, broke upon him with overpowering force. He was once again in England! He who had fled from justice; he who was specially "wanted" by Police Constable Tugwell, who would be only too glad to retrieve his former blunder by the recapture of his former prisoner; he for whose capture a reward was offered, was once again within the possible and probable grasp of the law he had offended! The word absconded, which he himself had read concerning himself in the "Agony" columns of the daily papers, seemed to be written in letters of fire on the cabin wall; and he felt impelled to leave the ship without an hour's delay.

His fears and forebodings were deepened and intensified when the innocent Inez, noting his pale face and haggard features, laid her hand upon his arm and looked up at him with love-lighted eyes. "Oh, Mr. Ravensworth!" she said, in soft and winsome tones, "you are sad. Dear friend, tell me what it is?" As she spoke the dark eyes of this fair daughter of the south were filled with tears, and there was that in her tones which revealed a secret that was not as yet understood by herself, nor recognized by her young and gentle heart.

For one startled moment Alfred was silent. Two things were made manifest to him at once. "She loves me," thought he; and then he thought how dearly he should delight to kiss those tears away. But the discovery distressed him exceedingly. He felt unspeakably sad, even while he felt how great would be his joy to hear such an avowal from her own sweet lips. All that was best and manliest in Alfred Atheling now came uppermost and to the front. The sore discipline through which he had lately passed had been of infinite moral value to him, and he was sincerely alarmed and grieved at the knowledge unwittingly revealed to him that the maiden's heart was or might be his own. He had never thought to win her love; he had regarded her as little more than a child. She was young in years, and had the appearance of being younger than she was. But like everything that belongs to the tropic region, where the sun displays his regal power, the maiden rapidly approached the line which divides the girl from the woman, and Alfred was a youth of great personal attractions, and his behavior through all the sad season of their dire distress had been such as was sure to win upon a trusting, sensitive, loving, and grateful spirit as her own.

Now that Alfred felt that such a prize was within his reach, his cheeks tingled with shame. His heart throbbed with the feeling of his own unworthiness. He felt that he could not, ought not, dared not, for one moment seek to ally his fortunes with those of the innocent and beautiful girl before him; could not, ought not, dared not, seek to bind to her his own smirched reputation, and to give to her a name which he himself much feared he could never wear again.

"It makes me so sad to see you sad," repeated Inez. "Father says that you had better go with us for a little while to our little home at Deal. You will soon pick up your health again down there, he says." And then she added with a sigh, "I know that it has been your great care and trouble for me that has made you so weak and ill. I would try to help you to get well again. You will go with us, won't you?"

JACOB AT BETHEL.

AT the age of one hundred and seventy-five years Abraham died; but before his death he secured for Isaac, his son, a believing wife of his own kindred from Mesopotamia. Two sons were born to Isaac and Rebekah; but before their birth God foretold to her, "The elder shall serve the younger." Isaac and Rebekah yielded to the temptation common to parents, to show partiality. Esau was Isaac's boy—a fine, manly, open hearted, but unspiritual youth, just one whom every one would admire. Jacob, the quiet, thoughtful, calculating, but spiritual youth was his mother's joy. In early life the tendency of both was manifest. With Esau the present moment was everything; Jacob, on the contrary, made his calculations for the far future.

When Esau one day returned faint from hunting and found Jacob preparing pottage, he asked Jacob to feed him with it. It was ungenerous and unbrotherly in Jacob to make any terms with his brother in his hour of need, but he could not resist taking the advantage which lay so ready to his hand, "Sell me this day thy birthright," was his instant stipulation. Jacob cared for all which the birthright entailed; Esau was indifferent to it; how could it be wrong, then, for Jacob to secure it? The wrong was in his Leaving God Out of the Question.

By God's word to his mother, the inheritance was his; but it was not for him to grasp greedily after it to the prejudice of his brother. Esau, with his wonted indifference, said, "Behold, I am at the point to die: and what profit shall this birthright do to me?" Jacob made his brother swear; he would use all means in his power to secure his possession. "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord" (Jer. 17: 5).

Time went on; Isaac grew old, and his eyes became dim. Then, thinking that the day of his death might be near, he called Esau to prepare him venison, and to come and receive his blessing. Rebekah had counted on the promise of God for her younger son, and Jacob had counted on his own sharp-sightedness; now it seemed as though the hopes of both were to be blighted, as though the unspiritual Esau were coming in for the patriarchal blessing after all. It was a trial of faith;

Could they Trust God?

Would not He be able so to arrange as to fulfil His promises? Without referring the matter to God, Rebekah leaned on her own shrewdness. She was, no doubt, a good manager, and fully in the habit of trusting to her own capacity for carrying through that which she undertook. There are many like her—energetic, contriving women, who often keep their husband's business together, without whom it would come to ruin. But Rebekah needed to learn that, as one who came in the direct line of the man of faith, Abraham, she was called to put faith, which counts on God, before shrewdness, which counts on self.

Finding that by fair means she could not accomplish her purpose, Rebekah resorted to deceit, and thus gave the father of lies a foothold in the family of the faithful. At her instigation Jacob played an untrue part, personated Esau, and succeeded in deceiving his blind father, and obtaining the blessing. But it did not come from a heart at rest, and surely Jacob must have felt the stings of conscience when the blind old man in his perplexity cried out, "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau." Isaac, too, had failed, for he had not asked of God His mind concerning the blessing. Oh, what misery comes into a family where God's counsel is not sought by each one in every step of the way!

Jacob obtained his father's blessing and his brother's curse at the same time. If he had only to bring out His own thought, he would have come in for the blessing without alienating Esau from him, without losing his father's confidence, and without loading his own soul with the guilt of lying and deceit. The once united family was now full of distrust and hate, and Esau went so far as to say, in the hearing of one who told Rebekah, "The days of mourning for my father are at hand; then will I slay my brother Jacob" As usual, Rebekah comes in to manage; she plans that Jacob shall leave home and shall go to Padan-aram, to his uncle Laban, until Esau's anger is passed by; and she makes it right with Isaac by saying that Jacob is going to find a wife from among her kindred. Thus it comes about that Jacob, the home-loving man, goes forth from the circle he so loved, and becomes a traveller. He was alone, more alone than he had realized till now, neither father, mother, brother, nor yet the consciousness of God's presence with him. Only those who have passed through it can describe the sense of which breaks in upon a soul with the consciousness of "having no hope" and being "without God in the world" (Eph. 2: 12). It is unutterable. Only a day or two ago Jacob was the loved and honored home son of the family; now the same Jacob was an unknown, lonely stranger burdened with the bitter remorse that he had broken up the family peace, with the knowledge that he was in his father's eyes a liar, in the eyes of Esau, who had looked up to him before, a deceiver and a supplanter. His thoughts of his mother were that she had tempted him to sin; not one thought of the past brought rest; all goaded him on to despair. Exhausted with his weary journey, he slept with stones for his pillow; and it was just then that the Lord drew near. Jacob dreamed.

Waited for God

It was God's wont to speak in dreams in those days when there was no Bible, as there now is, to teach His children. "God speaketh . . . in a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men" (Job 33: 14, 15). Thus God spoke to Jacob; he saw "a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven." Here was a way of getting at God, a way in which God would reach down to him; here was Something to Meet him in his Despair.

Jacob did not understand all he saw. With the light of the New Testament, we see in that ladder Jesus uniting heaven and earth, God and man. "I am the Way" (John 14: 6); "Through Him we both have our access by one Spirit unto the Father" (Eph. 2: 18). Jacob saw communication actually established; the angels of God were ascending, carrying up his prayers, and descending, bringing down the answers to him, the sinful outcast from his home, the sinner before God. He deserved blame and punishment; he received grace. Surely his eyes were fixed, not on the foot of the ladder, which touched him, but on the far-away rungs, which went right into the glory. There the Lord stood above it, and He spoke, and spoke to Jacob, "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed."

"A dream cometh through the multitude of business" (Eccl. 5: 3), and generally dreams partake of the waking thoughts which most occupy us. Jacob's heart had been set on the blessing; he almost sacrificed his soul for the blessing, and now God showed him that, though he had followed in a wrong path, God was not untrue to him. Oh, it is "the goodness of God" which "leadeth . . . to repentance" (Rom. 2: 4). After repeating to Jacob the promise made to Abraham and to Isaac (Gen. 26: 24), He said, "And in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed;" even Jacob was to be made a blessing! "And, behold, I am with thee." Oh, how the heart of Jacob, sore from his very loneliness, must have leapt at these words! Then, a blessed unseen but real presence of God was round him all the time. "And will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of." It is more than probable that this was the first real communication of God to Jacob. How would he take it? His first thought was of fear. He awaked and said, "Surely the Lord is in this place; and I knew it not. . . . How dreadful is this place! this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (Ps. 111: 10). Jacob's fear was not like that of Adam when he sinned and hid away from God; Jacob's fear drove him to God. He "rose up early in the morning, and took the stone which he had put for his pillows, and set it up for a pillar, and poured oil upon the top of it," that it might be consecrated to God; and he called the name of the place Bethel (the house of God). Sinful, inconsistent, mean as Jacob was, he never turned his back on any overture from God; his soul always thirsted for God. But, like many more,

After All, he was Not Alone;

He Did Not Believe All that God Said to him.

He "vowed a vow, saying, If God will be with me." If? Had not God promised to be with him? Jacob still trusted only partially in God, and a great deal in himself. "If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace; then shall the Lord be my God; and this stone, which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's house: and of all that Thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto Thee." Only the tenth? But, reader, do you give even as much as that? Do you consecrate to God's work one dime of every dollar?

NOTHING TO PAY!

Nothing to pay! Ah, nothing to pay!
Never a word of excuse to say!
Year after year thou hast filled the score,
Owing thy Lord still more and more.
Hear the voice of Jesus say,
"Verily thou hast nothing to pay."
Ruined, lost, art thou, and yet
I forgave thee all that debt."

Nothing to pay! The debt is so great;
What will you do with the awful weight?
How shall the way of escape be made?
Nothing to pay! yet it must be paid!
Hear the voice of Jesus say,
"Verily thou hast nothing to pay!
All has been put to my account,
I have paid the full amount."

Nothing to pay; yes, nothing to pay!
Jesus has cleared all the debt away,
Blotted it out with His bleeding hand!
Free and forgiven and loved you stand.
Hear the voice of Jesus say,
"Verily thou hast nothing to pay!
Paid is the debt, and the debtor free!
Now I ask thee, lovest thou Me?"

FLAGS at half-mast on public buildings and private houses in New York and Brooklyn, the City Hall, and municipal edifices draped with sombre hangings, and the general look of depression that sits on thousands of faces, tells the stranger that death has recently seized as its prey a life that was precious to the community. It is unnecessary to ask who it is that

THE PEOPLE MOURN.

The name of Henry Ward Beecher is on all lips, and it is spoken in tones of sorrowful affection by men of all classes. Not for a public official, nor a statesman nor highly placed dignitary is all this mourning, but for a plain Congregational clergyman, who had taken an interest in the welfare of the people, and identified himself with them as a brother.

It will be forty years on May 16th next since Mr. Beecher preached his first sermon to his Brooklyn people. He went there comparatively unknown, his reputation having then spread but to a small circle outside of Indianapolis, Ind., where he was then pastor. Prior to his removal to Indianapolis he had had but one charge—that of Lawrenceburg, Ind., where, as everywhere else, he endeared himself to his people, but where he had given but few indications of the mental power and oratorical gifts which were to place him, in the prime of life, in the first rank of the preachers of the whole world.

Henry Ward Beecher was

on June 24th, 1813. He was, therefore, in his seventy-fourth year when he died on March 8th, 1887. His father was the Rev. Lyman Beecher, one of the first pulpit orators of his day, whose eccentricities have formed the subject of many a ludicrous story. He could trace his line directly back to a widow, Hannah Beecher, who settled in New Haven in 1638, eighteen years after the landing of the Pilgrims. The boy lost his mother when he was but three years old. He was too young to understand all that the great change implied, but that his mind had been busy with the problem is clear from an anecdote told of him by his sister, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe. She says: "They told us at one time that she had been laid in the ground, at another that she had gone to heaven; whereupon Henry, putting the two things together, resolved to dig through the ground and go to heaven to find mother; for being discovered under sister Catherine's window one morning, digging with great zeal and earnestness, she called to him to know what he was doing, and lifting up his curly head with great simplicity, he answered, 'Why, I'm going to heaven to find ma.'"

Dr. Lyman Beecher married again at the end of a year, and of his stepmother's character Mr. Beecher thus spoke: "My dear mother—not she that gave me birth, but she that brought me up; she that did the office-work of a mother, if ever a mother did; she that, according to her ability, performed to the uttermost her duties—was a woman of profound veneration, rather than of a warm and loving nature."

THE EARLIEST SCHOOL-DAYS

of Mr. Beecher were not such as to forecast a brilliant future, for as a boy he was deficient in memory, painfully sensitive, and very diffident. At the age of twelve years the whole atmosphere of his life was changed by the removal of the family from the dear old home in Litchfield (a picture of which appears in Panel No. 1 of the first page) to Boston. There Henry was entered as a pupil at the Latin School, and made considerable progress. The biographies of Nelson and Captain Cook, which he read at this time, strongly impelled him to seek a life of freedom and adventure. Through the subterfuge of a letter, purposely placed for his father's inspection, he made known his intention. Dr. Beecher received it with apparent approbation, and shrewdly suggested that the boy first take a course in mathematics and navigation, preparatory to his departure. The youth gladly acceded to the reasonable proposition, and was soon established where, under helpful influences, he made good progress in mathematics and elocution. At the end of a year, and when he was between seventeen and eighteen years old, he was spiritually benefited by an evangelical revival which was in progress, and united with his father's church in Boston. His dreams of naval ambition were very soon merged into aspirations for the ministry of the Gospel, with a view to which he entered upon a two years' course in preparation for college, where, in 1834, he graduated, and rejoined his father, who, in 1832, had removed to Cincinnati. Before doing so he had taught school for a time at Hopkinton, in a little building (a picture of which fills Panel No. 2 of the first page illustration).

It was while he was a student at Amherst College that the future brilliant preacher made his first public speech. It was delivered at the College Debating Society, in a debate on Garrison's Attack of the Colonial Society. Beecher was assigned to speak on the anti-Garrison side, but in reading up the subject, his mind changed, and at the last moment he surprised the meeting by joining the ranks of his adversaries.

His next step toward qualifying himself for the work of preaching the Gospel was to enter upon the study of theology at Lane Seminary, of which his father, Dr. Lyman Beecher, was Principal. During his course there, he PREACHED HIS FIRST SERMON.

The Presbyterian Church at Batavia had been without a regular pastor for a short time prior to 1833, and Dr. Beecher, his son-in-law, Rev. Charles E. Stowe, and other professors from Lane Seminary held occasional services, and kept an eye on the little flock. In 1833 Rev. George Beecher was called to the pastorate, and remained till 1837. It was while his elder brother was the pastor that Henry first entered the pulpit. He was spending a week at his brother's house, and consented to preach for him. Mr. Beecher, writing recently to the editor of the Brooklyn Magazine, thus refers to the incident: "My brother George wished to be away a Sunday, and I was requested by him to supply his pulpit. Text, sermon, and all attendant circumstances are gone from my memory, except the greenness—no doubt of that. When in 1837 I was ready to leave the seminary I went over to Covington, Ky., and preached in the Presbyterian Church for several Sundays, and expected to form a church there and remain, but a call from Lawrenceburg, Ind., was made, and I was soon settled there for two years and over. Thence to Indianapolis for eight years, and in October, 1847, I came to Brooklyn. I have been preaching over fifty years. My next call and settlement will probably be in Greenwood." was not a grand beginning to his ministry. It was then but a small settlement twenty miles below Cincinnati, on the river Ohio. There was a Presbyterian Church there that would seat one hundred and fifty people; there were twenty members, one man and nineteen women. With the exception of two, every one was dependent for her livelihood on her industry. He had married only a short time before Eunice, daughter of Dr. Bullard, who survives him (whose portrait appears on another page). He and Mrs. Beecher lived in two rooms over a stable, and studied economy on four hundred dollars per year, of which only two hundred and fifty dollars could be relied upon with certainty. The balance was supposed to be given in provisions by the people of the church.

THE CALL TO LAWRENCEBURG

Referring to this period, Mr. Beecher observed: "I remember the days of our poverty, our straitness. I was sexton of my own church at that time. There were no lamps there, so I bought some; and I filled them and lit them. I swept the church and lighted my own fire. I did not ring the bell, because there was none to ring. I opened the church before prayer-meetings and preaching, and locked it when they were over. We were all poor together. And to the day of my death I never shall forget one of those faces or hear one of those names spoken without having excited in my mind the warmest remembrances. Some of them I venerate, and the memory of some has been precious as well as fruitful of good to me down to this hour."

The following is a graphic sketch of his

during those years: "When he needed a house to live in, he hauled the logs himself. His neighbors aided him to put it up. The whitewash and paint he attended to himself. The rapidity with which his children followed each other and the malarial condition of the section in which he lived broke down the strong constitution of his wife, and as they were unable to pay a servant, threw on him the domestic drudgery. He chopped the wood, drew the water, peeled the potatoes, cooked the food, served it, washed the dishes, and cleaned up the house. When sickness necessitated frequent washings of soiled clothes, it was he who did the work. Part of the time he did double duty, and rode twenty miles through the woods and across the prairies to the log schoolhouse, in which service was held, preached, rode back again, cooked the dinner, preached in his own church, returned to nurse his sick wife and attend to the children, got the supper, and spent the evening in the prayer-meeting. At times he was so poor that an unpaid letter, on which eighteen or twenty cents were due, remained in the post-office, with news from the East, uncalled for, because he did not have the money with which to pay the postage."

At the end of two years Mr. Beecher accepted, after several applications, a call to the church at Indianapolis. Here his salary became six hundred dollars per annum, but the nominal increase was of no real advantage to the young minister and his wife; for, on the one hand, their regular expenses were larger, and, on the other, he was the city minister, and was expected to entertain the country clergymen.

ARRIVAL IN BROOKLYN.

It was the year 1847 that brought Mr. Beecher to Brooklyn as the pastor of Plymouth Church. He had published in book form while living at Indianapolis a series of "Lectures to Young Men." Copies of the work had found their way into Brooklyn, among others who read them being several gentlemen who were then organizing Plymouth Church and were in search of a pastor, and to whom Mr. Beecher had been strongly recommended by William T. Cutler, of New York. They had purchased in June, 1846, for $20,000, the ground upon which now stands Plymouth Church, and which already contained an edifice of worship. They had paid outright the sum of $9500, giving a mortgage for the remainder. Possession was given May 16th, 1847, which was the Sunday morning on which Mr. Beecher preached his first sermon in the Plymouth pulpit.

Early in the spring of that year a committee from the church organization had gone to Indianapolis to learn something more of the author of the "Lectures to Young Men." They secured an invitation for him to deliver an address in New York before the Board of Foreign Missions. This he accepted, and the address being perfectly satisfactory to the church committee, a preliminary call was extended to him before he returned home. The sermon of May 16th was preached before his return, and, in fact, the pastorate at Indianapolis was not terminated until the September following. At the first services, on October 10th, the church in the morning was about three quarters full; in the evening it was completely full, and in a short space of time the edifice was found to be inadequate to the constantly increasing congregation. In a year's time it was found necessary to build a new edifice, and in about one year and a half after the arrival of Mr. Beecher the corner-stone of the present structure was laid. In January of the following year (1850) it was opened for worship. (A picture of Plymouth Church is No. 5 on the first page.) soon after this took possession of the preacher. The great question of the day was one in which he took the deepest interest. In his pulpit, in the columns of the Independent, and in any place where an abolition meeting was being held within his reach Mr. Beecher proclaimed war on slavery. In one of his anti-slavery meetings he created a dramatic scene by throwing a coil of slave chains upon the platform and trampling on them. In another address in the Broadway Tabernacle he described some atrocity in the South, and at the end he said, "Is there anybody worse than that in Sing Sing?" From the highest gallery a shrill voice called out, "Yes." "I give it up, then," said Mr. Beecher; "you've been there."

During the war the church was largely instrumental in raising and equipping a regiment, known as the First Long Island Regiment, and many of the young men of the church were members of it, Mr. Beecher's eldest son being an officer. To another regiment—the Fourteenth—the church contributed nearly all the men in two companies. During that terrible struggle Mr. Beecher's exertions were unwearied. Speaking, writing, advising, he went into the campaign with an intense desire to keep the public opinion of the time faithful to the Northern cause. At last he broke down under fatigue, and was obliged to seek rest in Europe. There the demands upon him arose from the strong pro-Southern feeling manifested in society. Mr. Beecher could not be silent. He struggled vehemently to change the feeling and enlist sympathy for the North. He was interrupted in his speeches, denounced in press and platform, and narrowly escaped personal maltreatment.

When he returned to America the close of the war was near at hand, and then, with the penetration which characterized him, he perceived the need of a different message. Now it was not opposition to the South that he labored to arouse, but peace, forgiveness, and magnanimity. It mattered nothing to him that such teaching might be unwelcome. He spoke the message that was in him, whether men would hear or whether they would forbear. Men listened, and Beecher's popularity grew with marvellous rapidity. The streets of Brooklyn leading from the ferries were busy with processions of men from New York looking for "Beecher." The policemen never waited for a stranger to conclude his question, but invariably interrupted him, and said, "Follow the crowd."

Plymouth Church rose to be the most prosperous in the country. Its revenues in 1868 amounted to $50,000 a year. The debt had been entirely extinguished, and the church was devoting its surplus to missionary operations in the neighborhood. A new organ had been purchased, at a cost of $22,000. It was the largest church organ in the country. These were years of astounding financial prosperity, and Plymouth Church and its pastor were matters of national pride.

AS AN AUTHOR.

Mr. Beecher also became known to multitudes to whom he was personally unknown. Few persons know what an immense amount of literary work he accomplished. The following is a list of the published works: Sermons, ten volumes, of 475 pages each; Sermons, four volumes, of 600 pages each; "A Summer Parish," 240 pages; "Yale Lectures on Preaching," first, second, and third series; "Lectures to Young Men," 506 pages; "Star Papers," 600 pages; "Pleasant Talk About Fruits, Flowers, and Farming," 498 pages; "Lecture-Room Talks," 384 pages; "Norwood; or, Village Life in New England," 549 pages; "The Overture of Angels;" "Eyes and Ears; or, Thoughts as They Occur;" "Freedom and War;" "Royal Truths," "Views and Experiences of Religious Subjects," and the unfinished "Life of Jesus Christ."

DISASTER.

The most distressing episode in Mr. Beecher's life, both for him and his friends, occurred when his fame and influence were at their zenith. At a time when men of character, intelligence, and piety hung upon his words, when the most cultured classes of the country accepted him as their guide, when the first place as a preacher and an orator was accorded to him on all hands, and when his writings were eagerly read from one end of the land to the other, a formidable assault was made upon his reputation. At first vague hints were circulated reflecting upon him, then a direct charge appeared in print, but not in a quarter to which the people looked for reliable information. Finally, in an action at law, brought by Theodore Tilton against Mr. Beecher, with a claim for $100,000 damages, the whole case was disclosed, and for six months the prurient appetites of the sensual and the malice of scoffers at Christianity were gratified by the details of the terrible accusation against the pastor of Plymouth Church.

Three times did Mr. Beecher meet his accusers, and three times the charge was investigated. First it was heard by a committee of the church, appointed at Mr. Beecher's request, and the committee pronounced the pastor innocent. Afterward it was tried in court when the jury disagreed, and thirdly by a council of Congregational ministers. Undoubtedly the scandal was a cause of reproach not only to Mr. Beecher, but to religion. That it would be so if it was made public, whatever the issue might be, Mr. Beecher and his friends had foreseen from the first, and, unhappily, in attempting to prevent its coming to trial, they actually prejudiced the case, and their efforts to keep it from the public were regarded as an admission of guilt. It was a noteworthy fact that Theodore Tilton, who brought the charge, was a protégé of Mr. Beecher's, a man possessing undoubted talent, a sphere for the exercise of which had been provided by Mr. Beecher. The unwavering to its pastor during this fierce ordeal, the love and sympathy of his wife, and the unfaltering allegiance of a host of friends in this country and in Europe encouraged and supported him, and enabled him to continue his pastorate and public work. With the quaint humor, which was always characteristic of the man, he compared the unceasing efforts of his friends on his behalf as "the humane attempt of good men to drag an ass out of a pit."

At first Mr. Beecher's public appearances were limited to his own pulpit, but in 1880 he once more came to the front in the Presidential campaign, as an advocate of Garfield's election. The cheers of his fellow-citizens when he made his appearance on the political platform, and the persistent cries for "Beecher! Beecher!" showed that his influence and popularity remained to him. He continued to take part in public affairs, and in the campaign of 1884 he worked with indefatigable energy for the election of Mr. Cleveland. It was a novel sight, that of this ardent Republican appearing on Democratic platforms, and it caused him the loss of many old friends, who urged him, if he was unable on conscientious grounds and for personal reason to support the candidate of his party, at least to hold his peace and content himself with a silent vote. But he could not be moved or restrained, and he continued his efforts until the day of election.

Mr. Beecher's seventieth birthday was celebrated by the church and the whole city with general enthusiasm. An ovation was accorded to him such as no minister has received in this generation. That it pleased him and cheered him was evident, and when it was repeated shortly afterward, on the occasion of his setting out on a European tour, Mr. Beecher could not find words to express his grateful appreciation of this confidence and love. He returned on October 31st, last year, after a period of four months passed in lecturing, preaching, and delightful travel. He immediately set to work with redoubled energy.

In the midst of his work, and while ardently looking forward to years of activity and usefulness, he has been suddenly stricken down. He died, however, as he wished to die—with his harness on. Repeatedly he had expressed the hope that he might be

Spared a Lingering Illness

—that his death might be sudden and painless. After the first few hours of restlessness on Thursday night (March 3), he sank into a condition of unconsciousness, in which, as his physicians were able to assure his family, he suffered little, if at all, and he died on the following Tuesday, so peacefully that his weeping wife and the relatives who surrounded his bed could not be sure when the final change had occurred.

Mr. Beecher leaves a daughter (Mrs. Scoville) and three sons, William, Herbert, and Henry Barton. None of the young men have shown any predilection for the ministry, nor appear to have inherited their father's oratorical gifts. Mr. Beecher was tenderly attached to them all, and was ready to make any sacrifice to keep them near to him. The affection he felt for his family was to an unusual degree manifested to all with whom he came in close contact. Indeed, his heart seemed large enough to admit the whole world. The constant subject of his discourses was love. It was the side of Christianity to which he was most attracted. That it led him into doctrinal error must be admitted, as any one-sided view must do.

He Loved All

men so much that he could not abandon hope of their restoration, even when the Scriptures give no warrant for hope. The fact, however, was characteristic of him. He trusted men, and took charitable views of them when every one else had given them up. Though cheated and imposed upon repeatedly, his ear was ever open to a tale of woe, and unworthy persons found no difficulty in gaining access to his pocketbook, if they could show their necessities. As a contemporary observes, "Mr. Beecher was forever aiding his friends, lending them money, indorsing their notes, getting them out of troubles, and bearing their burdens. He was indiscretion itself in the management of his pecuniary affairs, and although he was comically careful at the spigot he was largely lavish at the bung." It estimates the aggregate receipts of the pastor from his church, his lectures, and his books during the last forty years of his life at a million and a quarter of dollars, of which but little now remains. The fact was one more bond of love between him and the community. They returned the love he lavished upon them. Few men in our day have passed away amid such signs of heartfelt sorrow as those with which Brooklyn to-day expresses her grief for the loss of her famous orator, author, and preacher.

A Pledge was Signed to Please a Child on Blackwell's Island, New York, last week. A meeting of the inmates of the workhouse was held to celebrate the first anniversary of the founding of the Temperance Society on the Island. Superintendent Stocking organized it just a year ago, and has earnestly endeavored to bring into it all who pass under his care. At the meeting Colonel Hadley delivered an address, after which the inmates were invited to sign the pledge. About eighty responded. Among those who sat still was a middle-aged woman. Superintendent Stocking's little daughter, about seven years old, approached her, and calling her by name, asked, "Won't you come, too?" The woman hesitated. She had signed once before, and had failed. The little pleading face won, however, and with tears in her eyes, she said, "I have a little one like you, and for her sake I will try again." She was led up by the child, and signed her name.

STINGING ANNOYANCES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, March 13, 1887.

"The Lord thy God will send the hornet."—Deut. 7 : 20.

The Insectile World Hostile to Men—An Army Defeated by Hornets—Insectile Annoyances—The Product of Sensitive Organization—Disturbing Acquaintances—Naomi's Reception—H. M. Stanley's Cross-Examiners—A Philadelphia Hostler's Pessimism—Physical Trouble—Domestic Irritation—Business Irritations—Prolific Annoyances—The Use of the Hornet—Awakening—Inculcating Patience—Trouble in Homœopathic Doses—The Piper of Hamelin—A Painting of Ten Thousand Touches—A Tariff on Annoyances—Life the Vestibule of Heaven—Polycarp's Bower of Fire.

It seems as if the insectile world were determined to extirpate the human race. It bombards the grain fields and the orchards and the vineyards. The Colorado beetle, the Nebraska grasshopper, the New Jersey locust, the universal potato-beetle, seem to carry on the work which was begun ages ago when the insects buzzed out of Noah's Ark as the door was opened.

In my text, the hornet flies out on its mission. It is a species of wasp, swift in its motion and violent in its sting.

Its Touch is Torture

to man or beast. We have all seen the cattle run bellowing under the cut of its lancet. In boyhood we used to stand cautiously looking at the globular nest hung from the tree-branch, and while we were looking at the wonderful covering we were struck with something that sent us shrieking away. The hornet goes in swarms. It has captains over hundreds, and twenty of them alighting on one man will produce death.

The Persians attempted to conquer a Christian city, but the elephants and the beasts on which the Persians rode were assaulted by the hornet, so that the whole army was broken up, and the besieged city was rescued. This burning and noxious insect stung out the Hittites and the Canaanites from their country. What gleaming sword and chariot of war could not accomplish was done by the puncture of an insect. The Lord sent the hornet.

My friends, when we are assaulted by great Behemoths of trouble, we become chivalric, and we assault them ; we get on the high-mettled steed of our courage, and we make a cavalry charge at them, and, if God be with us, we come out stronger and better than when we went in. But, alas, for these of life—these foes too small to shoot—these things without any avoirdupois weight—the gnats and the midges and the flies and the wasps and the hornets! In other words, it is the small stinging annoyances of our life which drive us out and use us up. In the best-conditioned life, for some grand and glorious purpose God has sent the hornet.

I remark, in the first place, that these small stinging annoyances may come in the shape of a Nervous Organization.

People who are prostrated under typhoid fevers or with broken bones get plenty of sympathy ; but who pities anybody that is nervous? The doctors say, and the family say, and everybody says, "Oh, she's only a little nervous ; that's all!" The sound of a heavy foot, the harsh clearing of a throat, a discord in music, a want of harmony between the shawl and the glove on the same person, a curt answer, a passing slight, the wind from the east, any one of ten thousand annoyances, opens the door for the hornet. The fact is that the vast majority of the people in this country are overworked, and their nerves are the first to give out. A great multitude are under the strain of Leyden, who, when he was told by his physician that if he did not stop working while he was in such poor physical health he would die, responded, "Doctor, whether I live or die, the wheel must keep going round." These sensitive persons of whom I speak have a bleeding sensitiveness. The flies love to light on anything raw, and these people are like the Canaanites spoken of in the text or in the context—they have a very thin covering, and are vulnerable at all points. "And the Lord sent the hornet."

Again, the small insect annoyances may come to us in the shape of

who are always saying disagreeable things There are some people you cannot be with for half an hour but you feel cheered and comforted. Then there are other people you cannot be with for five minutes before you feel miserable. They do not mean to disturb you, but they sting you to the bone. They gather up all the yarn which the gossips spin, and retail it. They gather up all the adverse criticisms about your person, about your business, about your home, about your church, and they make your ear the funnel into which they pour it. They laugh heartily when they tell you, as though it were a good joke, and you laugh, too—outside.

These people are brought to our attention in the Bible, in the Book of Ruth. Naomi went forth beautiful and with the finest of worldly prospects, and into another land ; but, after a while, she came back widowed and sick and poor. What did her friends do when she came to the city? They all went out, and, instead of giving her common-sense consolation, what did they do? Read the Book of Ruth and find out. They threw up their hands and said, "Is this Naomi?" as much as to say, "How awful bad you do look!"

When I Entered the Ministry

I looked very pale for years, and every year, for four or five years, a hundred times a year I was asked if I had not the consumption ; and, passing through the room I would sometimes hear people sigh and say, "A-ah! not long for this world!" I resolved in those times that I never, in any conversation, would say anything depressing, and by the help of God I have kept the resolution. These people of whom I speak reap and bind in the great harvest-field of discouragement. Some day you greet them with an hilarious "good-morning," and they come buzzing at you with some depressing information. "The Lord sent the hornet."

It is astonishing how some people prefer to write and to say disagreeable things. That was the case when, eight or nine years ago, Henry M. Stanley returned after his magnificent exploit of Finding David Livingstone.

When Mr. Stanley stood before the savants of Europe, and many of the small critics of the day, under pretence of getting geographical information, put to him most insolent questions, he folded his arms and refused to answer. At the very time when you would suppose all decent men would have applauded the heroism of the man, there were those to hiss. "The Lord sent the hornet." And when afterward that man sat down on the western coast of Africa, sick and worn out, with, perhaps, the grandest achievement of the age in the way of geographical discovery, there were small critics all over the world to buzz and buzz, and caricature and deride him, and when, after a while, he got the London papers, as he opened them out flew the hornet. When I see that there are so many people in the world who like to say disagreeable things, and write disagreeable things, I come almost in my weaker moments to believe what a man said to me in Philadelphia one Monday morning. I went to get the horse at the livery stable, and the hostler, a plain man, said to me, "Mr. Talmage, I saw that you preached to the young men yesterday." I said, "Yes." He said, "No use, no use ; man's a failure."

The small insect annoyances of life sometimes come in the shape of local

Physical Trouble,

which does not amount to a positive prostration, but which bothers you when you want to feel the best. Perhaps it is a sick-headache which has been the plague of your life, and you appoint some occasion of mirth, or sociality, or usefulness, and when the clock strikes the hour you cannot make your appearance. Perhaps the trouble is between the ear and the forehead, in the shape of a neuralgic twinge. Nobody can see it or sympathize with it ; but just at the time when you want your intellect clearest, and your disposition brightest, you feel a sharp, keen, disconcerting thrust, "The Lord sent the hornet."

Perhaps these small insect annoyances will come in the shape of a Domestic Irritation.

The parlor and the kitchen do not always harmonize. To get good service, and to keep it, is one of the great questions of the country. Sometimes it may be the arrogancy and inconsiderateness of employers, but, whatever be the fact, we all admit there are these insect annoyances winging their way out from the culinary department. If the grace of God be not in the heart of the housekeeper, she cannot maintain her equilibrium. The men come home at night and hear the story of these annoyances, and say, "Oh, these home troubles are very little things!" They are small, small as wasps, but they sting. Martha's nerves were all unstrung when she rushed in, asking Christ to scold Mary, and there are tens of thousands of women who are dying, stung to death by these pestiferous domestic annoyances. "The Lord sent the hornet."

These small insect disturbances may also come in the shape of Business Irritations.

There are men here who went through 1857 and the 24th of September, 1869, without losing their balance, who are every day unhorsed by little annoyances—a clerk's ill manners, or a blot of ink on a bill of lading, or the extravagance of a partner who overdraws his account, or the underselling by a business rival, or the whispering of store-confidences in the street, or the making of some little bad debt which was against your judgment, just to please somebody else.

It is not the panics that kill the merchants. Panics come only once in ten or twenty years. It is the constant din of these every-day annoyances which is sending so many of our best merchants into nervous dyspepsia and paralysis and the grave. When our national commerce fell flat on its face, these men stood up and felt almost defiant ; but their life is going away now under the swarm of these pestiferous annoyances. "The Lord sent the hornet."

I have noticed in the history of some of my congregation that their

and that they have a hundred where they used to have ten. The naturalist tells us that a wasp sometimes has a family of twenty thousand wasps, and it does seem as if every annoyance of your life brooded a million. By the help of God to-day, I want to show you the other side. The hornet is of no use? Oh, yes! The naturalists tell us they are very important in the world's economy ; they kill spiders, and they clear the atmosphere ; and I really believe God sends the annoyances of our life upon us to kill the spiders of the soul, and to clear the atmosphere of our skies.

Uses of the Hornet.

These annoyances are sent on us, I think, to wake us up from our lethargy. There is nothing that makes a man so lively as a nest of "yellow jackets," and I think that these annoyances are intended to persuade us of the fact that this is not a world for us to stop in. If we had a bed of everything that was attractive and soft and easy, what would we want of heaven? We think that the hollow tree sends the hornet, or we may think that the devil sends the hornet. I want to correct your opinion. "The Lord sent the hornet."

Then I think these annoyances come on us to Culture Our Patience.

In the gymnasium, you find upright parallel bars—upright bars, with holes over each other for pegs to be put in. Then the gymnast takes a peg in each hand and he begins to climb, one inch at a time, or two inches, and getting his strength cultured, reaches after a while the ceiling. And it seems to me that these annoyances in life are a moral gymnasium, each worriment a peg with which we are to climb higher and higher in Christian attainment. We all love to see patience, but it cannot be cultured in fair weather. Patience is a child of the storm. If you had everything desirable, and there was nothing more to get, what would you want with patience? The only time to culture it is when you are lied about, and sick and half dead.

"Oh," you say, "if I only had the circumstances of some well-to-do man I would be patient, too." You might as well say, "If it were not for this water I would swim;" or, "I could shoot this gun if it were not for the caps." When you stand chin-deep in annoyances is the time for you to swim out toward the great headlands of Christian attainment, so as to "know Christ and the power of His resurrection, and to have fellowship with His sufferings."

Nothing but the furnace will ever burn out of us the clinker and the slag. I have formed this theory in regard to small annoyances and vexations. It takes just so much trouble to fit us for usefulness and for heaven. The only question is, whether we shall take it in the bulk or pulverized and granulated. Here is one man who takes it in the bulk. His back is broken, or his eyesight put out, or some other awful calamity befalls him; while the vast majority of people take the thing piecemeal. Which way would you rather have it? Of course in piecemeal. Better have five aching teeth than one broken jaw; better ten fly-blisters than an amputation; better twenty squalls than one cyclone. There may be a difference of opinion as to allopathy and homœopathy; but in this matter of trouble I like —small pellets of annoyance rather than some knock-down dose of calamity. Instead of the thunderbolt give us the hornet. If you have a bank, you would a great deal rather that fifty men would come in with cheques less than a hundred dollars than to have two depositors come in the same day, each wanting his ten thousand dollars. In this latter case you cough and look down to the floor, and you look up at the ceiling, before you look into the safe. Now, my friends, would you not rather have these small drafts of annoyance on your bank of faith than some all-staggering demand upon your endurance? But remember that little as well as great annoyances equally require you to trust in Christ for succor, and for deliverance from impatience and irritability. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."

Homœopathic Doses

In the Village of Hamelin, tradition says, there was an invasion of rats, and these small creatures almost devoured the town, and threatened the lives of the population; and the story is that a piper came out one day and played a very sweet tune, and all the vermin followed him—followed him to the banks of the Weser, and then he blew a blast and they dropped in and disappeared forever. Of course this is a fable; but I wish I could, on the sweet flute of the Gospel, draw forth all the nibbling and burrowing annoyances of your life, and play them down into the depths forever.

How many touches did Mr. Church give to his picture of "Cotopaxi," or his "Heart of the Andes?" I suppose about fifty thousand touches. I hear the canvas saying, "Why do you keep me trembling with that pencil so long? Why don't you put it on in one dash?" "No," says Mr. Church, 'I know how to make a painting; it will take fifty thousand of these touches." And I want you, my friends, to understand that it is these ten thousand annoyances which, under God, are making up to be hung at last in the galleries of heaven, fit for angels to look at. God knows how to make a picture.

I go into a sculptor's studio, and see him shaping a statue. He has a chisel in one hand and a mallet in the other, and he gives a very gentle stroke—click, click, click! I say, "Why don't you strike harder?" "Oh!" he replies, "that would shatter the statue. I can't do it that way; I must do it this way." So he works on, and after awhile the features come out, and everybody that enters the studio is charmed and fascinated. Well, God has your soul under process of development, and it is the little annoyances and vexations of life that are chiselling out your immortal nature. It is click, click, click! I wonder why some great providence does not come, and with one stroke prepare you for heaven. Ah, no; God says that is not the way. And so He keeps on by strokes of little vexations, until at last you shall be a glad spectacle for angels and for men.

You know that a large fortune may be

and a vast amount of moral character may go away in small depletion. It is the little troubles of life that are having more effect upon you than great ones. A swarm of locusts will kill a grainfield sooner than the incursion of three or four cattle. You say, "Since I lost my child, since I lost my property, I have been a different man." But you do not recognize the architecture of little annoyances, that are hewing, digging, cutting, shaping, splitting, and interjoining your moral qualities. Rats may sink a ship. One lucifer match may send destruction through a block of store-houses. Catherine de Medicis got her death from smelling a poisonous rose. Columbus, by stopping and asking for a piece of bread and a drink of water at a Franciscan convent, was led to the discovery of a new world. And there is an intimate connection between trifles and immensities, between nothings and everythings.

Now, be careful to let none of those annoyances go through your soul unarraigned. Compel them to administer to your spiritual wealth. The scratch of a sixpenny-nail sometimes produces lock-jaw, and the clip of a most infinitesimal annoyance may damage you forever. Do not let any annoyance or perplexity come across your soul without its making you better.

Our National Government does not think it belittling to put a tax on pins, and a tax on buckles, and a tax on shoes. The individual taxes do not amount to much, but in the aggregate to millions and millions of dollars. And I would have you, oh Christian man, put a high and vexation that comes through your soul. This might not amount to much, in single cases, but in the aggregate it would be a great revenue of spiritual strength and satisfaction. A bee can suck honey even out of a nettle; and if you have the grace of God in your heart, you can get sweetness out of that which would otherwise irritate and annoy.

A returned missionary told me that a company of adventurers rowing up the Ganges were stung to death by flies that infest that region at certain seasons. I have seen the earth strewed with the carcases of men slain by insect annoyances. The only way to get prepared for the great troubles of life is to conquer these small troubles. What would you say of a soldier who refused to load his gun, or to go into the conflict because it was only a skirmish, saying, "I am not going to expend my ammunition on a skirmish; wait until there comes a general engagement, and then you will see how courageous I am, and what battling I will do?" The general would say to such a man, "If you are not faithful in a skirmish, you would be nothing in a general engagement." And I have to tell you, oh Christian men, if you cannot apply the principles of Christ's religion on a small scale, you will never be able to apply them on a large scale.

If I Had My Way

with you I would have you possess all possible worldly prosperity. I would have you each one a garden—a river flowing through it, geraniums and shrubs on the sides, and the grass and flowers as beautiful as though the rainbow had fallen. I would have you a house, a splendid mansion, and the bed should be covered with upholstery dipped in the setting sun. I would have every hall in your house set with statues and statuettes, and then I would have the four quarters of the globe pour in all their luxuries on your table, and you should have forks of silver and knives of gold, inlaid with diamonds and amethysts. Then you should each one of you have the finest horses, and your pick of the equipages of the world. Then I would have you live a hundred and fifty years, and you should not have a pain or ache until the last breath.

Life a Vestibule.

"Not each one of us?" you say. Yes; each one of you. "Not to your enemies?" Yes; the only difference I would make with them would be that I would put a little extra gilt on their walls, and a little extra embroidery on their slippers. But, you say, "Why does not God give us all these things?" Ah! I bethink myself. He is wiser. It would make fools and sluggards of us if we had our way. No man puts his best picture in the portico or vestibule of his house. God meant this world to be only the vestibule of heaven, that great gallery of the universe toward which we are aspiring. We must not have it too good in this world, or we would want no heaven.

Polycarp was condemned to be burned to death. The stake was planted. He was fastened to it. The faggots were placed around him, the fires kindled, but history tells us that the flames bent outward like the canvas of a ship in a stout breeze, so that the flames, instead of destroying Polycarp, were only a wall between him and his enemies. They had actually to destroy him with the poniard; the flames would not touch him. Well, my hearer, I want you to understand that by God's grace the flames of trial, instead of consuming your soul, are only going to be a wall of defence, and a canopy of blessing. God is going to fulfil to you the blessing and the promise, as He did to Polycarp. "When thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned." Now you do not understand; you shall know hereafter. In heaven you will bless God even for the hornet.

A BISHOP ON A BURNING SHIP.

Bishop Hannington once took his yacht up the Rhine, and had some exciting adventures on the waters of that treacherous river. Once the ship caught fire. He wrote: "We had proceeded two miles past Bommel when the steward came to me, and called me aside most mysteriously. He thought he had better inform me quite privately that smoke was pouring up through the ship's floor. I darted down below, and found, as he said, the cabin full of smoke. There was no doubt that the ship was on fire. 'Send quickly for the carpenter, and don't tell the others for a few minutes. Now, carpenter, keep your head cool; the vessel is on fire! Tear up this floor at once!' Then running on deck to the pilot, 'Bring up as quickly as possible. Engineer, draw fires, and be ready, if I want you, for a stiffish piece of work.' We could find no fire under the cabin, but everywhere smoke. Then we went to the coal bunk, and directly it was opened the smoke rolled out in volumes. My heart sank. The coals on fire! Nothing could save her from utter destruction! We turned the coals over, but found no fire, although the smoke kept rolling out. Next it began to burst out behind the donkey engine. Dreadful suspense! Be calm! With much difficulty we tore up the engine-room floor, and then saw the keel in a blaze. Bad as this was, it was a relief to have found the enemy. I shouted to the men, who had gathered anxiously round, to stand to the buckets, and, stripping off coat and waistcoat, I took one myself; and then turning on all the taps, we speedily filled her with water to the floor, and thus extinguished the flame. It was an anxious time, however. The fire appeared to be in close proximity to the coals, of which we had a large supply. Had they been ignited, our chance of escape would have been small. It resulted from the ash-pan almost, if not quite, resting upon the wooden keel. The iron had become red hot, and kindled the wood."

THREW AWAY HER CRUTCHES.

The N. Y. Times of Feb. 17th says: "A remarkable faith cure is reported from Banksville, a mining town two miles south-west of Pittsburgh. For several years Maggie Beadling, the sixteen-year-old daughter of a coal miner, has been bedridden. Frequently of late she had laid in a trance, or comatose state, for days, and when she would return to consciousness she would tell her friends that she had been to heaven. In proof of the story of her transition she told the names and described the appearance of relatives who had died before she was born, and of others whom she knew when they were alive. In October and November, 1886, she lay in a comatose state for several weeks, during which time she partook only of a small quantity of liquid food administered to her by her attendants. When she revived she claimed to have received divine communication to the effect that at two P.M. on February 17th she would be raised from an invalid's bed and entirely restored to health. This afternoon her father's house was filled with friends and curiosity seekers. Promptly at two o'clock the young girl arose from her chair with her crutches in her hands and, flinging them aside, walked about the room to the overwhelming astonishment of those present. The cure seemed complete, and she jumped about the room like a child. The news was noised about, and almost the entire population of Banksville turned out to see the wonderful case. Her parents wept for joy, and the greatest excitement prevailed. Miss Beadling was seen by several reporters, and she pronounced herself well. It is the belief among the neighbors that the young lady was sincere in her claim of affliction, and her recovery is regarded as a miracle.

A RUINOUS PRIZE.

The possessor of half a million dollars was received into the Forrest Home, a benevolent institution, in Pennsylvania, last week. Some years ago he was in prosperous circumstances, and had saved a considerable sum of money. In 1873 he was induced to invest a hundred dollars in the Havana Lottery. To his intense delight, his ticket drew the first prize of half a million dollars. Then demoralization set in. He bought race-horses, invested in a stud farm in Kentucky, and allowed himself to be swindled by false friends, who fastened upon him after he became rich. In six years after receiving his half million the money was nearly all gone. Since that time the remainder has disappeared in the attempts which he made to retrieve his position, and now, penniless in his old age, he has applied for and received admission to the home established for destitute members of his profession. All his friends believe that if he had not drawn the prize he would now be a wealthy man. This is only one of many instances of human misjudgment about the events of life. The event which was welcomed as a blessing was really a calamity. Christian men may derive consolation from the fact that in their experience the converse will prove true. Their calamities are blessings in disguise (Rom. 8 : 28).

A RELUCTANT HOST AND HIS NIECES.

An incident related by General Walker in his History of the Second Army Corps is a type of the attitude of many persons who refuse to admit to their hearts the Divine Guest who says, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock" (Rev. 3 : 20).

The night of reaching Upperville was cold and gloomy. General Couch had an inveterate repugnance to making his headquarters in a house, greatly preferring the benignant shelter of a Virginia rail-fence. But on this occasion, there being great probability of frequent dispatches to be received and sent, he gave Captain Morgan, his chief of artillery, permission to select a house for headquarters. Delighted at this concession to the bodily infirmities of his staff, Morgan galloped gaily into the yard of a spacious mansion on the outskirts of the town. Here was an old man, evidently the proprietor, somewhat shaken by the artillery fire and the galloping and pistol shots of the cavalry. "Good-evening," said Morgan. "Good-evening," responded the old man. "General Couch proposes to make his headquarters at your house to-night—that is, if you have no objection." Now, the old gentleman had a great many objections, but as he did not dare to express them, he straightway began with one accord to make excuse. Of course he would be delighted to have the General with him, but he was afraid he could not make him comfortable. Perhaps the General had better go where he could be better accommodated. "But," quoth Morgan, argumentatively, "you have a large house." This could not be denied, as any one could see it at a glance, so the luckless proprietor had to admit that the house was large. "But," he added, eagerly, "I have a large family." "Well, now," asked Morgan, "what family have you got?" "In the first place," said the old gentleman, "I have three nieces." "Say not another word; we'll take the house." And we did take the house, and three saucier little rebels we did not find in the South.

THREE SISTERS ATTACKED BY TRICHINÆ.

A despatch from Syracuse, N. Y., to the New York Star describes the misery and desolation that have come into a family residing near that city, from a very simple cause. It states that about two months ago three young ladies, the daughters of a farmer, ate some raw ham which had been raised and cured on the place. In three days all were taken violently ill with what proved to be trichinæ from the pork.

For days the patients lay half unconscious. The oldest sister vomited small pieces of the tissues of her stomach invested with trichinæ. Two weeks ago the parasites began to appear upon the surface of the lower part of her body, and on her left side the flesh, infested by myriads of trichinæ, sloughed off, exposing the internal organs. The parasites were rapidly increasing when death came to her relief. On the following day the second sister died, and the third cannot long survive.

This sad incident reminds us of the case reported in the English papers, last year, of a wedding party, at Carlisle, being poisoned by eating a ham which caused the death of the bride. It is very certain that if eating ham was invariably, or even frequently, followed by such horrible results people everywhere would soon abstain from it altogether. They do not show like prudence, however, in moral and spiritual affairs. Though warned that sin inevitably leads to corruption and death, and though examples proving the fact are abundant, each generation persists in the suicidal course (Prov. 5 : 11).

A SIGNIFICANT GIFT.

A gift from John Brown to the earthquake sufferers at Charleston, S. C., is an event of much significance. It appears that some time ago Mayor Henry E. Young received a letter, enclosing five dollars from the son of John Brown, of Harper's Ferry fame, for the relief fund. The letter and Mayor Young's reply were given to the press last week. John Brown, who lives on Put-in-Bay Island, Lake Erie, Ohio, said in the course of his letter: "In the month of September last, soon after the calamity which befell your city, I formed the acquaintance at this place of Mr. R. T. Miller, of Cincinnati, who not only spoke with feeling in regard to the loss and sufferings endured by your people, but, on the other hand, in reply to my inquiries, gave me a cheering account of the general industrial prosperity of the South. At parting I said to him that if I believed a small token of sympathy from one of the family of John Brown, of Harper's Ferry, to the distressed people of Charleston would be accepted, I would forward the money as soon as I could earn it. Mr. Miller expressed confidence that such contribution would not be rejected. Enclosed is five dollars in post-office money order. Please acccept and bestow as in your judgment shall appear best this slight token of the kind feeling which I know possessed the heart of John Brown and of each of his family toward the people of the South. It was only toward her slavery that he or any of his kindred cherished 'a sacred animosity.'" Major Young promptly turned over the subscription to the Confederate Home, and wrote as follows: "I am somewhat at a loss how to answer. The answer might be so 'many sided,' still, however many sided, the great cardinal point would be, the recognition of the importance of the part that a son of 'John Brown, of Harper's Ferry'—bearing his name—should send to the sufferers of Charleston, as 'a token of sympathy,' that which he had to earn in order to send."

A MOTHER'S PREMONITION.

A providential escape of a very remarkable character is reported in connection with the distressing loss of the ship Kapunda, which was sunk by a collision with another ship, the Ada Melmore, off the coast of Brazil on January 20th. Two hundred and ninety-eight persons on board perished. In Wednesbury, England, lived a mother and her daughter, named Louisa Benn. It appears that this daughter, greatly against the wish of her mother and her friends, had resolved upon going out to Australia, and with this purpose in view she joined the Kapunda at Plymouth. To her mother her resolution had brought nothing but pain and anxiety, and even after her daughter had left she could not free her mind from the most distressing forebodings that the voyage would be attended with disaster. There rose before her mind perpetually a huge rock in mid ocean, and in imagination she saw the Kapunda steering straight for it, strike against it, and sink. So strongly was she impressed by these forebodings that her reason threatened to give way. It is stated that a few hours before the Kapunda sailed she fancied she heard Louisa crying, "O mother!" Nothing would content her but to telegraph for the girl's return. She was already on board when the telegram reached her, but was advised by the doctor to pay no heed to it. Another officer, however, gave her better advice, on which she acted. Leaving her luggage in the ship, she made her way home. Until news of the calamity which overtook the vessel, she much regretted that she had not proceeded on her voyage.

A SUFFERER OF THIRTEEN YEARS RECOVERS.

A testimony sent to us from Baltimore, Md., is a remarkable evidence of the power and readiness of the Lord to heal those who go to Him in faith. Our correspondent says that a short time ago Miss Minnie Addicks, of 281 Canton Avenue, was visited by his sister Perry, of Washington, D. C., and Mr. Raymond of the Faith Home, 337 Myrtle Avenue, Baltimore. She was suffering from a cancer and from other maladies, which had kept her confined to her bed for thirteen years. Neither trouble nor expense was spared for her relief. Eminent physicians have been consulted about her case, and no less than thirteen have at one time or another essayed to effect a cure. Morphia alone gave her power to bear her agony, and of that seductive drug she has been taking regularly fifteen grains a day. Latterly she has had long fits of complete unconsciousness, during which more than once she was thought to be dead.

The two believers united in prayer by the sufferer's bedside. As they prayed a strange change took place. Miss Addicks describes it as a thrilling sensation of warmth and life passing through her veins. It was as if power and vitality were imparted. After prayer they took her by the hand, and in the name of Christ bade her arise. Though she had not been able to move a muscle for several days she rose from her bed, and, unassisted walked across the room. During that day she tried her strength with new and evident delight many times, and the next morning she rose declaring herself completely well. Many friends who knew her in her former helpless condition have been to the Faith Home to see her, being unable to credit the wonder without ocular proof.

THE END OF THIS AGE ABOUT A.D. 1,900,

Or within a Year or so of it, as Shown by the 6,000 Years and the Year-day Fulfilment of the Prophetic Dates of 2,520, 2,300, 1,335, 1,290, 1,260, 396, and 360 Years.

By the Rev. M. Baxter.

V. and VI. The 1,335 and 1,290 Years

(Dan. 12 : 11, 12), are, both of them, generally considered to begin simultaneously with the 1,260 years. The date of the commencement of these three periods has been reckoned by many writers, such as Dr. Croly, Dr. Cumming, Cunninghame, Bickersteth, etc., to be when the Roman Emperor Justinian promulgated his famous Code of Laws, in which he gave greatly increased power to the Pope over all the clergy and churches in the Roman Empire—establishing, in fact, the Papacy's temporal power. Now, Justinian's Code of Laws was progressively published during his reign from A.D. 527 to 565; and it is most remarkable that at the distance of 1,260 years from that epoch there occurred the extraordinary French revolutionary epoch from 1789 to 1825.

Hence the 1,335 years, commencing in A.D. 565, as the completion of Justinian's Code, which established the temporal power of the Pope, terminate, in A.D. 1900, as the time of millennial blessedness of which it is said, "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the 1,335 days, but go thou (Daniel) thy way till the end be; for thou shall rest and stand in thy lot at the end of the days"—i.e., these 1,335 days (Daniel 12 : 12, 13)—plainly implying that Daniel and all the saints will stand in their respective lots after the resurrection at the end of the 1,335 days (both year-day, and literal-day). Then will be adjudicated to them their inheritances.

Justinian's Code of Laws has been maintained to be the starting-point of the 1,260, 1,290, and 1,335 years by more than SIXTY EXPOSITORS,* and further investigation of prophetic treatises would no doubt add to this list.

And the 1,290 years, reckoned from A.D. 565, terminate in A.D. 1855–6, the epoch of the Sultan's Treaty of Peace after the Crimean War, in which he decreed religious equality in Turkey. The Sixth Vial during the subsequent 40 years until 1895–6 dries up the mystical Euphrates or Turkish Empire and Mohammedan power, preparing the way for the return of the Jews to Palestine. And during the sixth vial the three unclean spirits of Anti Christian Infidelity, Democratic Revolutionism, and Romanist and Mohammedan fanaticism, go forth with renewed power throughout all the nations, to gather them to the war of Armageddon. (See Rev. 16 : 12-16.)

The passage in Daniel 12 : 11–12 mentioning these 1,290 and 1,335 years reads thus: "And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five-and-thirty days." Now, undoubtedly, the principal ultimate fulfilment of these two periods is at the very close of this Dispensation, as 1,290, and 1,335 literal days,† commencing with the taking away of the renewed Jewish sacrifices and the setting up of the abomination of desolation (the Napoleonic Antichrist's image) in the rebuilt Temple at Jerusalem for 1,290 literal days; but in the typical year-day fulfilment of these periods, as 1,290 and 1,335 years, they commence with the public and national establishment of the Pope's temporal authority, the setting up the Papal abomination of desolation throughout Christendom, and the taking away of pure Evangelical worship.

VII.—The 1,260 Years is mentioned twice in Daniel and five times in the Book of Revelation, as 1,260 days, 42 months, or 3½ times (i.e., 3½ years) (Dan. 7 : 25; 12 : 7; Rev. 11 : 2, 3; 12 : 6, 14; 13 : 5).

In its year-day fulfilment as 1,260 years, it measures the principal exercise of the persecuting power of the Papal Antichrist in the West, and of the Mohammedan Antichrist in the East, both of which thus typify and prefigure the final Personal Infidel Antichrist, whose persecution is principally to be exercised during the final 1,260 days. And similarly the seven seals, trumpets, and vials—and, in fact, the main part of Revelation 5 to 16 have a double fulfilment—first, by way of rehearsal during nearly 1,900 years throughout this Dispensation in connection with the Papal and Mohammedan 1,260 years; secondly, more literally during nearly 1,900 days at the closing crisis of this dispensation in connection with the 1,260 literal days of the Personal Infidel Antichrist. This view of the double fulfilment, both year-day and literal day, of a large part of Daniel and Revelation, is increasingly held by the best Biblical and prophetic expositors.

In Daniel the 1,260 years is only called 3½ times (7 : 25; 12 : 7), and is given solely as the term of the Popish Antichrist's persecuting power, and not of the Mohammedan Antichrist. It commenced at the promulgation of Justinian's Code of Law throughout his reign, from A.D. 527 to 565, a system of universal jurisprudence, which, among many other provisions, gave the Pope temporal power over all the churches in Cæsar's Roman Empire; and it ended between 1789 and 1825, the epoch of the great French and European revolutions during which Napoleon's new Universal Code of Laws was promulgated, superseding Justinian's, and becoming adopted by half Europe, thus marking the introduction of a new era. The revolutionary epoch did not end at Napoleon Bonaparte's Death in 1821.

But in 1821 all Greece rebelled against Turkey, and, after years of sanguinary strife, Greece's independence was guaranteed by a protocol of the European Powers in 1826. Moreover, between 1821 and 1823, there were revolutions in Italy and Spain; and in 1823 France invaded Spain and replaced the King on his throne.

In France the Roman Catholic religion was abolished by national decree in 1793; but in 1802 the fall of the Papacy was stayed for a time, and it was restored to a portion of its former power by Napoleon's Concordat with the Pope for re-nationalizing the Catholic religion in France, which is thus described in Sir Walter Scott's "History of Bonaparte:"

> "When the ratifications of this Concordat or treaty were published, it was singular to behold how submissively the once proud See of Rome lay prostrated before the power of Bonaparte, and how absolutely he must have have dictated all the terms of the treaty. Every article in it innovated on some of those rights and claims which the Church of Rome had for ages asserted. By this compact Pius VII. surrendered to Bonaparte—a soldier whose name was five or six years before unheard of—those claims to supremacy which his predecessors had maintained for so many ages against the whole of the potentates of Europe. A Puritan might now have said of the Power seated on the Seven Hills, 'Babylon is fallen—it is fallen that great city.' The more rigid Catholics were of the same opinion. This Concordat, they alleged, showed the debasement of the Roman hierarchy. It was inaugurated at Notre Dame (April, 1802), with the utmost magnificence. Bonaparte took care to make his full advantage of the Concordat by introducing his own name as much as possible into the catechism of the Church. To honor Napoleon, the catechism taught, was the same as to honor and serve God Himself; to oppose his will was to incur the penalty of eternal damnation."

In the year 1809, however, Napoleon Bonaparte, being displeased with the Pope, arrested him in Rome as a prisoner, and had him conveyed to France, where he died. From this profound humiliation the Papacy recovered to some extent after Napoleon's defeat in 1815.

There is an interval of 75 years—the excess of the 1,335 years beyond the 1,260 years—from this first shock and blow to the Papacy at the revolutionary epoch of 1789 to 1825, until its final death-blow at the consummating epoch between A.D. 1866 and 1900; the recovery of the Pope's temporal power after the shock of the French Revolution had subsided by 1825, is only a reprieve precursory to its utter and irrevocable overthrow at the distance of 75 years from that premonitory abasement.

* The list of these sixty expositors and titles of their books will be give in one of the issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published next month (April).

† Even year-day expositors admit this. Elliott, in his "Horæ," says: "We may conclude unhesitatingly that all these three periods (1,335, 1,290, and 1,260) are to be measured from one and the same commencing epoch—viz., that stated in Daniel 12 : 2, about the daily sacrifice and abomination of desolation, whether they are to be reckoned as years, on the year-day principle, or simply and literally as days. In perfect accordance with the principles laid down by me in regard to the year-day interpretation, these three periods may be periods of literal days, to be measured from either the Turkman's or the Papal Antichrist's setting up of the abomination of his apostasy in his last desolating invasion of the holy mountain district of Judah." Elliott also says "Jerome, like the mass of modern interpreters, makes both the 30 and the 45 days an addition to the 1,260."

TAKING THE BEARINGS.

From a Sermon by Rev. Sam Jones.

(Specially reported for this Journal.)

WHEN a ship steers across the Atlantic Ocean, it must not only know where it's coming from—New York and wants to get to Liverpool—but it must keep its bearings every moment It must know where it is. Where am I from? Where am I going? Where am I? When a ship loses its bearings, no matter where it comes from, or where it wants to go, it don't help it. If you have lost your bearings you will get left, in my candid judgment. We may get helped to find our bearings this morning.

Josh's Family.

Now, brethren, I know a sense of unworthiness sometimes dislodges us from everything. I feel that way, and I get down on my knees before I go to work, and say, "O Lord God! Let not my unworthiness keep back Thy blessing from me," and I have been bowed down by that sense of unworthiness until I have felt like just giving up the fight. But, brethren, this sense of unworthiness is a mighty good sign. I have found that out. When we have that sense of unworthiness, we ought to be like a colored man down in Hancock County, Georgia, who before the war used to belong to one of the Stephens' families. He was a sort of no-account darkey, but he was powerful big in his ways. "Josh, what makes you put on airs in the way you do?" somebody asked him one day. "Well, I just tell you, boss," Josh replied, "I don't count for much myself, but I belong to the biggest family 'round here." And, brethren, when we get that sense of unworthiness heavily upon us, let's remember that though we mayn't amount to much ourselves, we belong to a powerful big family.

A Creditor's Suggestion.

You say you can't pray, and you think it's because you're timid. It's because you're mean. A good fellow who is living right before the public, he'll pray in public. A fellow who ain't living right in the eyes of men ain't going to pray in public. An old fellow was praying once in meeting, and he said, "O Lord, give us soul-saving religion, give us heart-cleansing religion," and one of his creditors who was there said, "And debt-paying" religion, and the old brother said "Amen" right at that point, and closed his prayer. A man who won't pray in public, if he'll hunt round he'll find it's something wrong in himself and not in God or His surroundings.

Hiring a Man to Pray.

Another says, "I can't pray in my family; I haven't the courage." A big-whiskered man timid! Brethren, if I didn't have courage enough to pray night and morning with my precious children and my wife, I'd go down South and hire some good old colored man, one I had confidence in as a religious man, and I'd hire him by the month to pray with my wife and children. I mean an old colored man that had more religion than sense. You have more sense than religion, and you and he would about equalize matters.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Mr. Manning Quitted the Treasury Department on March 9th. Although his resignation does not take effect until April 1st, he was unable to remain longer in Washington. In accordance with his expressed wish there was no formal leave-taking, but the officials who knew of his contemplated departure called on him and bade him "Good-by." He was presented with a handsome floral design by the messengers attached to his office, who also sent a letter expressing their appreciation of his kind and considerate treatment. Mr. Manning will spend a few weeks in Europe before entering on his new sphere in New York. Acting Secretary Fairchild is most likely to be his successor.

The Redemption of the Trade Dollars Commenced in New York on March 7th. The coins were presented in larger numbers than the Assistant-Treasurer and his staff could handle. One hundred thousand, however, were accepted, and exchanged for standard dollars or subsidiary silver coins at the option of the holders. The Treasury has asked holders to notify them of the amount that will be presented, the notification to be regarded as a presentation within the meaning of the law. Notifications to the amount of three and a half millions were promptly forwarded. The coins are not redeemed if they are mutilated or defaced but the Treasury will buy them as bullion.

The Propriety of Calling an Extra Session of Congress is being urged upon the President. The chief reason for it is the failure of the Deficiency bill, which has caused inconvenience in several departments. The Signal Service, especially, is embarrassed by an empty treasury. Over twenty-two thousand dollars of the amount appropriated by the Deficiency bill would have gone to this department. According to the statement of the chief signal officer it is now impossible to move a man; even to discharge or re-enlist him, or to replace those who are dead or dangerously ill. The term of service of a number of men has expired, but they must be retained in the corps from lack of money to send them to their homes. The most serious consequence of the failure of the bill, perhaps, will be the discontinuance of the storm warnings—cold waves, etc.—at a number of important points, owing to the failure of the item appropriating eighteen thousand dollars for telegraphing and reporting these warnings. So nearly exhausted is the sum now available for this purpose that a large reduction must be made in the service at a very early day. The post-office will not suffer much, except in the delay in introducing the free-delivery system. There are other reasons, too, for an extra session. Prominent among them is the fact that there is no time to be lost in dealing with the tariff, the surplus labor arbitration, and other important matters which the Forty-ninth Congress left unsettled, and which if not settled before the election of 1888, may lead the people to the conclusion that the Democratic Party is neither so efficient nor so industrious as to deserve a renewal of power.

The Force of the New Anti-Polygamy Legislation appears to be realized in Utah. A prominent lawyer, who has been acting as counsel in Washington for the Mormons, declares that the recently enacted law has "widened the breach between the Mormons and the country," so that it may not be possible to bridge it over, and suggests that another course should have been pursued. The Mormons of Utah should have been allowed, he thinks, to take the whole matter into their own hands, to form a State constitution, and to decide for themselves whether polygamy should be prohibited in it or not. The lawyer truthfully reflects public opinion in Utah. His mistake is that which the Mormons have been making all along. They refuse to comprehend that polygamy is a crime, and that the Government and people of the United States are determined to have crime punished, and will not give to criminals the power to legalize it.

The Death of Captain James B. Eads, the eminent civil engineer, took place on Thursday last at Nassau, N. P., where he had gone for his health. While there he was seized with pneumonia, which, added to his other complications, proved fatal. He was sixty-seven years of age, having been born at Lawrenceburg, Ind., in 1820. He was the designer and constructor of the gun and mortar boats which formed so powerful an agency in the success of the North in the war. On one occasion he took a contract to build seven ironclad gunboats in sixty-five days, and fulfilled it. Since the war his most important work has been the Mississippi jetties, which he believed would force the river to deepen its channel. The greatest work projected by Captain Eads, however, he has died without seeing begun. It is the ship railway which he proposed to construct across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec for the transportation of large ships, fully laden, from ocean to ocean.

The Closing of the Dives of New York Deserves the attention of other cities. For many years it has been the melancholy conviction of good men that the haunts of dissolute persons could not be closed. Occasionally, one more daring offender than the others was arrested, but some judge would admit him to bail or sentence him to pay a small fine, and no more was heard of the case. The police, who were not paid for protecting the places, grew tired of arresting the violators of the law, when it was seen that political influence secured practical immunity for offenders. Recently, however, different tactics have been pursued with remarkable success. Instead of summoning the dive-keepers before police justices, an injunction has been procured from a judge, to ignore which involved punishment for contempt of court. The result has been that the most notorious resorts are closed, and the keeper in one case has gone to Canada to avoid imprisonment. The work is going steadily forward with the approval of the best portion of the community.

The Existing Condition of Ireland was Described with much force by Sir Redvers Buller in his evidence before the Land Commission which was published last week. Buller is a general who distinguished himself in the Soudan, and who has recently been on service in the disturbed districts of Ireland, where he was sent by the Conservative Government. Owing to a garbled report having been issued, designedly or inadvertently, there is a dispute as to what General Buller did say, but he certainly stated that in Counties Kerry, Clare, and Cork an organized stand was being made against the payment of existing rents, but that rents were generally fairly well paid. A majority of the tenants, he also said, were anxious to pay, but wanted a reasonable allowance, while a great many others, who did not require any allowance, would pay if they dared. General Buller feared intimidation was rampant in the country. The people were in sympathy with the National League, because they thought it was their salvation. The bulk of the tenants had told him that the reducing of rents and the staying of evictions were directly due to the operations of the League. They believed that nobody did anything for the tenants until the League was established. He said it was no longer possible to enforce legal obligations in that part of the country. It was suggested to him that his evidence showed that the law was not all for the rich, and he replied, "The law? There isn't much law there. A short time ago what law there was was really on the side of the rich." The appointment of Balfour to be Chief Secretary has produced a general impression that the Conservatives intend to propose coercion. Mr. Gladstone has promised to oppose it.

Another Earthquake in the Riviera was Reported on Friday last. It was felt but slightly at Cannes, but at other places it was so violent as to produce a panic. At Monte Carlo the gaming-tables shook perceptibly, and the gamblers fled in dismay. At Mentone the shock was the most violent felt since that of the 23d of February. The walls of many houses were again cracked, and mirrors, glassware, etc., were smashed. Visitors hurried away and residents camped in the open air. At Marseilles the hotels and the Bourse were emptied of their occupants in a very few seconds. The people were, however, soon reassured. It is found that many walls of buildings in various parts of the city were cracked. The most severe effects were felt at Alassio. The Commander pronounced the town unsafe and ordered that eight extra barracks be erected for the accommodation of the inhabitants. At another village fifteen houses were demolished and two persons were killed.

The European News Cabled to this Country last week was more peaceful in its tone than for many weeks past. The press correspondents say that there is a general conviction that peace will be maintained this year. It is an ominous fact, however, that not one government has taken any step toward the reduction of its military establishment, that the Reichstag has voted to add forty-one thousand men to the German army, and that Krupp, the great gun-maker, finds it necessary to enlarge his foundry in order to execute the commissions which are pouring in for guns of the latest type. One astute observer, who confirms the reports of the other writers respecting the subsidence of war rumors, says that the present calm is, in his opinion, more suggestive of a coming storm than were the threatenings of a few weeks ago. He predicts that a bolt out of a clear sky will startle the world in a short time. Whether or not his prediction is fulfilled, it is evident that Europe will not be assured of peace while the nations are groaning under the burden of armies on a war footing.

Bismarck's Septennate Bill Passed the Reichstag last Friday. The crucial vote was on an amendment making the term of the bill three instead of seven years. It was rejected by a vote of 222 to 23. Eighty-eight members abstained from voting, and the Polish and Alsatian members were not present at the debate. After the defeat of the amendment, the first clause of the bill was passed by a vote of 223 to 48, the minority including new German liberals, Socialists and Alsatians. The paragraph fixes the peace effective force from April 1st, 1887, to March 31st, 1894, at 468,409 men, exclusive of one-year volunteers. The correspondent of the New York Herald says, "Prince Bismarck's victory was so complete as almost to brand him as a 'politician.' His majority is absolute. The opposition seems to be so gone to pieces that, for a time, at least, he will be able to govern through Parliament as if no Parliament existed."

The Rev. M. Baxter Delivered Three Discourses on Coming Great Events, in Baltimore, Md., on Sunday last. The services were held in a building called the Mammoth Hall, and there were good audiences. Next Sunday he expects to preach again in the same place.

The Funeral Services of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher were conducted on Friday last in four churches besides Plymouth Church. Eminent preachers of various denominations spoke in each to crowded congregations. Even the Jewish congregation of the Temple Emmanu-El sent a deputation to testify their respect for the deceased pastor. The State Legislature adjourned, the law courts suspended their sittings, the Board of Education closed all the public schools, and nearly all the stores and shops were closed. On the previous day the body lay in state in Plymouth Church, which was a mass of roses and rare flowers. The platform was covered with a bank of white roses, the galleries were festooned with them, and floral trophies were grouped around the casket. A long line of persons, extending several blocks, filed into the church to take a last look at Mr. Beecher's face, at the rate of fifty a minute, from early morning until nine o'clock at night when the doors were closed. More than fifty thousand persons passed through the building during the day. On Friday the funeral service in Plymouth Church was conducted by Dr. Charles Hall, the rector of Holy Trinity Church, Mr. Beecher's stanch friend. Afterward the scenes of Thursday were renewed, and a long procession for four hours passed the coffin in an unbroken line. At six o'clock the doors were closed, and on Saturday morning, the body, attended by only a few personal friends, was carried to Greenwood.

Mr. Beecher's Last Act in Quitting Plymouth Church on Sunday, February 27th, was touchingly narrated by his friend, Dr. Charles Hall, at the funeral services on Friday last. He said: "The evening service was over, and the congregation had retired, when the organist and one or two others were practising the hymn,

> 'I heard the voice of Jesus say,
> Come unto me and rest.'

Mr. Beecher, doubtless, with that tire that follows a pastor's Sunday work, remained and listened. Two street urchins were prompted to wander into the building, and one of them was standing, perhaps, in the position of the boy whom Raphael has immortalized, gazing up at the organ. The old man, laying his hands on the boy's head, turned his face upward and kissed him, and with his arms about the two, left the scene of his triumphs, his trials and his successes, forever. It was a fitting close to a grand life, the old man of genius and fame shielding the little wanderers, great in breasting traditional ways and prejudices, great, also, in the gesture, so like him, that recognized, as did the Master, that the humblest and the poorest were his brethren, the great preacher led out into the night by the little nameless waifs."

The Absence of Wine Glasses at Mrs. Cleveland's place was noticed at a recent State dinner at the White House. On February 17th the President gave a dinner in honor of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. Lengthy dispatches appeared in all the daily journals describing the floral decorations of the State dining-room, the corridors and parlors, and the dresses of the guests. The one feature of the report that is really important was that the popular wife of the President had the courage to set an example of total abstinence. The report says, "Glasses for nine kinds of wine were at each cover, but at the places of Mrs. and Miss Cleveland there was no wine service."

A Lawyer's Search for a Bible in Norwalk, Conn., last week, proved that the Book is not so common there as might have been supposed. He had occasion to use a Bible in administering an oath to a client, but he did not have a copy of the Scriptures in his office, and calls at the offices of several of his neighbors showed them to be equally destitute. Then he stepped into the Norwalk Library to procure the desired book, but neither he nor the librarian could find one. The librarian's eye finally lighted upon a copy of the Koran, and the notary, concluding that this would answer, took away the book and swore his client upon it. For the purpose in hand the Koran or any other book may have served, but we may hope that neither the lawyer, nor his client, nor the librarian will make the mistake of accepting any substitute for the Bible if they become anxious about salvation. In these days of abundant theological literature it is not unnecessary to remind even Christian men that there is no book that can answer the purpose of the Bible (John 5 : 39).

The Signal of Three Black Balls was Exhibited by a steamer out at sea on March 5th. The captain of the steamer Denmark saw it from his vessel while on his voyage to New York last week, but could not understand what it was intended to express. He knew, however, that it was not an appeal for assistance, so he proceeded on his voyage. Since his report was made, it has been found that the signal is one authorized by the international rules for preventing collisions at sea, and denotes that a vessel "is not under command." It is probable that it was exhibited by the steamer Caledonia from New York to Southampton, and was raised because the steering gear of the steamer was temporarily out of order, and the crew were at work repairing it. The signal would be a very common object in our streets if it had to be exhibited by men in like circumstances. Few of those who are living in sin do so voluntarily. The majority have no control over their appetites and passions, and are not wise enough to ask Christ to take command (Prov. 25 : 28).

The Capture of a Devil Hawk in Arizona is announced as a triumph by a distinguished ornithologist, who has at last succeeded, after many attempts, in adding a specimen to his collection. He says: "It is a bird of the handsomest plumage; at the same time it has a most ugly head and vicious talons; besides, its beak is almost as sharp as a needle and nearly as strong as the largest hawk. This bird, but for its head, when on the wing would pass for a pigeon. When seeking his prey he plays pigeon and flies in among them unnoticed on account of his similarity and easily captures what he wants. He is the picture of grace, beauty, and speed. Happily for the feathered family this kind are phenomenally rare, so rare that it is estimated that there are not more than a dozen of them in the Territory." It would appear that the bird is appropriately named. Satan secures his prey by similar tactics. He takes care that young people who become his victims shall see nothing at the outset of their fatal course to alarm them (II Cor. 11 : 14).

A Father's Unconscious Blunder Caused Some amusement in his home recently. A Chicago journal states that a business man living in the suburbs of that city, who has a family of eleven young children, leaves home for his business so early in the morning and returns so late at night that he sees but little of the young folks. Nevertheless, he is very fond of them, and regrets his unavoidable neglect of home duties. "One afternoon, business being very dull, he took the early train out to his home, and after a time slipped upstairs to help put the children to bed. Being missed soon, his wife went up to see what was going on. Upon opening the nursery door she exclaimed, 'Why, dear, what in the world are you doing?' 'Why, wifey,' said he, 'I am putting the children to bed, and hearing them say their prayers.' 'Yes,' said wifey, 'but this is one of our neighbor's children all undressed!' And he had to re-dress it and send it home." The mistake was less painful than would have been that of failing to recognize one of his own children, which might have been the result of his unfamiliarity with them. The children of God have explicit assurance that with Him neither mistake is possible (II Tim. 2 : 19).

A Telegram that Unmanned a Lieutenant-Governor was received by him on March 4th. A despatch from Lansing, Mich., states that while presiding in the Senate, Lieutenant-Governor McDonald was handed a telegram from a friend announcing to him that a sister from whom he had not heard, and whom he had not seen, for thirty-nine years, was alive, giving her address. The news so unmanned him that he called President, pro tem, Monroe to the chair and retired to his room. There he was seen later, and related his history. He said: "When I was only three years old my father and his family left our home in Scotland and came to Pictou, Nova Scotia. I remained there until I was about sixteen, but, becoming discontented, started out to see the world. This was in 1848. Since that time I have never seen nor heard from a member of my father's family until today. I wandered around so much, and was for so many years engaged in the hardest of labor, that I let the years slip by and finally did not care to write them. I'll go down to Boston, though, and see my sister; she is the only sister I ever had." Natural affection was not dead in the man, it seems, after all. It would be well if those who have acted toward their heavenly Father as the Lieutenant-Governor acted toward his family would, when reminded of their long neglect, be similarly prompt in going to Him for pardon and reconciliation (II Chron. 7 : 14).

An Absent-Minded Bridegroom Narrowly escaped a heavy loss in Cincinnati, O., last week. He was staying at an hotel before the marriage and, after the ceremony, he returned there to pack up his luggage preparatory to starting with his wife for their new home. Having completed his task he went to the hotel office to pay his bill, carrying a small hand-bag. After getting a receipt he hurried to his bride, leaving the bag on the floor under the cashier's window. In about fifteen minutes he returned, pale as a ghost, and gasped, "Did I leave my satchel here?" Without a word the clerk handed it to him, and with a sigh of relief he grasped and opened it. Then the eyes of the clerk opened wide with astonishment, for the bag was full of money. It contained a round $50,000. His business friends would have blamed him, and he would doubtless have blamed himself had he lost the money, but his bride would probably have been able to forgive him. She would see in his preoccupation a proof of the fervor of his devotion to herself. When love to Christ and devotion to His service leads men to be remiss in business the world censures, but we may be sure that the Master is not displeased when He sees that they make the "Almighty their treasure" (Job 22 : 25 R. V.).

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. E. P. Hammond has been conducting services for children in Mott Haven and Morrisania, N. Y. Next week he will assist in services to be held in Thirteenth Street Presbyterian Church, New York.

Rev. George C. Needham is holding special services in Norristown, Pa., every afternoon and evening. At the first service several persons rose to ask for prayers, and the number of converts has been growing. The music is conducted by Mr. Bilhorn.

Mr. William Noble has entered vigorously on his English work. A prominent daily journal devotes a large part of its space to the report of a large meeting, which he held in St. George's Hall, Bradford, Yorkshire, on February 21st.

Mr. Graham, the Secretary of the Church Temperance Society, has arranged with the Rev. H. C. Kingston, of Franklin Avenue, Brooklyn, to give a series of Temperance Lectures at the rooms of the Society in Fourth Avenue, New York. The lectures will be illustrated by stereopticon views.

Mr. Richard T. Booth, the renowned Gospel Temperance speaker, has been holding successful meetings in Honolulu. In the face of many discouragements he commenced work on January 23d, and soon won his way to the hearts of the people. A correspondent there describes his work as a marvellous success. Mr. Booth has been laboring in Australia and New Zealand, and is now on his way to visit his parents in the United States.

The Twenty-seventh International Convention of the American Young Men's Christian Associations will be held in San Francisco, Cal., May 11th to 15th 1887. All Young Men's Christian Associations, entitled under the Rules of the Convention to representation, are earnestly requested to send delegates. Reduced railroad fares are being arranged for. A MESSAGE TO THE WORST MAN ON EARTH.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner." —Luke 18 : 13.

A Holy Telegram—The Words Misused—The Spirit in the Words—I. Sinnership no Reason for Despair—The Man Came to God—Salvation Implies Hope for Sinners—Great Salvation for Great Sinners—The Prayer of a Swearing Captain—II. Despondency Confers no Claim to Mercy—A Hard Heart the Greatest of Sins—III. Right Action Resulting from Consciousness of Sin—Reading the Name of a Hatter—A Lachrymose Minister's Blunder—The Best Master of the Ceremonies—IV. Confession the Way of Peace.

It was the fault of the Pharisee that, though he went up into the temple to pray, he did not pray ; there is no prayer in all that he said. It is one excellence of the publican that he went up to the temple to pray, and he did pray ; there is nothing but prayer in all that he said. "God be merciful to me a sinner" is a pure, unadulterated prayer throughout. It was the fault of the Pharisee that when he went up to the temple to pray he forgot an essential part of prayer, which is confession of sin ; he spoke as if he had no sins to confess, but many virtues to parade. It was a chief excellence in the devotion of the publican that he did confess his sin—aye, that his utterance was full of confession of sin ; from beginning to end it was an acknowledgment of his guilt, and an appeal to the merciful God.

The prayer of the publican is admirable for its fulness of meaning. An expositor calls it and certainly it is so compact and so condensed, so free from superfluous words, that it is worthy to be called by that name. I do not see how he could have expressed his meaning more fully or more briefly. He speaks of great matters, and trifles are not thought of. He has nothing to do with fastings twice in the week, or the paying of tithes, and such second-rate things ; the matters he treats of are of a higher order. He is not playing at prayer, but is in awful earnest.

His supplication speeded well with God, and he speedily won his suit with heaven. Mercy granted to him full justification. The prayer so pleased the Lord Jesus Christ, who heard it, that He condescended to become a portrait painter, and took a sketch of the petitioner. I say the prayer in itself was so pleasing to the gracious Saviour, that He tells us how it was offered : "Standing afar off, he would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast." Luke, who, according to tradition, was somewhat of an artist, as well as a physician, takes great care to place this picture in the portrait gallery of men saved by grace.

My heart's desire this morning is that many here may seek mercy of the Lord as this publican did, and go down to their houses justified. I ask no man to use the same words. Let no man attach a superstitious value to them. Alas ! this prayer has been used flippantly and foolishly, and almost looked upon as a sort of charm. Some have said, "We may live as we like, for we have only to say, 'God be merciful to me' when we are dying, and all will be well." This is a wicked misuse of gospel truth—yea, it turns it into a lie. If you choose thus to pervert the grace of the Gospel to your own destruction, your blood must be on your own heads. You may not have space given you in which to breathe out even this brief sentence ; or if you have, the words may not come from your heart, and so you may die in your sins.

I. The first lesson to be learned from the text is this—the fact of sinnership is No Reason for Despair.

For, first, this man who was a sinner yet dared to approach the Lord. According to our version, he said, "God be merciful to me a sinner," but a more accurate rendering is that which the Revised Version puts in the margin—"the sinner." He meant to say that he was emphatically the sinner. The Pharisee yonder was the saint of his age ; but this publican who stood afar off from the holy place was the sinner. Now, if you know yourself to be a sinner, you may plead with God ; but if you mourn that you are not only a sinner, but the sinner with the definite article, the sinner above all others, you may still hope in the mercy of the Lord. The worst, the most profane, the most horrible of sinners, may venture, as this man did, to approach the God of mercy. I know that it looks like a daring action ; therefore you must do it by faith. On any other footing but that of faith in the mercy of God, you who are a sinner may not dare to approach the Lord, lest you be found guilty of presumption. But with your eye on mercy you may be bravely trustful. This story of the Pharisee and the publican is intended as an encouraging example to you. If this man who was the sinner found forgiveness, so also shall you, if you seek it in the same way.

Moreover, the conception of salvation

for sinners. That salvation which we preach to you every day is glad tidings for the guilty. Salvation by grace implies that men are guilty. Salvation means not the reward of the righteous, but the cleansing of the unrighteous. Salvation is meant for the lost, the ruined, the undone ; and the blessings which it brings of pardoning mercy and cleansing grace must be intended for the guilty and polluted. "The whole need not a physician ;" the physician has his eye upon the sick. Alms are for the poor, bread is for the hungry, pardon is for the guilty. Oh, you that are guilty, you are the men that mercy seeks after !

Let me further say that, inasmuch as that salvation of God is a great one, it must have been intended to meet great sins. O sirs, would Christ have shed the blood of His heart for some trifling, venial sins which your tears could wash away ? See Jesus on the cross, and learn that all manner of sin and of blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men. The fact of salvation, and of a great salvation, ought to drive away despair from every heart that hears of it. If you are a sinner, you are the very man for whom the Gospel is intended ; and I do not mean by this a merely complimentary nominal sinner, but an out-and-out rebel, a transgressor against God and man.

If you want any other argument—and I hope you do not—I would put it thus : great sinners have been saved. All sorts of sinners are being saved to-day. What wonders some of us have seen ! What wonders have been wrought in this Tabernacle ! A man was heard at a prayer-meeting pleading in louder tones than usual ; and his voice was pitched to the tune of the roaring billows. A lady whispered to her friend, "Is that Captain F——?" "Yes," said the other, "why do you ask?" "Because," said she, "the last time I heard that voice its swearing made my blood run cold ; the man's oaths were beyond measure terrible. Can it be the same man?" Some one observed, "Go and ask him." The lady timidly said, "Are you the same Captain F—— that I heard swearing in the street, outside my house?" "Well," he said, "I am the same person, and yet, thank God, I am not the same !" O brethren, such were some of us ; but we are washed, but we are sanctified !

He was a Sailor,

I was reading the other day a story of an old shepherd who had never attended a place of worship ; but when he had grown gray, and was near to die, he was drawn by curiosity into the Methodist chapel, and all was new to him. Hard-hearted old fellow as he was, he was noticed to shed tears during the sermon. He had obtained a glimpse of hope. He saw that there was mercy even for him. He laid hold on eternal life at once. The surprise was great when he was seen at the chapel, and greater still when, on the Monday night, he was seen at the prayer-meeting ; yes, and heard at the prayer-meeting, for he fell down on his knees and praised God that he had found mercy. Do you wonder that the Methodists shouted, "Bless the Lord"? Wherever Christ is preached the most wicked of men and women are made to sit at the Saviour's feet, "clothed, and in their right minds." My hearer, why should it not be so with you ? At any rate, we have full proof of the fact that sinnership is no reason for despair.

II. I must now advance to my second observation : a sense of sinnership confers no right to mercy. You will wonder why I mention this self-evident truth ; but I mention it because of which does great mischief. This man was very sensible of his sin, insomuch that he called himself the sinner ; but he did not urge his sense of sin as any reason why he should find mercy. There is an ingenuity in the heart of man, nothing less than devilish, by which he will, if he can, turn the Gospel itself into a yoke of bondage. If we preach to sinners that they may come to Christ in all their anguish and misery, one cries, "I do not feel myself to be a sinner as I ought to feel it. I have not felt those convictions of which you speak, and, therefore, I cannot come to Jesus." This is a horrible twist of our meaning. We never meant to insinuate that convictions and doubts and despondencies conferred upon men a claim to mercy, and were necessary preparations for grace. I want you, therefore, to learn that a sense of sin gives no man a right to grace.

To imagine that an awful sense of sin constituted a claim upon mercy would be like giving a premium to great sin. Certain seekers think, "I have never been a drunkard, or a swearer, or unchaste, and I almost wish I had been, that I might feel myself to be the chief of sinners, and so might come to Jesus." Do not wish anything so atrocious ; there is in any shape or way. Thank God if you have been kept from the grosser forms of vice. Do not imagine that repentance is easier when sin is grosser ; the reverse is true. If good works do not help you, certainly bad works would not. You that have been moral and excellent should cry for mercy, and not be so silly as to dream that greater sins would help you to readier repentance. Come as you are, and if your heart be hard, confess it as one of your greatest sins. A deeper sense of sin would not entitle you to the mercy of God ; you can have no title to mercy but that which mercy gives you.

Then, dear friends, remember, if we begin to preach to sinners that they must have a certain sense of sin and a certain measure of conviction, such teaching would turn the sinner away from God in Christ to himself. The man begins at once to say, "Have I a broken heart? Do I feel the burden of sin?" This is only another form of looking to self. Man must not look to himself to find reasons for God's grace. The remedy does not lie in the seat of the disease ; it lies in the physician's hand. A sense of sin is not a claim, but a gift of that blessed Saviour who is exalted on high to give repentance and remission of sins. Beware of any teaching which makes you look to yourself for help, but cling to that doctrine which makes you look alone to Christ. Whether you know it or not, you are a lost, ruined sinner, only fit to be cast into the flames of hell forever. Confess this, but do not ask to be driven mad by a sense of it. Come to Jesus just as you are, and do not wait for a preparation made of your own miseries.

III. My third observation is this : the knowledge of their sinnership guides men to right action. When a man has learned of the Holy Spirit that he is a sinner, then by a kind of instinct of the new life, he does

The Right Thing in the Right Way.

This publican had not often been to the temple, and had not learned the orthdox way of behaving. It is easy to learn how we all do it nowadays in our temples—take off your hat, hold it in front of your face, and read the maker's name and address. Then sit down, and at the proper moment, bend forward and cover your eyes, and, furthermore, stand up when the rest of the congregation do so. People get to do this just as if they were wound up by machinery; yet they do not pray when they are supposed to be praying, nor bow before the Lord when worship is being offered. This publican is out of rank; he does not follow the rubric; he has gestures of his own.

First, instead of coming forward he stands afar off. He does not dare to come where that most respectable person, the Pharisee, is displaying himself, for he does not feel worthy. Furthermore, he would not lift so much as his eyes unto heaven. It seems natural to lift up your hands in prayer, but he would not even lift his eyes. His downcast eyes meant much. In the meanwhile the penitent publican kept smiting upon his breast. The original does not say that he smote upon his breast once, but he smote and smote again. It was a continuous act. He seemed to say,

Oh, this Wicked Heart!

He would smite it. Again and again he expressed his intense grief by this Oriental gesture, for he did not know how else to set forth his sorrow. Every gesture and posture is significant, and yet all came spontaneously. He had no book of directions how to behave himself in the house of God; his sincerity guided him. If you want to know how to behave yourselves as penitents, be penitents. The best rubrics of worship are those which are written on broken hearts.

I have heard of a minister who was said to cry in the wrong place in his sermons, and it was found afterward that he had written in the margin of his manuscript, "Weep here." His audience could not see the reason for his artificial moisture. It must have had a ludicrous effect. In religion everything artificial is ridiculous, or worse; but grace in the heart is the best "master of the ceremonies." He who prays aright with his heart will not much err with foot, and hand, and head.

Observe that this man, even under the weight of conscious sin, was led aright; for

He Went Straight to God.

A sense of sin without faith drives us from God, but a sense of sin with faith draws us immediately to God. He came to God alone; he felt that it would be of no avail to confess his fault to a mortal, or to look for absolution from man. He did not resort to the priest of the temple, but to the God of the temple. He did not ask to speak to the good and learned man, the Pharisee, who stood on the same floor with him. His inquiry-room was the secret of his own soul, and he inquired of the Lord. He ran straight away to God, who alone was able to help; and when he opened his mouth, it was, "God be merciful to me a sinner." That is what you have to do, my dear hearer, if you would be saved; you must go distinctly and immediately to God in Christ Jesus. Forget all things else, and say, with the returning prodigal, "I will arise and go to my father." None but God can help us out of our low estate.

The publican did not look round on his fellow-worshippers; he was too much absorbed in his own grief of heart. Specially is it noteworthy that he had no remarks to make upon the Pharisee. He did not denounce the pride, or the hypocrisy, or the heard-heartedness of the professor, who so offensively looked down upon him. He did not return contempt for contempt, as we are all too apt to do. No; he dealt with the Lord alone in the deep sincerity of his own heart; and it was well. My hearer, when will you do the same? When will you cease to censure others, and reserve your severity and your critical observations for your own conduct?

Then he appealed to mercy only. This was wise. See how rightly he was guided. What had he to do with justice, since it could only condemn and destroy him? Like a naked sword, it threatens to sheathe itself in my heart; how can I appeal to justice? Neither power nor wisdom, nor any other quality of the great God could be resorted to; only mercy stretched out her wing. The prayer, "God be merciful," is the only prayer that you can pray who have been greatly guilty. If all your lives you have spurned your Saviour, all you can now do is to cast yourselves upon the mercy of God.

IV. I now close with my last head, which is this—the believing confession of sinnership is

The Way of Peace.

"God be merciful to me a sinner," was the prayer, but what was the answer? Listen to this: "This man went down to his house justified rather than the other."

In a few sentences let me sketch this man's progress. He came to God only as a sinner, nakedly as a sinner. Observe, he did not say, "God be merciful to me a penitent sinner." He was a penitent sinner, but he did not plead his penitence; and if you are ever so penitent and convinced of sin, do not mention it as an argument, lest you be accused of self-righteousness. Come as you are, as a sinner, and as nothing else. He does not even say, "God be merciful to me the reformed sinner." I have no doubt he did reform, and give up his evil ways, but he does not plead that reformation. Reformation will not take away your sinnership; therefore do not speak as if it could do so. The publican does not say, "God be merciful to me a praying sinner." He was praying, but he does not mention it as a plea, for he thought very little of his own prayers. Do not plead your prayers; you might as well plead your sins. Do not trick yourself out in the weeds of your own repentance, much less in the fig-leaves of your own resolutions, but come to God in Christ Jesus in all the nakedness of your sin, and everlasting mercy will cover both you and your sins.

Next, notice that this man did nothing but appeal to mercy; he said, "God be merciful to me." He did not attempt to excuse himself, and say, "Lord, I could not help it. Lord, I was not worse than other publicans. Lord, I was a public servant, and only did what every other tax-collector did." No, no, he is too honest to forge excuses. He is a sinner, and he owns it. If the Lord should condemn him out of his own mouth, and send him to hell, he cannot help it; his sin is too evident to be denied. He lays his head on the block, and humbly pleads, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Neither does this publican offer any promises of future amendment as a set-off. He does not say, "Lord, be merciful for the past, and I will be better in the future." Nothing of the sort; "Be merciful to me the sinner" is his one and only request. So would I have you cry, "O God, be merciful to me!" That is the way to pray; and if you pray in that way

God Will Hear You.

Now, I want to cheer your hearts by noticing that this man, through this prayer, and through this confession of sin, experienced a remarkable degree of acceptance. He had come up to the temple condemned; "he went down to his house justified." A complete change, a sudden change, a happy change was wrought upon him. Heavy heart and downcast eye were exchanged for glad heart and hopeful outlook. He came into that temple with trembling, he left it with rejoicing. This was a very sudden change, was it not? It was wrought in a moment. The process of spiritual quickening is not a matter of hours, but of a single second of time. I grant you, life would be very feeble at first; still, there must be a time in which it was not there at all; and again, there must have been an instant in which it begins. There can be no middle condition between dead and alive. Yet a man may not know when the change took place.

Once more, this man went away with a witness such as I pray we may all have. "He was justified." "But," you add, "how do I know he was justified?" Listen to these words. Our blessed Lord says, "I tell you that this man went down to his house justified rather than the other." "I tell you." Jesus, our Lord, can tell. Into our ear He tells it. He tells it to God and the holy angels, and He tells it to the man Himself. The man who has cried from his heart "God be merciful to me a sinner" is a justified man. When he stood and confessed his sin, and cast himself wholly upon the divine mercy, that man was unburdened, so that he went down to his house justified.

We are all going down to our houses. Oh, that we might go down justified! You are going home; I want you to go home to God, who is the true home of the soul. "He went down to his house justified," and why should not you do the same? It will be a happy Sunday for you, if you this day begin a new life by faith in Jesus. You shall have joy, peace, and happiness if you seek and find mercy from the great Father. I think I see you trudging home, having left your load behind you, but compassed about with songs of praise unto our God. So be it. Amen and Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

BISHOP HANNINGTON'S BROKEN PROMISE.*

Every school has its bully. A certain R. R. filled this rôle during the time Hannington was at the Temple school. Being rash enough to attack this boy, Hannington got, and perhaps upon that occasion deserved, a tremendous thrashing. Both of his eyes were closed up, and sundry egg-like bumps upon his head bore witness to the hardness of his adversary's fists. The same afternoon he had to go home to pay his weekly visit. Horrified at the dreadful appearance of her son, his mother made him promise that he would never fight again.

Now, there never was one more absolutely devoid of physical fear than James Hannington. Yet, holding himself bound by that promise of his, he returned to school defenceless. Every one knows what must be the fate of a schoolboy when once the boys about him have clearly ascertained that he will not fight. He was soon made thoroughly wretched. His pusillanimity—for such it seemed—was taken advantage of in every way. He went about like a muzzled mastiff, submitting to be treated by his tormentors like a coward and a cur.

At last he could stand it no longer. "One day," he says, "I had allowed myself to be bullied nearly to death by a boy about my own size, when all of a sudden I turned round, and said, to the astonishment of the whole school, that I would fight him. He was backed by his cousin, the only son of Baron P——. I don't think I had any one to back me, but I very soon gave him a thrashing, and I never recollect being bullied afterward." He always remembered that act as a "broken promise," but who can doubt that such a promise was a greater burden laid upon a schoolboy's shoulders than he could be reasonably expected to bear?

RUNNING FROM ROYALTY.

On Easter Monday, 1866, at the grand review, the Prince and Princess of Wales being present, he was appointed major to his battalion. Right proudly he jingled along upon his gaily-caparisoned charger. Scarcely, however, had they started, when that horse, unmindful of his own dignity or that of his master, took the bit between his teeth, and bolted. Away flew James, in full view of the admiring Prince and royal party. First his horse made for a gap, which led over the cliff; from thence, being hardly turned by the waving arms of some fisher-folk, he dashed down the pavement, and ran full tilt into a cart; grazing this, he was nearly knocked from the saddle by violent contact with a cab-horse; and next, still sticking bravely on, he charged home into a mounted officer. At last, not without effort, this mad career was checked, and the major rode back to his post, girth broken and accoutrements all awry, amid the ironical cheering of the delighted crowd. So he tells us. But if he appeared, through his charger's mis-

DR. TALMAGE ON THE LATE REV. H. W. BEECHER.

The Funeral Oration.

Of the four overflow funeral services held in churches in the neighborhood of Plymouth Church on Friday last, the largest was that at the First Baptist Church, in which Dr. Talmage, the Rev. A. J. F. Behrends, and other clergymen took part. In the course of his eloquent eulogy of the dead pastor, Dr. Talmage said :

"There will be two ears that to-day will not hear one word of appreciation, and there will be two eyes that will not read one word of complimentary journalism—the eyes, the ears of the mighty man for whose obsequies we are convoked. We commit his immortal spirit to the bosom of a living God. But how much we shall miss our friend ! Great charities will present themselves upon our platforms, but his voice will not be heard to plead for them. Times of national crisis will come, but he will not be here to champion the right. The great conflict between the forces of God and the forces of sin seems but his battle-axe will not gleam in the fight. Yet 'God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in time of trouble.'

"As our departed friend can gain nothing from all the utterances of to-day, I ask myself, What can be learned for the living ?

Three Lessons.

"One for the ministers of religion ; one for all toilers with the brain ; one for everybody. Lesson for the ministers of religion : The power of similitude. Of all the metaphysical discourses you ever heard Mr. Beecher make, you remember nothing ; but his illustrations live and will live with you as long as your memory continues.

"The grandest effects produced by Mr. Beecher were wrought by his illustrations, and he ransacked the universe for them, and he poured them forth in floods, and he timbered sermonic literature from dry and dull didactics into a marvellous resiliency. He began the war which I hope will be carried on until everything like humdrum shall be driven from all the pulpits of Christendom. From the day that Mr. Beecher came from Indianapolis until his last sermon in Plymouth pulpit, it was a victory of similitude. Let all ministers of religion, especially all young ministers, learn the lesson.

"The second lesson is for all toilers with the brain, and that is the Danger of Overwork.

"After Mr. Beecher's brain, like a swift courser, had dashed along for nearly seventy-four miles, lo ! it is hitched to half dozen new loads, any one of which might be enough to break down a fresh brain. After fifty years of incessant and exciting work, Cisatlantic and Transatlantic, he allows himself to be harnessed to a syndicate of letters, to a life of Christ, to an autobiography, and to a half dozen other enterprises. At a time he had a right to slow up, the throttle-valve is pulled for new velocities. With health and strength enough to have kept him in active pastorate for at least ten years more, crash, goes the whole mental and physical machinery !

"But that is the way the most of the toilers of the brain go. Somehow we get under the delusion that we must enter all the doors of usefulness opened. Well, if a man has been industrious with his brain, by the time he reaches his fiftieth year there are a hundred doors of usefulness open all around, ninety-nine of which he ought to decline to enter. But of overwork Horace Greeley went, Henry J. Raymond went, and one half of the ministers and attorneys and doctors and journalists are going. Oh, that some one would invent an ometer which, hung over the heart and lung, might decide when a man ought to stop brain-work.

"The third lesson is for everybody : The importance of

for quick transit from world to world, a lesson we learn every day and forget as soon as we learn it. The most powerful sermon Mr. Beecher ever preached he is preaching to-day from the text, 'Be ye also ready, for in such a day and in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh.' So often, as in Mr. Beecher's case, the last sickness is a time of unconsciousness, it behooves us while in health and strength to get ready for the next world. Do not wait until you see the flambeau of the Bridegroom coming through the darkness before you begin to trim your lamps. You may wait for your last moment, but when your last moment comes it will not wait for you. And now departed. Carry him gently out along the streets with which he has so long been familiar. For the first time he passes without smile or cheerful recognition. Take him out to the silent city where sleep so many to whom he once ministered. They will not greet him now, but on resurrection morn will rise near him. Toll long and loud the bell at the gate. Put him to rest under the early crocus of the spring, for he must be very tired. His right hand closed, for there are no more genial words for him to write ; his lips shut, for there are no more encouraging words for him to speak ; his brow cool, for his head has stopped aching now ; his heart quiet, for it will never break again."

Farewell, Illustrious Brother

A CATASTROPHE ON THE ELEVATED RAILROAD ON MARCH 8.

A lamentable fatality, appalling to spectators and all who read of it, occurred on Tuesday of last week. About half-past six in the morning, while the trains on the Third Avenue Elevated were crowded with persons travelling from their homes in Harlem to their work in New York City, there was a sudden block. A large tailoring establishment on the east side of the Bowery was on fire, and the trains going up-town could not pass it.

The tracks were therefore full of trains waiting to go up-town, and every train that came down added to the line. The consequence was that the trains coming down-town were signalled to halt. One of these stopped just over Fifteenth Street, between the stations at Eighteenth and Fourteenth streets. Several minutes elapsed, and, as the train did not move, some of the passengers became impatient, and were permitted to get down upon the footpath, or, as it is technically called, the track walk—a narrow plank footway beside the track—to make their way to the station.

As they were going along this precarious walk, the train, which they had just left, began moving. When it started, the gatemen closed their gates to prevent any more passengers from getting down. But one of those who had already left the train—a half-grown boy whose name is not known—thinking to resume his ride, caught at the platform between the first and second cars, and attempted to get on. He caught hold of the closed gate and found lodgment for one foot on the iron step under the edge of the platform. In this position his body was bent, his haunches extending outward over the narrow and crowded track walk. In a moment he came in collision with a large and elderly man. This man, losing his balance by the shock, gave a cry of alarm and caught his nearest neighbor to save himself. That man clutched a third, and with a united cry the three went over, falling to the pavement in a heap. The boy held on and knocked more men down. The cries of these men created a panic among those on the walk between them and the station, and a rush was made along the narrow way to the platform for safety. Unfortunately the track walk runs abruptly against the station structure, it being three feet lower than the station platform, and is not provided there with steps leading up to the latter. And, to make matters still worse, there was the iron end-rail of the station platform to climb over.

Those nearest the station caught at the railing and endeavored to climb up and over it. Those behind crowded upon and pulled at them. Those still further back shouted and pushed and struggled to get on, imperilling the lives of all by their frantic haste. And in this wild scramble on that narrow and unguarded footway seven were forced off, falling to the street below. The boy who had begun the mischief let go and joined the crowd on the platform. He got off safe.

Two hideous piles of bruised and helpless humanity lay in the street below. Near Fifteenth Street was a pile of three bodies, nearly motionless, and with only a slight muscular movement observable in it. About twenty feet farther down the street was another pile, more scattered and struggling than the first, as it contained the greater number of bodies, there being seven in it. These had fallen originally one upon the other, but those falling on top being less seriously injured than those beneath, twisted and rolled and worked themselves off until they were scattered upon the muddy pavement. But the horrible picture remained only a moment in view. Before all its details could be observed a score of willing workers were gathering up the bodies and conveying them to the sidewalk.

The first man who fell had died at once, giving only one or two gasps after he struck the ground. Another was alive, but died within a few minutes after being carried to the sidewalk. A third, though unconscious when picked up moaned piteously, and died in great agony before the arrival of the ambulances. Several of the others were unconscious when picked up, and all were thoroughly dazed and helpless. One of them died the same day in the hospital, and others are disabled for life.

The fault lay with the big boy who, in order to save himself the trouble of walking a few yards, clung to the gate of the moving train, careless as to the safety of those on the crowded plank walk. It is probable, however, that the company will be held responsible for permitting the passengers to leave the train and walk along a dangerous ledge about twenty feet above the ground when there was no rail to keep them from falling over.

The Splendid Gambling Palace at Monte Carlo in the Earthquake-shaken Riviera.

THE GAMBLING PALACE NEAR MONACO.

(See Illustration on this page.)

In the district agitated by the earthquake of February 23d is the famous paradise of gamblers, the Casino of Monte Carlo, a picture of which is given above. The little town of Monte Carlo stands on a rocky promontory just outside the port of Monaco, and large sums of money have been expended in covering it with fine buildings, hotels, lodging-houses, and villas, with the magnificent Casino, built in 1862, and beautiful gardens and terraces facing the sea. Dr. J. H. Bennett, the well-known physician, who has made his winter residence at Mentone these thirty years past, has described this place in his instructive book, "Winter and Spring on the Shores of the Mediterranean." He complains of the pernicious influence of the Monte Carlo establishment, which he, in common with many visitors to the Riviera, including the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, thinks ought to be suppressed by the authority of the French Government. From Mentone, which is but five miles distant, hundreds of visitors go there every day, and multitudes also from Nice, from Cannes, and even from San Remo and Genoa. Many of the invalids at Mentone, he says, "lose so heavily at Monte Carlo, in the early part of their stay, that they have to live from hand to mouth during the remainder; or, having come to the Riviera to save life, are obliged in the winter to return home, to face disease and, perhaps, death; others send home again and again for money, sell, mortgage, borrow, entirely neglect their health, spend the days and evenings in the close, badly-ventilated rooms, and die before the end of the season. These votaries and victims of gambling are not necessarily the young and inexperienced; they are often middle-aged, and include noblemen, gentry, generals, colonels, barristers, and physicians. Ruin almost invariably follows sooner or later, and bankruptcy, poverty, dishonor, suicide desolate the home; and if, as he says, during the winter, about one suicide a week occurs in and near Monaco, that represents less than a tithe of the misery which is produced elsewhere through Monte Carlo." Dr. Bennett finally pronounces Monte Carlo a most pestilential institution, and ardently hopes that it will be summarily abolished.

A visit to the Casino at Monte Carlo was paid recently by Mr. Louis Paulian, who writes: "Business led me to the shores of the Mediterranean. For many days I stayed at Monaco, not to gamble, for, thank Heaven, I have never felt the passion of play, but to settle some family matters. Morning after morning I had travelled along the coast, and had admired the truly admirable picture which nature offers to the traveller who goes from Nice to Genoa by the Corniche road, when one day the fancy seized me to enter the Monte Carlo Casino. The impression I received was strange, and I must frankly confess that the sight which met my eyes contrasted disagreeably with the beauties which nature has lavished upon this country. If the view from the top of the terrace of Monte Carlo dazzles the eyes, calms the nerves, and fills the mind with an infinite charm, the scene which the gaming saloon presents troubles the sight, saddens the heart, and fills one with a feeling of unutterable weariness and depression.

"Picture to yourself a splendid saloon, brilliantly lighted by numerous chandeliers; the walls magnificently decorated, but the sole furniture of the room consisting of tables and chairs. On each table may be seen a roulette wheel, miniature rakes, and a locked box. Gradually the crowd enters, and the gaming saloon is filled. Visitors of the most varied types take their places round the tables, the croupiers come in, open the box, fill it with bank-notes, and pile up before them heaps of gold. The play begins. The banker throws an ivory ball, which revolves in a wheel—a species of round basin with numbers, and which is itself whirling in an opposite direction. There are thirty-six numbers on the wheel without counting zero. Each player stakes a sum of money upon a number. The croupiers pay thirty-six times the sum which is staked on the number at which the ball stops to the lucky player, who has hazarded his stake on that number. All the money risked on the other numbers forms the gain of the Casino."

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

Held for Ransom.

It was a relief when the grim-visaged guard with the murderous knife so ready to his hand, went away and Harold Spofforth could take a mental survey of the situation.

Uttering a fierce exclamation of anger and vexation, he flung himself upon the rude, but not uncomfortable, couch of leaves. Like most of his selfish and unthinking kind, this votary of pleasure thought himself very hardly used. He cursed his fate. He bemoaned his ill-fortune. He inveighed against the cruel "destiny" that had brought him there.

Silly men and women, whose voluntary misdoings bring upon themselves sore mishaps and subject them to great hardships, are always ready to bemoan their hard "fate," and to deplore their "misfortunes," when, in reality, it is their own misconduct that ought to be the sole subject of their thoughts and of their tears. Misery is a state and condition most frequently induced by men's follies. "He that breaketh a hedge, a serpent shall bite him," says Solomon, that greatest and wisest of all proverbial philosophers. In that case it is not the serpent, or its bite, or the sure law that sin must find its punishment, but the hedge-breaker, who must bear the blame and the shame. "Wrong-doing hath long ruing," says the old saw, and it is well where the ruing comes while reform is possible and repentance can bring forth fruit.

"Fools make a mock of sin, will not believe It carries such a dagger in its sleeve;
'How can it be,' they say, 'that such a thing,
So full of sweetness e'er should wear a sting?'
They know not that it is the very spell
Of sin, to make men laugh themselves to hell.
Look to thyself then, deal with sin no more,
Lest He that saves, against thee shut the door."

As yet, however, Harold Spofforth had got no further than to murmur angrily against "misfortune" and bemoan his evil "fate."

During the time he lay waiting for the promised meal, the suspicion dawned upon him that his friend, Don Antonio de Diaz, was responsible for his present captivity. The suspicion became a certainty an hour or two later, when one of the gang entered with a liberal repast. Harold questioned the man, who would have departed silently but for the persistence of the captured man. He at last admitted that the companion with whom Harold was travelling, when the highwaymen attacked them, was the leader of the band, and the attack had been made by his orders. Every year he varied his occupation by taking a run into some foreign capital, and he generally brought back some rich prize with him.

"He will be disappointed this time," said Harold; "my pocket-book is empty. I was just about to write home for a fresh supply of money."

"Perhaps the chief will allow you to write still," said the man. "He may have reckoned on your doing that. He knows what he is doing, and he would not have brought you here without being sure that you were worth the trouble. Pedro de Panza is no fool."

"Ah, then you are mistaken!" said Harold. "My companion was Don Antonio de Diaz. I have heard of Pedro, but I never saw him."

"It is all one," said the man, shrugging his shoulders, and thrusting his hands forward, palms outward. "Don Antonio de Diaz is a name he assumes for travelling purposes. If he called himself by his right name in the cities, he would soon be in prison. Yes, it is the same, and you will have to pay."

All night long Harold lay awake, bemoaning his folly. He had evidently been duped, and to a man who prides himself on his knowledge of the world that is inexpressibly humiliating. In addition to that was the expectation of a long and tiresome imprisonment, for he was resolved that he would never ask his father to pay a ransom for him. The man was doubtless right in thinking that he would be called upon to pay, but he would never consent. That was his decision, and having made it, Harold turned over and went to sleep.

The next morning he was informed that he must write home without delay, and request the payment of a sum equivalent in Spanish money to fifty thousand dollars. The Don would forward the letter, with instructions as to the place to which it might be sent.

As he had determined, Harold sent back an emphatic refusal. In reply, he was informed that sooner or later he would have to write, and in the mean time he would be fed on bread and water, and loaded with chains. When he had written his letter he would be treated as a gentleman, with proper food, comfortable quarters, and a fair measure of liberty. If he proved obstinate, there were other measures that might be tried. Pedro himself might write, and prove the necessity for a ransom by sending with his letter one of Harold's fingers or one of his ears.

With this horrible threat the messenger left him to consider his position. Harold did think long and seriously. It seemed incredible that such a thing could be done in the nineteenth century. Yet he remembered just such a case having been reported in the English papers not long before. Then the young Englishman, the son of a London merchant, was held by Greek brigands until he did actually lose two fingers, and his life was saved only by the payment of the ransom, notwithstanding the most zealous efforts of the English minister at Athens to secure his release. It would probably be so with him. The Spanish police, if ever so willing to oblige the English Government in delivering him, would be little likely to succeed. He recalled the signs of respect he had seen paid to the robber chief, as they journeyed to the mountain fastness, and inferred that the people would not dare to guide the law officers to the robber's den. He rolled on the bed of leaves in mental anguish, and for the first time since his childhood he breathed an earnest prayer to God for help.

On one thing he was resolved. He would not write the letter. His own foolish vanity had led him to boast of the wealth of his father and of the large fortune to which he himself was sure to succeed, and hence the ransom asked for him was fearfully large, more than his father could have paid, had his childish boasts been true. But he knew how his own career of reckless extravagance had depleted his father's purse and drained his resources, and he said to himself, "It can never be, shall never be. It is better for me to die." All that was generous in him was just then struggling to get uppermost, and when the gray light of the morning began to show through the cracks in the rough door that held him prisoner, he arose from his bed, resolved to refuse the biding of the brigand chief, and die.

That his death would follow his refusal he had no doubt. He shuddered as he thought of it, sitting there alone, with that awful burden on his soul, with that most dreadful of all guests to keep him company, an aroused and guilty conscience.

> "Not all the tortures which the poets feign
> Can match the fierce, unutterable pain
> He feels who, day and night, devoid of rest, > Carries his own accuser in his breast."

Like many another of Madame Pleasure's hookwinked dupes, Harold had had a long smooth course of self-indulgence, "dallying daily with a false delight;" but now the mask was lifted, and the demon features behind the false face were scowling on him. The cup which moveth itself aright, and which had invited his lips to its beaded brim, revealed the coiled serpent that lay hidden beneath the enticing draught; and the young prodigal awoke to the tremendous truth that—

> "Though the mills of God grind slowly,
> Yet they grind exceeding small;
> Though with patience He stands waiting,
> With exactness grinds He all."

And yet his sweet sister Ethel was offering daily prayer for Harold Spofforth; she and the godly carpenter had entered into a holy league, and thrice a day their prayers rose to heaven, that the wanderer, far as he had wandered, might be brought back again to home and God. For this, as they both believed, the maiden had been raised from a bed of death. And at the very time that Harold was writhing in mental agony on the floor of the brigand's cave, Ethel was girding herself for her self-imposed task of finding the wanderer, and bringing him back to peaceful Aspendale.

She had at length won from her father a reluctant consent to her expedition, and the quiet preparations she had been making for it were pushed forward more quickly and decisively now that Sir Godwin had given his consent, and had promised to accompany her. Ethel's hopes were raised then, but they were soon dashed to the ground. A great sombre shadow fell on the mansion of Aspen Towers. Sir Godwin was stricken with paralysis, and for some days his life was despaired of. Gradually, however, the crisis passed. The baronet, a mere wreck of his former self, was able to sit up. Weak, almost helpless, he was a pitiable object to any one who remembered his dignified, self-reliant manner of days gone by. And his mind had suffered with his body. He was fretful and querulous with everybody, not even excepting the good and gentle Ethel, whose pilgrimage in search of her brother had been thus delayed. To her it was a time of great tribulation. Although the long, deep silence of her heartless brother caused her anxieties to deepen and increase, her whole soul went out toward her father in his affliction, and she became his tender, assiduous, and self-forgetful nurse.

"I'll tell you what it is, miss," said Nancy Holmes, "it's my opinion that if you don't leave Sir Godwin to me and Thompson, you'll soon be worse than he is."

"I can't help it," said Ethel, pale, worn, and hollow-eyed. "Dear father has but me to care for him, and my life is bound up in his. Oh, if only my brother Harold would come home!"

Nancy silently retired, for she, together with nearly all that knew him, had no hope that Harold Spofforth would ever be other than he was, a life-grief to his father, a bitter sorrow to his sister, and the ruin of himself. As she closed the door behind her, she heard her young mistress sobbing aloud, and crying, "Oh, brother Harold! brother Harold! Will you never come? Dear Lord, send him home again."

The baronet added to her distress by the tenacity with which he childishly clung to the idea that Harold had been sent for; and there was something intensely touching in his plaintive words, which had come to be a daily and almost hourly formula—"Hasn't Harold come yet? When do you think he will be here?"

So the weary days pass by, and Ethel's faith and patience were tried as gold in the fire. But, like gold, they stood the test, and hoping by naked faith alone, hoping against hope, she still believed that she should be permitted to bring Harold home. One morning, as Ethel was taking her melancholy morning meal alone, for her father did not rise until late in the day, Thompson, the butler, brought in a singular, foreign-looking letter, addressed to herself, and bearing the postal-stamp of Spain, and handed it to her.

Ethel opened the letter with trembling fingers and a cold fear at her heart, and this is what she read:

"My dear Sister: In writing from this den of thieves, into which my own mad folly has brought me, I do not feel that I have any right to call you thus. At any rate, I have been anything but a dear brother, except in a ruinous sense; and I blush for shame as I write to you, whom I have so greatly grieved and so shamefully neglected. I feel as though I would gladly be other and better than I am, but it is too late. The die is cast, and perhaps if I had my liberty I should fail to—but no, I think not. I hope that, living or dying, that is gone forever.

"I am a prisoner, and in the power of the notorious Red Pedro, the brigand of whom you have doubtless heard. He asks as my ransom the sum of fifty thousand dollars, and he declares that he will have it or my life. I do not doubt his word. He is a fiend incarnate, and is capable of any atrocity. I have been a failure all my life, and am as bad as bad can be. I am not worth ransoming at any price. I am compelled to write this, otherwise I would not pen a line of it. Hitherto I have refused to do so, but they have resorted to such means, that I am bound to yield. Honestly, I believe it best that my father should not further involve himself. The estate I have impoverished cannot bear it.

"Break the news to him gently, though I don't see why he should care. Poor father! I've been—but there! where is the use? Forgive me for all the sorrow I have caused you. Ask my father to forgive me. May God forgive me!" A postscript was added by Pedro, containing directions as to how and where the money might be sent.

It is needless to say that Red Pedro had read this epistle before it was dispatched. He cared nothing about the strong remarks made about himself, and was sufficiently acquainted with human nature to know that the sentences deprecating the payment of the money were most likely to have the opposite effect. Latterly, Harold's experiences had been of the most painful kind, and it was only when Red Pedro proceeded to carry out his threat of mutilation, that the young man, at his wits' end, had written as above.

Poor Ethel! She sat pale, and wan with watching and sore trouble, looking into vacancy, with the ill-starred letter on her knee. Oh, how she pined just then for a mother's counsel, love, and aid! Her mother! The thought impressed her greatly, held her firmly, controlled her fully. What was it that led her forthwith to seek her mother's grave?

Hastily donning her hat and a warm, gray shawl, she passed out of the house and through the shrubbery to the cottage of the old gardener, who was also clerk and sexton to the little gray weather-beaten church, whose square tower and short spire peeped above the elms. Having got the key, she proceeded to the church, quietly unlocked the door, and paced the stone floor toward the chancel, with Harold's letter still in her hand. The letter reminded her of King Hezekiah, and what he did when in awful straits: "And Hezekiah received the letter from the hand of the messenger, and read it, and Hezekiah went up to the house of the Lord and spread it before the Lord."

In obedience to this suggestion, she entered the chancel, knelt by her mother's tomb, and spread out the letter on the breast of the marble effigy of her honored parent, which covered the surface of her grave. Leaning her fair head upon it, she pleaded with heaven, while the sorrowful epistle became blistered with her tears. Then she cried aloud the petition of the troubled King of Judah—"Help, O Lord, and save us, for Thy mercy's sake!" "Amen, Lord, amen!"

"An' there's nowt so sure!" The startled girl rose to her feet, to see Simon Holmes kneeling on the floor, with his gray head in his hands, and bowed down almost to the ground.

God has tender love for servants. He has given them place in many parts of His Word. Adorn the Doctrine of God our Saviour in all things" (Tit. 2 : 9, 10). It is servants, not masters, who have the special privilege of adorning the doctrine of God our Saviour. Jesus, as the Son of Man, came on earth as a Servant, and as being Himself "under the yoke," He says, "Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls" (Matt. 11 : 29). The natural heart of man is proud, self-sufficient, and impatient of control; it requires the grace of God to serve in the spirit of Christ. In His Word God gives many pictures of family life, but in the chapter we are now considering He gives us a full-length portrait of a servant after His own heart.

Eleazar of Damascus was the steward of Abraham's house, and, in his childless days, Abraham had said of him, "Lo, one born in my house is mine heir" (Gen. 15 : 2, 3). Eleazar had expectations of property and position, which were all scattered to the winds by the birth of Isaac. Yet this servant, this type of God's Servant, the Lord Jesus, sunk his own personal interest at once in that of his master, just as Jesus did, who "pleased not Himself," but did always those things that pleased God (Rom. 15 : 3; John 8 : 29), and just as we, who are God's servants, are privileged by the very death of Jesus for us to do—to "live not unto ourselves, but unto Him which died for us, and rose again" (II Cor. 5 : 15). It was this man only whom Abraham could trust with the important commission of finding a wife for his son Isaac. First, Abraham makes him swear in the most solemn manner that he will not take a wife for his son of the Canaanites, but that he will go to the land from whence Abraham came out, and in which he had left, in his own family, some of the fruits of his ministry among them. Eleazar suggested a difficulty, "Peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me unto this land: must I needs bring thy son again unto the land from whence thou camest?" the answer was most decided, "Beware that thou bring not my son thither again." Thank God that there are some parents who have decision enough to of placing their children in circumstances of temptation. Too numerous are those who let their children have their own way, and then expect the Lord to counteract the influence of their folly. Lot lived in Sodom, and the bitter harvest which he reaped in his family was the result. Abraham commanded his children and his household after him (Gen. 18 : 19), and Isaac grew up a man of prayer.

Abraham had settled everything beforehand with God, and therefore he said with authority, "The Lord God of heaven . . . will send His angel before thee, and thou shalt take a wife unto my son from thence." But, lest Eleazar's faith should not reach out to the full measure, he said, "And if the woman will not be willing to follow thee, then thou shalt be clear from this thy oath."

With this provision for his journey (the angel of the Lord to pioneer), Eleazar set forth. God brought him safely to the very city where Abraham's brother, Nahor, dwelt. He was a stranger, and the people of the city were strange to him, but the travelling Companion of the journey was not absent, and Eleazar was at home with God. So his first action on reaching the outskirts of the city was to kneel down and pray. He did not trust to himself for a moment, he had been put under the guardianship and leadership of "the angel of the Lord," and

He Would not Go One Step Alone.

Yet it is not for himself he prays, but for his master Abraham. His prayer is of the most simple, business-like kind. He wants to know who is the wife which God has chosen for Isaac, and he proposes a very simple way of ascertaining, "Behold, I stand here by the fountain of water; and the daughters of the men of the city come out to draw water: and let it come to pass, that the damsel to whom I shall say, Let down thy pitcher, I pray thee, that I may drink; and she shall say, Drink, and I will give thy camels drink also; let the same be she that Thou hast appointed for Thy servant Isaac; and thereby shall I know that Thou hast shewed kindness unto my master" (R. V.). Such was the prayer, straight to the point, and the answer was like the Lord's promise, "And it shall come to pass, before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear" (Isa. 65 : 24).

Before Eleazar Had Done Speaking,

Rebekah came out, who was the daughter of Abraham's nephew, Bethuel. There was something in her first appearance, just while the breath of prayer concerning her was on his lips, which at once laid hold of Abraham's servant, and he "ran to meet her." There might have been many maidens with her, but Eleazar addressed only this one, and he said, "Let me, I pray thee, drink a little water of thy pitcher."

The sign was fulfilled; she said, "Drink, my lord;" and afterward, "I will draw for thy camels also, until they have done drinking." While she was thus busy, Eleazar "looked steadfastly on her, holding his peace, to know whether the Lord hath made His journey prosperous or not" (R. V.). He knew it from God, but waited to have it confirmed by man. How different from the conduct of Jacob, at a later date, who tried to manage matters for himself! Eleazar then asked her of her family, whose daughter she was, and whether there was room in her father's house for him to lodge. And when he heard how near a relation she was to Abraham, regardless of Rebekah's presence, his full heart went out in praise to God. "Whatever fills the heart overflows the mouth" (Matt. 12 : 34, Luther's Trans.). Eleazar was not ashamed to praise his God and pray in the presence of a stranger. The Mohammedan, the Hindu, the fire-worshipper, and even the Roman Catholic are never ashamed to perform their devotions when others are by. Why should a real child of God be ashamed to acknowledge his God before others? True, we are taught to shut to the door, and pray to our Father, which is in secret (Matt. 6 : 6), and so not to parade our prayers; but, at the same time, we are taught to confess Christ before men (Luke 12 : 8).

Rebekah ran home with the tidings of distant relatives, and her brother Laban, who always had an eye to business, seemed deeply impressed with the jewels which Eleazar had brought. Food was set on, but the faithful servant lived not unto himself, and he said, "I will not eat until I have told mine errand." Oh, how the true spirit of the man comes out in these words! In a certain house there is in every room a little scroll on which are these words,

"God First."

This was the motto and text of Eleazar's life. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God" ought to be, and may be, the continuous text of a Christian's life. Abraham's servant related all which had passed between him and his master, and between him and God—the oath he had taken, the assured promise of the angel's guidance, his prayer at the well, and its answer. It is the first testimony recorded in the Bible. When he had finished his story, with all the dignity of a man who feels he is in trust for God, he said, "And now, if ye will deal kindly and truly with my master, tell me; and if not, tell me; that I may turn to the right hand, or to the left." Eleazar had not given any coloring to the history he had related; he had simply given facts which were undeniable. Laban and Bethuel, men of position and property, were in the presence of a servant, but of a servant before whom they, no doubt, felt small, for this man lived in the audience chamber of God. There is something of awe and reverence in the unanimous answer of Bethuel and Laban, "The thing proceedeth from the Lord: we cannot speak unto thee bad or good. Behold, Rebekah is before thee; take her, and go, and let her be thy master's son's wife, as the Lord hath spoken." Even then, this man of God (who was in the habit of praying without ceasing, and in everything, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, letting his requests be made known unto God, Phil. 4 : 6) must again worship the Lord, "bowing himself to the earth."

"In Everything" to "Give Thanks"

(I Thes. 5 : 18) was his common practice. The very next day, with Rebekah's full consent. Eleazar departed, taking the bride-elect and her nurse with him.

Such is God's account of a servant who was one of the noblest of men, one of God's true aristocracy! As simple and dependent as a child, he was, by the very presence of God with him, master among men. He acted under orders, yet commanded the respect due to a prince. And all this arose from his close and real communing with God about everything; he met circumstances and people in the conscious presence of God; he saw God greater than every difficulty, greater than Bethuel or Laban. God, with him, was always first, God always recognized. It is this which makes life, Christian life, a success. What does God will? What can God do? are the questions of a true man of God. The Lord Himself educate us to a life of service like that of Eleazar for His own eternal glory.

THE SERVICE.

"He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much."—LUKE. xvi., 10.

I cannot do great things for Him,
Who did so much for me;
But I would like to show my love,
Dear Jesus, unto thee;
Faithful in very little things,
O, Saviour, may I be.

There are small things in daily life
In which I may obey,
And thus may show my love to thee,
And always, every day,
There are some loving little words,
Which I for thee may say.

There are small crosses I may take,
Small burdens I may bear,
Small acts of faith, and deeds of love,
Small sorrows I may share,
And little bits of work for thee
I may do everywhere.

And so I ask thee, give me grace
My little place to fill,
That I may ever walk with thee,
And ever do thy will;
And in each duty, great or small,
I may be faithful still.

The Overturned City on the Hill—The Locality of the Disturbance—Sunset Cox's Description The Revelry of the Carnival—Distinguished Guests—The Battle of the Flowers—The General Alarm—The Track of the Tremor—Among the Falling Buildings—Personal Narratives.

THE appalling earthquake of Wednesday, February 23d, a brief account of which, with a picture of Nice, appeared in this journal last week, has been more clearly realized in its sad details as later reports have come in. It is now possible to form a more accurate idea of the extent of the calamity and its disastrous results. The following narrative, mainly compiled from the statements of survivors who were upon the scene, will interest our readers. With this we give on the first page a picture of the scene of havoc and destruction at Bajardo, the town on the hill at which the earthquake produced the most extraordinary effects. There, as correspondents state, the whole hill-side seemed to rise and cast forth the buildings erected upon it. Houses were raised from their foundations as if by some stupendous force beneath them, lifted bodily and hurled down into the valley. It was but a small place of fifteen hundred inhabitants, but it was a pretty town, picturesquely situated. At the first shock the people rushed in mad affright to the parish church, where they fell on their knees. The priests moved about trying in vain to calm their fears. Suddenly a severe shock caused the massive walls of the church to bulge, and in another moment the sacred edifice collapsed, burying beneath its ruins several hundred, of whom three hundred were killed or mutilated.

The Locality

affected by the disturbance is one of the most beautiful in Europe, a favorite resort of wealthy travellers in search of pleasure or health. It is known as the Genoese Riviera, and is on the borders of the Mediterranean Sea, partly in France and partly in Italy. It is best known to us in this country from the charming sketch written by the Hon. S. S. Cox, formerly United States Minister to Turkey, in his "Search for Winter Sunbeams."

A Scene of Gaiety

had just been witnessed there when the awful visitation occurred. Nice, especially, was crowded with visitors from America and all the nations of Europe. Many distinguished persons were there mixing with the crowds bent on amusement. The Prince of Wales, the King of Wurtemberg, and many princely and noble personages were participating in the festivities when suddenly the scene was changed from merriment to mourning and alarm. Not many hours before, the city had gone wild with hilarity over which is every year the great event of the carnival. Shortly after noon ladies of every nationality—Russian, Italian, French, English, American and German—with roses in their hair, bouquets on their bosoms, blossoms on their parasols, and carrying baskets of flowers, enter the carriages. These are to be the chariots of the mimic warfare and are already loaded down with ammunition in the shape of baskets of flowers. It is a battle of colors, fragrance and beauty. The air is filled with the harmless missiles, that fall in showers upon the fair foes, amid laughter and shouts.

The Battle of Flowers,

The Battle of Flowers was carried on this year with more than ordinary enthusiasm, on account of the presence of the royalties. The evening following the contest was given up to dinners, balls and receptions, which continued, indeed, till the eve of Lent. On Tuesday night, the great night, fêtes were in full swing, lasting till early in the morning, and it was while the late revellers were on their way to their apartments that the first shock of the earthquake came. It was the most sensational ending to revelry that has, perhaps, ever been chronicled.

The Track of the Tremor.

The first shock was felt at Geneva at twenty minutes to six A.M. The next heard of was moving slightly south-westerly to Grenoble, reaching there at two minutes before six. Then it seemed to go over directly to the east, toward Turin and Milan, and south-easterly to Bologna. Thence south-westerly to Leghorn. The shocks seemed also to travel south-westerly from Grenoble, toward Avignon, then turning south-easterly to Marseilles and Toulon, where the clock stopped at three minutes past six. Then it travelled easterly to Cannes and Nice, reaching Cannes at five minutes past six, and Mentone at a quarter past. Thence it went around the Riviera di Ponente and Di Levente, passed Genoa in the horseshoe of the Gulf. The seismoscope set up in the Physical Laboratory at the United States Signal Office in Washington, D. C., was disturbed by, and accurately recorded at 7.30 A.M., 7.50 meridian time, the arrival of the earthquake. A rough calculation showing that it had travelled westward at the rate of about five hundred miles per hour.

Falling Buildings.

At Oneglia private houses and public buildings were brought to the ground. The Penitentiary was almost destroyed, and it is considered marvellous that the inmates should have escaped with their lives. The panic-stricken prisoners were all got out and spent the night in the court-yards of the jail, under the supervision of a strong guard. Afterward they were placed on board a ship for conveyance to the prison at Genoa.

It is feared that the victims along the northern coast will number no fewer than two thousand. Along the whole Riviera from Albissola to Nice, a stretch of coast one hundred miles in length, every town suffered considerably, with the single exception of Bordighiera, which escaped in a marvellous manner. The distress throughout the Italian Riviera is terrible. Those inhabitants who remain are without means of gaining their livelihood. Business is at a standstill. The Government are doing their best for the poor people. Private benevolence is also being largely exercised. Three trains were promptly despatched to the districts, carrying food and medical appliances. Each train took, besides, a company of soldiers to assist in the distribution of relief and to restore confidence and order. The following give a better idea of the terrestrial agitation than would any other description. A European correspondent of the New York Herald received the following from Mr. G. H. Sloane, who was at Nice when the shock occurred: "My wife, my child and myself only arrived at Nice a few days ago. We stopped at the Terminus Hotel. All of us were sound asleep when, early on Wednesday morning, we were aroused by a fearful rumbling noise and a motion like the swaying of a ship in a heavy, rolling sea. Then came a tremendous lurch, and we were all tossed out of our beds on to the floor. The wardrobe and the rest of the furniture all tumbled over and the clock slid from the mantelpiece on to the floor. I exclaimed, 'This is an earthquake. Our time is come. Let us all go together.' In a few seconds the swaying motion ceased, and we ran into the street. Just as we had escaped down came the whole hotel. How nobody was injured seems a miracle.

"The sight of the panic-stricken crowds in the streets is one I shall never forget. We waited all day at the railway station, where people half clad were lying on the platforms. The rush and crush to get into the trains is impossible to describe. People were kept two days waiting to get into a train, sleeping on the platforms, with the tickets in their pockets. Whenever a train came up crowds of men would rush right over the people, walking upon and trampling down women and children, causing many injuries. Soldiers, however, were soon on duty and are now keeping order."

Among the earthquake refugees who succeeded in escaping to Paris was Mr. Charles Einstein, of New York. He was asleep at the Grand Hôtel at Nice when the shock came. He said: "The first shock aroused me, and I thought it was another of those storms that lately raged along the Riviera. Then the second shock came. Although it lasted only thirty seconds it seemed as if it would never stop. I felt just as if I were seasick and tossing in my berth. Soon from all parts of the hotel. I rushed out of my room and found the long corridors filled with ladies in all sorts of déshabille. Some were in night-dresses only. They all made a desperate charge for the open, and soon reached the Place Masséna. None of them dared to re-enter the hotel, but sent back their servants for their clothing and dressed themselves as best they could in the open square."

Another eye-witness of the scene, Mr. Gillilan, of London, who was at San Remo with a party, among whom were several American ladies, says: "I was aroused by a shock in my room at San Remo. I leaped out of my bed and rushed to the corridor. As I staggered along, so that I could scarcely keep on my feet. Happily I found all my party safe and sound, except, of course, they were suffering from fright. On returning to my room I found the wall on the door side cracked from top to bottom. All the plaster had fallen from the ceiling, and the solid marble mantelpiece projected forward several inches. I decided to get out of San Remo as quick as possible. The east end of the town is almost wholly destroyed. There are ruins of fallen houses in every direction. The hotels in the west end are all more or less damaged. In San Remo itself there was but little loss of life, but the reticence of the authorities made it hard work to get at the truth."

The Floor Rocked Under Me

A Lady's Thrilling Escape

was graphically described by herself to the same correspondent. Mrs. Robert L. Cutting, Jr., who was staying at the Grand Hôtel, Nice, had been one of the leaders of fashionable society in the city. She states that she was awakened by a great shock. The first thing of which she became conscious was the falling of a large screen of eight panels, closely followed by a fall of plaster and wood from the ceiling. Luckily the mosquito-net over the bed was strong enough to protect her. She was tossed from one side of her bed against the wall and then thrown on the floor. To use her own expression, she "Thought the Resurrection was Come."

Rushing to the door of her room she tried the handle, but the door was jammed. She next tried her sitting-room door, climbing over the furniture of the room, which was scattered in all directions. That being also jammed, and realizing her terrible imprisonment, she screamed with all her might until she heard a gentleman next door say, "Come out! There's been an earthquake and the hotel is falling down." Shortly afterward some gentlemen in the corridor broke in the door and she escaped into the corridor with nothing on but her night-dress.

Diamonds Abandoned.

On the first floor landing she found about a hundred persons in a similar state of undress crowding the stairs. She was assisted down by a gentleman, who complimented her on her courage, but on reaching the square she fainted. On recovery she remained in the open air till half-past eight, when, being somewhat recovered, she went up to her room to obtain clothing. She dressed herself hurriedly and then remembered her diamonds, which on the first hurried exit she had forgotten. Just as she grasped them in her hand another shock came. She dropped the bag containing the diamonds and rushed down-stairs, leaving the jewelry behind her. She was fortunately able to hire a closed carriage, in which she bivouacked until she got away from Nice.

A Californian's Experience.

"It was a few minutes to six," said Colonel T. Dash, a friend of Mr. Mackay's from California, "when I felt the first shock. I was in bed at the time, in a room on the third floor of the Hôtel de France. I heard men and women screaming and groaning all around me. The screams seemed to be half-suppressed, as if those who gave utterance to them could not get the sound out properly. Then I heard people rushing out of their rooms on to the landings. They were all in their night-gowns. Of course I did not get up, for we Californians are somewhat used to earthquakes. I turned round on my side and waited for, as it seemed to me, the best part of a minute, till the house righted itself. The vibration ceased, but the commotion was so great that it literally made me sick.

A Terrific Shock.

"The shock was far greater than any I had previously known, even at San Francisco in 1856. I lay still and watched my field glasses fall down but I was not hurt. When I went out I saw crowds of people flocking to the beach and station. That night hundreds slept in bathing-machines."

Another visitor says: "I was returning home from a small social gathering when the shock took place. It seemed to me as if the road suddenly became a huge earthworm and was creeping in a direction opposite to the one in which I was going. It was a very queer impression, and not a bit like that experienced when on the deck of a ship at sea. However, there was a curious swaying of the palm-trees along the Promenade des Anglais which was like the movement of a boat in the swell of a steamer.

Children Forgotten.

"I should fancy the shock lasted twenty seconds. Ground-floor windows were thrown open, and a general stampede from the houses took place. I saw very few mothers with children in their arms. Perhaps the little things were forgotten in their cots, and the earthquake did not disturb them."

The Prince of Wales, who had been at Nice to take part in the festivities of the carnival, had left the city for Cannes, his favorite Continental resort, a day or two before the earthquake. He did not, however, wholly escape the effects of the shock. At Cannes there was the awful rumbling, which no one who has once heard it can ever forget, and the sickening tremor, far more trying than the tossing of a ship at sea. The Prince, however, preserved his equanimity with the imperturbable manner which distinguishes him. When the earthquake shocks were felt his attendants implored him to leave the house. The Prince replied, "Since the shocks are over and the hotel is not falling, I prefer to remain where I am—in bed."

The consternation and panic were evidently very general. Two of the facts observed as mentioned above give the most convincing proof that they were so. That a fashionable lady should abandon her diamonds, and that mothers should save themselves and leave their children to perish, shows that no treasure was so precious as to overcome, at that dread moment, personal distress and agitation. A vague, undefinable dread, a sensation of horror and utter helplessness were the predominant feelings of each heart, monopolizing and exhausting every other emotion. It was a scene of panic and wild terror, a picture in miniature of that coming earthquake—"so mighty and so great as was not since men were upon the earth,"—(Rev. 16: 18) which is to level mountains, blot the islands out of existence, and overthrow the cities of the nations. That earthquake which will be the last and greatest of the three to occur during the final throes of this dispensation will not be limited in its destructive force nor in its area. The time is now near at hand. The signs that appear in every direction are conspicuous to all who heed our Saviour's warnings (Matt. 24), and who are not among those "foolish virgins" who cannot "discern the signs of the times," and who fail to recognize in these events "the earthquakes in divers places" which Christ predicted as a sign to precede His Second Advent.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Wreck of a Young Man.—Mr. Glen said at a recent meeting: "A promising young man went to Glasgow, and apprenticed himself to a house in that city. He was in a fair way to success, and could speak freely on any subject of religion. But a worldly young man, who was employed in the same house, gained an influence over him, spoiled his Christian character, and by and by he became the wretched slave of strong drink. Now, with shattered health, and a ruined reputation, he is wandering about looking for employment. Oh, beware of sin!"

Lost in a Snowstorm.—Mr. R. B. Stewart said: "A party of eleven men ascended a mountain without a guide. The snow came on and they lost their way. After the severe storm had passed, their friends, who had been anxiously awaiting them, went up the mountain to try and find them. But not until after a long and wearisome search did they come upon the eleven bodies of the men lying nearly buried in the snow. In the pocket of one of the men they found a piece of paper with the words, 'We have been lost in the snow, for we cannot find the path, and we have lain down to die.' How many there are dying on the mountains of unbelief unable to find the path to God!"

The Drunkard's Legacy.—Mr. Glen Observed: "In the village where I was brought up, there lived a mother and father with their three sons and one daughter. The parents, unfortunately, were given to strong drink, and were scarcely ever known to be a day sober. The eldest son began to follow in the ways of his father. That wretched man was found in bed one morning quite dead through the effects of strong drink; a few months afterward his wife died in her chair, with a bottle of whiskey by her side. This was the legacy they left their children; who all made good use of it. Instead of the sudden death of their parents being a warning to them, they seemed to indulge more freely in sin than ever. One Saturday night the eldest brother left the house helplessly inebriated. He staggered on for a few yards through the darkness, but being unable to go farther he lay down by the roadside. A horse, which was grazing in a park not far from the spot where he lay, became startled, and set off at a gallop down the road, and the iron-shod hoofs in passing struck the young man's forehead. In a few hours he was dead. The two younger brothers followed closely in his footsteps, and their sister, the last, the youngest of the family, is today worse than a drunkard."

A Story of Diamond Discovery.—An Earnest worker remarked: "At the Cape of Good Hope, where there are now so many diamond fields, one listens with curiosity to the story of their discovery. A farmer in the interior while walking over his farm one day, came upon a curious stone; he picked it up, looked at it, and took it home to the children to play with. He afterward found others like it, which he also took home. A stranger passing a night at the farmer's house was attracted by the sparkle of the stones, and having a little knowledge of such things, tried to get them from the farmer; but the farmer refused to give him them, as the children were very fond of them; but when the stranger offered him twenty-five hundred dollars for the biggest of them, he parted with it gladly. The stranger took it to the chief town of the Cape, and there sold it at a profit to a firm of jewelers for fifty thousand dollars, who in their turn sold it for a hundred thousand. Soon the fame of this find went abroad, and men thronged from all parts, enticed by the hope, in many cases the vain hope, of picking up a fortune at one stroke. The land all round the farm was bought up, and diamonds found to be very plentiful. Even the farm buildings were taken down and diamonds found in the mud walls. In much the same way as the children played with these precious stones, not knowing their value, do unconverted people sometimes deal with the precious truths of God's Word. They will dispute about them, quibble, and even joke about them, but not knowing their value they do not apply them to their own souls."

Visit to a Blind Highland Woman.—The Rev. Mr. MacGregor observed: "When I was in the Highlands I was asked to call upon a poor blind woman who was suffering from want. When I arrived at her wretched hovel, I recognized her as one whom I had known many years previous, then a bright young Scotch girl, whom fortune had smiled upon, and with her eyesight perfectly good. I was grieved to see such a change, and on inquiring what caused her blindness, she said: 'My blindness came on very gradually. I first began to notice that I could not see so far as I used to do, and one morning when looking from the window I could only see across the road. As time went on I could see no further than the mantelpiece, and at length I had to grope my way about the room; and now, no one knows what darkness means but one who has experienced the darkness of sightlessness.' As she concluded her sad story, I thought that was just like spiritual blindness. Some sin comes and gradually the spiritual blindness that falls upon backsliders. A sin cherished and loved blunts the spiritual perceptions and darkness falls that only the Word of Christ can lighten."

The Devil on a Visit.—Mr. Marsh said: "I remember speaking down in Cornwall, to an old man who had but recently been converted to Christ, and this is what he told me: 'Soon after my conversion the devil came up to the door of my heart, and knocked to get in; but I said to him, "No, Satan, you can't get in here; the Lord Jesus lives here now, and there is no room for you." "But," said Satan, "I am only here on a complimentary visit, to see how you are getting on. I have no intention of staying; I just thought I would give you a look in." "No," I answered, "you were too long here before, and you'll never get in again, so you may just as well go away at once."' And the old man said: 'The devil tried hard to persuade me to let him in, and when he saw persuasion was of no avail, he tried threatenings, issuing his orders as before and expecting obedience; but I was no longer his slave, and under his rule, and being safe under the protecting power of Christ, I could bid defiance to him and all his works.' We cannot keep from being tempted, but we can keep from succumbing to temptation; we cannot prevent birds alighting on our heads, but we can prevent their building nests there."

An Irishman's Valuable Discovery.—Mr. Calder observed: "Not long ago I was in Belfast, and while there addressed an open-air meeting, from the text in which Paul tells the Roman officer that he was born free. There were many Roman Catholics in the crowd, and some of our people were afraid I might be assaulted. So, when one large and fierce-looking Irishman began to force his way toward me, the crowd closed in to keep him back. But I said, 'Don't hinder him; let him come forward, and I'll be glad to meet him and have a talk with him.' My friends reluctantly gave way, and the great Irishman strode forward. When he reached my side, he raised his hand, not to strike me, as some expected, but to shake mine. 'You have told the truth this night, sir; that you have,' he said. 'We poor Catholics, like that centurion, buy our privilege, our salvation, with a great price; but you Protestants somehow or other seem to get it for nothing by going to the Lord Jesus and being born free.' I invited him to come to our meeting, and he consented, but at the door he faltered. An awe seemed to come over him, and he scarcely knew whether to advance or retreat. Then I who was beside him said, 'Come in and hear how to go right to Jesus Himself, and there at the fountain-head receive salvation full and free without money and without price; and then if you wish you can go back to the Catholic Church.' He came in, and at the conclusion of the service he was rejoicing in a new-found Saviour."

FOUR FULL REGIMENTS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, March 7, 1887.

"And four thousand praised the Lord."—1 CHRON. 23 : 5.

"This day shall be unto you for a memorial."—EXODUS 12 : 14.

[THIS was Sacramental day in the Brooklyn Tabernacle, and the sermon was preached at the reception of three hundred and forty-seven new members, making six hundred and ninety received during the present revival, so that the communicant membership now is four thousand and fifty-one. Dr. Talmage gave the right hand of fellowship to the new members, and baptized about ninety. There was a great arch of flowers over the pulpit, containing the words: "I believe in the communion of saints."]

When, week before last, the communicant membership of this church passed into the four thousand, now reaching four thousand and fifty-one, the first part of my text came to my mind, and I bethought myself what a grand thing it would be if the four thousand of our communicant membership would, like the four thousand of the ancient Temple, make it their lifetime business to praise the Lord. Let them all take harp and timbrel and anthem and doxology!

The allusion of my second text is to the Passover, which commemorated the deliverance of the children of Israel on the night when the destroying angel sped through the land of Egypt, destroying the enemy, but saving the Israelites, because on the door-posts of their dwellings was sprinkled the blood of a lamb. To-day we come to celebrate all peril going away from our soul at the sight of the sprinkled blood of the Lamb of God on the door-posts of our hearts. Christ, our Passover, sacrificed for us. "This day shall be unto you for a memorial."

The Sacramental Sabbath, whether it comes in an American church or an English chapel or a Scotch kirk, is more impressive than any other Sabbath. Its light is holier, calmer, sweeter; its voices more tender; its touch is softer; its memories are more chastened. The fruits of the Christian life suddenly ripen, like orchards on the hill fronting the South. The wine of the Holy Sacrament seems pressed from the grapes of celestial vineyards, and the bread broken seems to drop from the hand of Him who parted the loaves for the five thousand. We walk to the church of God with more thoughtful face and with quieter step. The jubilant songs of other Sundays are struck through with pensiveness and are all a-tremble with tears; and when, at the close of the service, at the door we shake hands, it is with a more cordial grasp, because we feel thrilling through our body and mind and soul the great doctrines of and our minds go back to our forefathers celebrating the Sacrament in times of persecution in Scotland among the Highlands; commemorating the dying love of Christ, while they were pursued of their enemies, pouring the wine into rough wooden cups, dipping the waters of baptism from the mountain rock, until one day they heard the voices of their enemies coming up the hill, and the pastor cried out: "Oh Lord, the Shepherd, have mercy on the sheep!" and instantly there was a roaring heard, as of great floods, and sure enough a cloud had burst, and there were great torrents running down the mountain-side that whelmed their foes with sudden wrath. What a deliverance it was for them on that Sacramental day! Oh, that on this Sacramental day the cloud of God's mercy might burst and our sins be whelmed and our souls be saved! This is the amethyst of days. This is the pearl of days. This is the diamond of days. This is the day of days. Among the ten thousand million ages of eternity the first Sabbath of March, 1887, will be to you significant and memorable, for "this day shall be unto you" forever and forever "a memorial."

There is much in the scene of to-day to impress us, because it is

A Time of Re-enforcement.

I used to remark that if I ever lived to see our membership reach four thousand I thought I would be willing to say with one of old: "Now, Lord, lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation." But I have changed my mind, and I never so much wanted to stay as now, so as to see them all enlisted for God and to watch their victories. What might they not accomplish in the way of making the world better if they were all baptized with a double portion of the Holy Ghost!

Four thousand! That is four full regiments, as military men count a thousand to a regiment. I think not one hypocrite among them. Taken into the church sometimes in large numbers, but each one as carefully examined as to change of heart and evidence of regeneration as though he or she were the only one presenting himself or herself. Many of our former members have passed away into the skies, and have joined the church triumphant, but we have four thousand and more left for the church militant. To arms! Quit you like men!

We Want No Reserve

corps among them. Go into action all of you. Some will be officers, and command. Some will make cavalry charge. Some will be sharpshooters. Some will stand guard. Some will be on picket duty. Many of you will belong to the rank and file. Let there be no stragglers, none off on furlough, not one deserter. With Christ for commander-in-chief, and the one-starred blood-striped banner of manger and cross to lead the way, I give the order that the general in the war gave, when rising in his stirrups, his hair flying in the wind, he cried out till all the host heard him: "Forward! the whole line!"

There is also something in such a scene to deeply impress one, because it

Rehearses a Death Scene.

Now, you know, there is something very touching in such an incident. Though you are in a hotel and it is a stranger that is dying, how softly you move about the place, and if you come up to his couch it is with uncovered head. Even the voice of the jester is stopped, and when the eyes of that stranger are closed it is with emotion. But I am to tell you this morning of a death such as has never before or since occurred.

When we die, we die for ourselves, and the crisis is alleviated by all beneficent ministries. Bathings for the hands; bathings for the head; bathings for the feet; the light turned down low or set in just the right place; all the offices of affection about us when we come to die. But not so with Jesus. He died not for Himself, but He died in torment, and He died for others. He might have moved around in gardens made by His own hand, an earthly potentate amid vineyards and olive groves sloping to the sea. Instead of being tossed in the fishing boat on Tiberius He might have chosen a sunshiny day and a pleasant wave for the lake crossing. Instead of being followed by an unwashed rabble He might have charmed sanhedrims and universities with His eloquence. Instead of a cross and a bunch of twisted brambles on His brow He might have died in the castle of a Roman merchant, the air bland with lilies and frankincense. But no; He died in torture; the good for the bad; the kind for the cruel; the wise for the ignorant; the divine for the human.

Oh, how tenderly we feel toward any one who has done a great kindness, and perhaps at the imperilling of his own life! How we ought to feel toward Christ, the Captain of salvation, on the white horse riding down our foes; but in the moment He made the victorious charge, the lances of death struck Him!

There was a very touching scene in the last century. It seemed that one of the chieftains had slain a man belonging to an opposite tribe, and that tribe came up and said, "We will exterminate you unless you surrender the man who committed that crime." The chieftain who did the crime stepped out from the ranks, and said, "I am not afraid to die, but I have a wife and four children, and I have a father aged and a mother aged, whom I support by hunting, and I sorrow to leave them helpless." Just as he said that his old father from behind stepped out, and said, "He shall not die. I take his place. I am old and well-stricken in years. I can do no good. I might as well die. My days are almost over. He cannot be spared. Take me." And they accepted the sacrifice.

Among an Indian Tribe

Wonderful sacrifice! you say, but not so wonderful as that found in the Gospel, for we deserved to die—aye, we were sentenced when Christ, not worn-out with years, but in the flush of His youth, said, "Save that man from going down to the pit; I am the ransom. Put his burdens on My shoulders. Let his stripes fall on My back. Take My heart for his heart. Let Me die that he may live." Shall it be told to-day in heaven that notwithstanding all those wounds, and all that blood, and all those tears, and all that agony, you would not accept Him?

"Was it for crimes that I had done
He groaned upon the tree?
Amazing pity, grace unknown,
And love beyond degree."

There is no woe amid the surroundings of that scene that impresses me more than that of

His Own Mother.

You need not point her out to me. I can see by the sorrow, the anguish, the woe, by the upthrown hands. That all means mother. "Oh," you say, "why didn't she go down to the foot of the hill and sit with her back to the scene? It was too horrible for her to look upon." Do you not know when a child is in anguish or trouble it always makes a heroine of a mother? Take her away, you say, from the cross. You cannot drag her away. She will keep on looking; as long as her son breathes she will stand there looking. Oh, what a scene it was for a tender-hearted mother to look upon! How gladly she would have sprung to His relief! It was her son—her son! How gladly she would have clambered up on the cross and hung there herself, if her son could have been relieved! How strengthening she would have been to Christ if she might have come close by Him, and soothed Him! Oh, there was a good deal in what the little sick child said upon whom of a painful nature must be performed! The doctor said, "That child won't live through this operation unless you encourage him. You go in and get his consent." The father told him all the doctor said, and added, "Now, John, will you go through with it? Will you consent to it?" He looked very pale, and he thought a minute, and said, "Yes, father, if you will hold my hand I will." So the father held his hand, and led him straight through the peril. Oh woman, in your hour of anguish, whom do you want with you? Mother. Young man, in your hour of trouble, whom do you want to console you? Mother. If the mother of Jesus could only have taken those bleeding feet into her lap! If she might have taken the dying head on her bosom! If she might have said to Him, "It will soon be over, Jesus; it will soon be over, and we will meet again, and it will be all well." But no, she dared not come up so close. They would have struck her back with their hammers. They would have kicked her down the hill. There can be at all. Jesus must suffer and Mary must look. I suppose she thought of the birth-hour in Bethlehem. I suppose she thought of the time when, with her boy in her bosom, she hastened on in the darkness in the flight toward Egypt. I suppose she thought of His boyhood, when He was the joy of her heart. I suppose she thought of the thousand kindnesses He had done her, not forsaking her or forgetting her, even in His last moment, but turning to John and saying, "There is mother; take her with you. Behold thy mother!" She thought it all over, and there is no memory like a mother's memory, and there is no woe like a mother's woe.

I remark, this is a tender scene, because it is

A Christian Reunion.

Why was it that in the sessional meeting, when I asked a woman if it were her son who sat next to her, making profession of his faith, she made no answer; but after a moment, trying to control her emotion, she burst into tears. I said within myself, she need not tell me the story. It is the old story of a prodigal got back. "The dead is alive again, and the lost is found." Oh, how many families there are that rejoice together to-day!

These Christians during the rest of the year, perhaps, will not know much about each other. You go in one circle of society, these go in some other circle of society, and this one travels in that path, and this one the other path; but to-day we all come on one platform, and we make one confession, and we cling to one cross, and we gaze upon one death anguish. It seems to me this morning not like a church, but like and we join hands around the cross of Christ, and we say, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one cross, one Christ, one doxology, one heaven!" While I stand here it seems to me as if this communion table, which is only seven or eight feet long and three or four feet wide, widens until all the Christians of our own denomination can sit at it; and still the table widens until all the Christians in this land of all names and denominations come and sit at it; and still the table widens until it bridges the sea, and Christians on the other side of the Atlantic come and sit at it; and still that table widens until the redeemed of heaven mingle in the communion; Church militant; church triumphant.

> "One army of the living God,
> To His command we bow;
> Part of the host have crossed the flood,
> And part are crossing now."

Again, my friends, this is an absorbing scene, because it arouses so many precious memories. We look back and remember the days of our childhood, when, long before we knew the meaning of the bread and the wine, we sat in the side pews on Sacramental days, or in the galleries, and looked as our fathers, mothers, and older brothers and sisters sat at the communion. Or, if we sat with them, we pulled at mother's dress and said, "What does that mean? What is that in the cup? What is that on the plate?" Oh, yes; we remember those Sacramental days of our boyhood. We remember how much more tender father was on that day than on any other day. We remember how mother stood, and without saying one word looked at us, and her eyes got full of tears. Oh, the dear old soul! They have gone! But until the day of our death we will associate this holy ordinance with their memory. And when our work on earth is done we will just go up and sit down beside them in the heavenly church, and then we will drink new wine in our Father's kingdom.

> "Behold the saints, beloved of God,
> Washed are their robes in Jesus' blood;
> Brighter than angels, lo, they shine;
> Their glories splendid and sublime."

I remark again, this scene is tender to-day, because it is

A Confessional.

You and I remember the time when if a man had charged us with anything like imperfection or wrongdoing, we would have thrown ourselves back on our honor, and said, "You don't know whom you are talking to. I shall resent such an insult to my honor and integrity." We do not feel that way to-day. As we gaze upon the sacrifice of Christ, and think of what we have been and what we have done, our hearts melt within us. We see one dying accursed for our sin, and we hear Him in His dying words begging for our service, and yet how little service we have rendered! Of this short life we have begrudged God even a fragment. Alas! Alas! Some of us have lived out the most of our days, and yet we have rendered to God no earnest service. Sad, that we could have so maltreated Him on whom all our hopes depend. Oh, my brethren and sisters in Christ, to-day join hands with me in a confession before Christ! If there be any place more humble than another, let us take it. If there be any prayer more importunate than another, let us breathe it. If there be any confession more bitter than another, let us now weep it out.

> "Well might the sun in darkness hide
> And shut his glories in,
> When Christ, the mighty Maker, died
> For man, the creature's sin."

Once more, this is a tender scene, because

It is Anticipative.

My brethren, we are not always going to stay here. This is not our home. This is only the vestibule of the church in which, at last, we expect to enter. After awhile our names will be taken off the church books, or there will be a mark in the margin, to indicate that we have gone up to a better church and to a higher communion. Our Father is not going to let His children remain in the dust. The grave is no place for us to stay in. "The trumpet shall sound and the dead shall rise." The Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout and the voice of the archangel, and we shall rise. The white robe in which they put us to our last slumber here must get whiter. Oh, the reunion of patriarchs, and apostles, and prophets, and of all our glorified kindred, and of that "great multitude that no man can number!" Our sorrows over. Our journey ended. It will be as when kings banquet. And just as the snow of winter melts, and the fields will brighten in the glorious springtime, so it will be with all these cold sorrows of earth; they shall be melted away at last before the warm sunshine of heaven.

While I present these thoughts this morning, does it not seem that heaven comes very near to us, as though our friends, whom we thought a great way off, are not in the distance, but close by? You have sometimes come down to a river at nightfall, and you have been surprised how easily you could hear Voices Across the River.

You shouted over to the other side of the river, and they shouted back. It is said that when George Whitefield preached in Third Street, Philadelphia, one evening time, his voice was heard clear across to the New Jersey shore. When I was a little while chaplain in the army, I remember how at even-tide we could easily hear the voices of the pickets across the Potomac, just when they were using ordinary tones. And as we come to-day and stand by the river of Jordan that divides us from our friends who are gone, it seems to me we stand on one bank and they stand on the other; and it is only a narrow stream, and our voices go and their voices come. Hark! Hush! I hear distinctly what they say, "These are they who come out of great tribulation, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." Still the voice comes across the waters, and I hear: "We hunger no more, we thirst no more; neither shall the sun light on us, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne leads us to living fountains of water; and God wipeth away all tears from our eyes."

II. The 2,500 Years

is a period of fifty Jubilees—that is to say, fifty times 50 years—at the end of which the great Jubilee of Jubilees will be fulfilled. The last Jubilee that was observed, appears to have been at the time of the Great Passover that was kept in Josiah's reign (II Chron. 35 : 19), and his reign ended about B.C. 600. Soon afterward the 70 years' Captivity of the Jews commenced, and they have never kept another Jubilee since. Thus the 2,500 years, dated from the end of Josiah's reign, about B. C. 600, will terminate about A.D. 1900, when we may expect, at Christ's descent on earth, the great Jubilee trumpet to be blown, and millennial liberty and happiness to be universally established.

In addition to this period of fifty Jubilees, or 2,500 years, there is another period of seventy Jubilees or 3,500 years, of which Elliott in his "Horæ Apocalypticæ" says, in his concluding chapter: "Seventy years marked the length of Israel's waiting-time for the redemption from Babylon, and seventy weeks of years the time of its further waiting for its primary redemption by the First Advent of Christ. So seventy Jubilees may define the mystical period of Israel's whole existence as a people, from the Exodus to the epoch of both the natural and the spiritual Israel's perfect redemption at the Second Advent of Christ." Hence these 3,500 years of seventy Jubilees (each Jubilee being 50 years) commencing with the epoch of Moses' mission and the Exodus about the period B.C. 1600, will terminate about the year A.D. 1900.

III. The 2,520 Years.

This period is spoken of in Leviticus 26 : 18, 19, 24, 28, and Daniel 4 : 16, as seven times or years ; a year is reckoned in the Bible to consist of 360 days literally, and in the symbolic year-day fulfilment 360 years. Therefore, seven times denotes seven mutiplied into 360 years, which gives 2,520 years. This period was to measure the duration of the chastisement of the Jewish nation for their disobedience, and the duration of the Four Gentile Empires represented by Nebuchadnezzar's image which were to inflict the chastisement throughout the Times of the Gentiles.

These 2,520 years have two fulfilments—ending respectively about A.D. 1825 and 1900—primarily from about B.C. 695, the epoch of the carrying of the ten tribes of Israel into captivity in Assyria by Shalmaneser the Assyrian king, after Hoshea's reign, as stated in II., and thus the 2,520 years end about A.D. 1825, the close of the French revolutionary epoch, when Jewish emancipation commenced—leaving the interval of 75 years—the extension of the 1,335 beyond the 1,260 years in Daniel 12 : 7, 12—to elapse before the end of this age in A.D. 1900—and secondarily from about B.C. 620, the full establishment of the Empire of Babylon, in the reign of the father of Nebuchadnezzar to whom Daniel said, Thou art the head of gold (Daniel 2 : 38), and thus the 2,520 years reach from B.C. 620 to A.D. 1900 as the end of the Times of the Gentiles, represented in their whole length by the Prophetic Image prefiguring the four Gentile Empires of Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome. It is remarkable that 2,520 solar years are exactly 75 years longer than 2,520 lunar years.

Nebuchadnezzar's maniacy during the literal seven times or seven years as described in Daniel 4 : 16, 25, typified the heathen aberration from God of the four Gentile monarchies during the mystical seven times or 2,500 years. And as Nebuchadnezzar became like a wild beast during those seven years, so the four Empires are prefigured throughout their mystical "seven times" as four wild beasts, a lion, bear, leopard, and ten-horned beast, indicating their godless, rapacious, destructive character ; and his subsequent conversion prefigures their conversion after Christ's Second Advent. Nebuchadnezzar in his vision saw them under the semblance of a human monarch, but the prophet Daniel viewed them more correctly as wild beasts.

IV. The 2,300 Years,

Daniel 8 : 13, 14, extend from B.C. 445 to A.D. 1855-6 leaving an interval of 45 years (the excess of the 1,335 beyond the 1,290 years) to elapse from 1855-6 to the end of this age in 1900. The question was asked in Daniel's eighth chapter, "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice and the transgression of desolation to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" The reply was given, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days ; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." This signifies that the whole period of 2,300 years (in the year-day fulfilment) was to be occupied in its earlier portion by the restoration of the daily sacrifice in a restored temple (which Nehemiah accomplished B.C. 445 more than 100 years after this vision was given) and in its later portion by the treading under foot of the Jewish sanctuary and daily sacrifice (by Mohammedans for 1,260 lunar years from A.D. 635-6 to 1856).

The commencement of these 2,300 years is absolutely fixed by the angel Gabriel appearing to Daniel (as recorded in Daniel's ninth chapter (verses 21-23), and stating that he came to give him understanding of "the vision" of the ram and he-goat connected with the 2,300 years which had been shown in the preceding eighth chapter about fifteen years earlier. Gabriel then explained that Seventy weeks of years, i.e., 490 years are "determined" (or "cut off," as the Hebrew verb signifies) "upon thy people and upon thy holy city," i.e., cut off from the commencing part of the 2,300 years (so Dr. Hales and various other expositors understand it), and thus the 2,300 years and the 70 weeks are foreshown to commence at one and the same time, namely, at King Artaxerxes' decree to Nehemiah to restore and rebuild Jerusalem. Because Gabriel proceeded to explain : "Know therefore and understand that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem unto Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks (i.e., 69 weeks of years or 483 years) ; and after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for Himself."

It has been shown by sundry expositors that the above-mentioned commandment or decree to restore and build Jerusalem was given by the Persian King Artaxerxes in the twentieth year of his reign, B.C. 445, to Nehemiah as narrated in Nehemiah's second chapter. Thus 69 weeks of years, i.e., 483 years, commencing B.C. 445 ended, of course, in A.D. 38, which seems to have been the year of Messiah riding into Jerusalem as a Royal Prince a few days before He was cut off at His crucifixion (Luke 19 : 38).

Hence the 2,300 years beginning at the same time as the 483 years, which were stated to be cut off from its commencing part, necessarily began also in 445 Before Christ and consequently ended in 1855-6 Anno Domini because A.D. 1855 added to B.C. 445 amounts to 2,300.

The Crimean War Treaty ended the 2,300 years in 1855-6.

Now it is most remarkable that in A.D. 1855-6, the event which, according to Daniel 8 : 14, was to constitute the ending of the 2,300 years, namely, the "cleansing of the sanctuary" of the Holy Land did measurably and in a certain figurative sense come to pass.* The Crimean War of 1853 to 1855-6 between Russia and Turkey aided by England and France, resulted after the fall of Sebastopol in the autumn of 1855 in a Treaty of Peace in February, 1856, in which the Sultan of Turkey, yielding to the pressure of its allies, England and France, embodied an edict of religious toleration and liberty of worship ; and the Sultan forthwith gave effect to this by publishing throughout Turkey a Hatti Scheriff placing Jews and Christians on an equality with Mohammedans, and allowing them to purchase land in Palestine and other parts of Turkey and removing all religious restrictions. Thus full liberty for religious worship was granted, constituting the initial cleansing of the sanctuary. One result is that subsequently many Jews have returned to Palestine.

The European revolutions of 1848 to 1852 led to this initial cleansing of the sanctuary of the Holy Land from the persecuting power of the Mohammedan abomination of desolation in 1855-6, because they raised Louis Napoleon to the throne of France, and according to Kinglake's History of the Crimean War, Louis Napoleon's policy led to the dispute between France and Russia about the protectorship of the Holy Places in Jerusalem which was the cause of the Crimean War and all this ended in this Treaty of Peace and of Religious Toleration in 1856. The same European revolutions in 1848-52 led to the initiated cleansing of the sanctuary of European Christendom from the persecuting power of the Papal abomination of desolation, by the temporary expulsion of the Pope from Rome and the shaking of Papacy's temporal power throughout Europe.

Berick's and Burnham's Prediction beforehand of the Ending of the 2,300 years in the Spring of 1856 verified.

It is remarkable that the Rev. F. H. Berick, of Lowell, Massachusetts, foretold two years beforehand the ending of the 2,300 years in the spring of 1856 in a prophetic book of 383 pages, published in 1854 in Boston, called "The Lord Soon to Come," in which he said : "The Jews had offered sacrifices under the administration of Ezra, but the temple-worship where the daily sacrifice was regularly presented was not fully restored until the completion of the walls of Jerusalem, and according to Josephus of the temple under Nehemiah B.C. 445. Now as the 2,300 years commence with the restoration of the daily sacrifice according to Daniel 8 : 14, which we thus find to have taken place under Nehemiah B.C. 445, they will terminate in A.D. 1855 or at the latest in the spring of 1856."

Elder E. Burnham's exposition of the 2,300 years and 70 weeks published in America previous to 1854, is quoted at considerable length in the above-mentioned book of the Rev. F. H. Berick. Elder Burnham, like many other expositors, maintains that Gabriel stated in Daniel's ninth chapter (verses 21-23) that he came to explain the vision respecting the 2,300 years in Daniel's eighth chapter, and that 70 weeks were to be determined or cut off from the commencing part of those 2,300 years, and were to commence with the going forth of a command-

* Of course, in its future literal-day fulfilment, the 2,300 days, as literal days, will commence with the restoration of the daily sacrifice in a restored Jewish temple (about 8 months and 10 days after the date of the Jewish covenant) and will end at the same time as the 1,290 days with the "cleansing of the sanctuary" of the Jewish Temple from the abomination of desolation at the distance of 45 days before the End of this Age (the 45 days being the excess of the 1,335 days beyond the 1,290 days in Daniel 12 : 11, 12.)

ment to restore and build Jerusalem, which undoubtedly was the decree granted by Nehemiah "according to the united voice of all reliable history" in B.C. 445. Mr. Burnham said: "These 445 years taken out of 2,300 years leave 1,855. But it will require all of these 1,855 years A.D. to make up 2,300 full years according to Bliss's Chronology. Well but Artaxerxes' commandment went forth in the month Nisan, as stated in Nehemiah 2 : 1, that is, in the spring, in our March or April B.C. 445. So the 2,300 full years extend from the spring of B.C. 445 to the spring of A.D. 1856."

A.D. 38-9 the True date of Christ's Crucifixion.

Elder Burnham likewise maintained that the 69 weeks of years or 483 years which are specified in Daniel 9 : 25 to commence with the going forth of that commandment to rebuild Jerusalem B.C. 445, must, of course, have ended in A.D. 38–9, and that therefore the cutting off of Messiah which was predicted to take place after the 69 weeks must have taken place about A.D 38–9. He observes that some of the primitive writers state the date of Christ's crucifixion to have been A.D. 38 to upward of A.D. 40.

The late Duke of Manchester, in his learned Chronology (on pages 415–18 and 388–90), maintained that the seven weeks, i.e., 49 years, commenced about B.C. 443–5, at the founding of the Jewish Temple, and ended B.C. 396–7, at its completed rebuilding. Then regarding the subsequent threescore and two weeks, i.e., 434 years, "after which Messiah shall be cut off" (Daniel 9 : 25) the Duke says: "Sixty-two weeks of years from March B.C. 397 would bring us to March A.D. 38 for the Crucifixion, which were I guided by the Gospel history alone, is the very year I should fix upon for that event. At the same time I admit that according to the chronology regarding the Roman Emperors we cannot put the Crucifixion latter than A.D. 36. This, it is true, brings the Crucifixion to the latter part of the sixty-second week; but the prophecy is so minute, that I think we must look for an exact fulfilment in A.D. 38. This period of sixty-two weeks also terminates upon 'Messiah as Prince' or Leader; and therefore I conceive cannot be before His entry into Jerusalem as her King." The Duke mentions that the date of the Crucifixion is A.D. 38, according to the Chronicle of Anastasius, and A.D. 40, according to Epiphanius and Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem in the third century.

The Abbot Dionysius Exiguus, who first instituted in A.D. 532 the system of dating the Calendar of Time from Christ's birth, dated His birth four or five years too early. Strauchius maintained that year 532 to be really A.D. 527, and not A.D. 532, i.e., that Christ's birth was about the year 5 in the Christian Era, and therefore His Crucifixion about 38–9. At the age of 33 or 34, for we read in Luke that Christ began to be about 30 years old at the commencement of His public ministry.

Beale's Opinion as to the 2,300 Years Ending in 1855-6.

Charles Beales, in his voluminous "Armageddon" (3 vols.), published in 1858, said, in chapters 1 and 7: "Some commentators consider that this date of the 2,300 years should not only be associated with some marked event in the history of the Persian monarchs, but with some striking circumstance also in that of the Jewish nation, and consequently fix it at 445 B.C., the twentieth year of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, in which that monarch gave a permissive commission to Nehemiah to restore the city of Jerusalem. Now if the number 2,300 be made of full years, 2,300 years from 445 B.C. will bring us to A.D. 1856, the very year in which, in the month of February, the Sultan issued a decree (provided in the Treaty of Peace after the Crimean War) placing Jews and Christians on a political equality with Mohammedans, removing all religious restrictions, throwing open the Turkish dominions to European colonization, and opening the way for the return of the Jews—thus commencing the cleansing of the Jewish sanctuary from the 'treading down' by the Mohammedans. The Rev. W. G. Schauffler, American missionary in Constantinople, wrote in 1857 of this Decree or Hatti Scheriff, 'Translated into all the languages of Turkey and read to its various nations publicly, it has created a ferment never before witnessed in Turkey.'"

Preparatory Turkish Decrees of Toleration in 1844 and 1851 previous to 1855-6.

The way had been paved for gaining this Edict of religious toleration in Turkey by previous minor concessions, one of which was extorted from the Sultan by the five European Powers, England, France, Prussia, Austria, and Russia, on March 21st, 1844, for the abolition of the penalty of death to any Mohammedan who might become a Christian. The execution of two Mohammedans in 1843, who had become converted to Christianity, caused the Powers to interpose and to demand from the Sultan the following "Official Declaration" which he published: "The Sublime Porte engages to take effectual measures to prevent henceforth the execution and putting to death of the Christian who is an apostate from Mohammedan faith. March 21st, 1844."

The eminent Rev. E. Bickersteth, in his "Guide to the Prophecies," justly observed on this: "The date of this official declaration, March 21st, is remarkable, as being the first day of Nisan, the first sacred month of the Jews which commences the Jewish year. This year 1844, was also of the Mohammedan Calendar (which begins at the Hegira or Flight of Mahomet, A.D. 622), and so the closing year of the remarkable prophetical period of 1,260 years reckoned according to Mohammedan chronology in lunar years. A letter from Tangiers in Morocco, dated June 20th, 1844, given in the public journals, stated: 'It seems that the Moors have always had forebodings of this year. For a long time they had been exhorting each other to beware of the 1,260th year of the Hegira, i.e., A.D. 1844.'"

In September, 1845, the Sultan of Turkey granted a Firman for the building of a Christian church in Jerusalem—the first since the rise of Mohammedanism and in which the pure worship of God has ever since been maintained.

But in 1851–2, after the European revolutions of 1848 and 1849, the Sultan felt compelled to yield more concessions to the march of Liberal political ideas among the nations, especially as the Emperor Louis Napoleon was demanding a French protectorate over the so-called Christian Holy Places in Jerusalem. The London Examiner of Jan. 3d, 1852, said: "Accounts have arrived by the Levant mail of December 14th, 1851, from Constantinople. The news of the events in Paris (i.e., Louis Napoleon's coup d'état) had just been received, and a council had been held at the Porte in consequence. The Sultan of Turkey had issued a decree assuring to his Christian subjects liberty of worship, and the registration of their marriages and births."

Judge Noah, issued an address to his Israelite brethren in the Jewish Chronicle of January, 1849 (quoted on page 110 of Forty Coming Wonders), exhorting them to unite in the effort to rebuild the Jewish temple on its former site in Jerusalem now covered by the Mosque of Omar, and pointed out that the Sultan, following the march of Liberal ideas propagated by the European revolutions of 1848, had granted permission to the Jews to erect a temple in Jerusalem. No progress has, however, yet been made in rebuilding it.

The before-mentioned Hatti Humayoun or Hatti Scheriff, following on the Treaty of Peace in February, 1856, was a very much greater Decree of Toleration than any previous one.

The 2,300 years were mentioned in connection with the Macedonian goat (Dan. 8), and refer chiefly to the territory of the Macedonian Empire of Alexander the Great, which subsequently became part of Turkey; therefore "the cleansing of the sanctuary" at the end of the 2,300 years must relate principally to Turkey and the Holy Land, which belongs to it.

The 396 Years of the Turkish Woe in Rev. 9 : 15, also Remarkably Ended Together with the 2,300 Years in 1855-6.

In the ninth chapter of Revelation the Turkish or Ottoman power is depicted under the emblem of countless armies of horsemen coming across the river Euphrates and overspreading Christendom in Asia and Eastern Europe like a cloud. And power to kill Christians is declared to be given to them for a year and a month and a day and an hour, i.e., 396 days (365 days + 30 days + 1 day), which in the year-day historical fulfilment denote, according to Professor Birks in his "Mystery of Providence," and other expositors, about 396 years.

Now although it was in A.D. 1453 that the Turks captured Constantinople, yet it was not until about A.D. 1460, that the principal provinces of the Turkish Empire in Europe west of Constantinople were conquered by the Turks, such as Greece, Epirus, Thessaly, Macedonia, Bulgaria, Servia (the third or Grecian Empire—the prophetic "third part of men," Rev. 9 : 15). This formidable persecuting empire thus commenced in A.D. 1460, its predicted 396 years of the Turkish Woe, which so remarkably ended in 1855–6 as above mentioned.

Most extraordinary is the contrast between the mild and yielding temper of Turkey now, and its former haughty and fierce intolerance against Christians, when the Turkish Empire was, in Scripture language, the Second Woe to Christendom for 396 years from 1460 to 1855–6 during the year-day sixth trumpet (Rev. 9 : 15; 11 : 14). Evidently the mystic Euphrates is drying up, and the Second Advent of Christ at the year-day seventh trumpet and the year-day seventh vial is close at hand (Rev. 16 : 12–17).

The following four prophetic dates apparently parently terminated in 1855–6:

BEGINNING.	FOUR DATES.	ENDING.
B.C. 445. Artaxerxes' commandment to Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem, Nehemiah 2.	2,300 years Daniel 8 : 14.	End in 1855–6.
A.D. 565, the completion of Justinian's Code of Laws.	1,290 years Daniel 12 : 11.	End in 1855–6.
A.D. 1460, the completed conquest by the Turks of European Turkey, i. e., Greece, Epirus, Thessaly, Macedonia, Servia, etc.	396 years, Revelation, 9 : 15.*	End in 1855–6.
A.D. 635, victorious invasion of Holy Land by Mohammedans followed by their capture of Jerusalem, A.D. 636–7.	1,260 Mohammedan lunar years (=1221 solar years) Rev. 11 : 2.	End in 1855–6.

The momentous conclusion from these facts is, that if the 2,300 years and the 1,290 years did terminate in 1855–6, then the 1,335 years which commenced with the 1,290, in A.D. 565, and are ONLY 45 YEARS LONGER, will terminate about 1900–1, AS THE END OF THIS DISPENSATION and as the time of full blessedness. "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the 1,335 days" (Dan. 12 : 12) in other words, "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the end of the 1335 years in 1900." Thus the End of this Age will be at the End of this 19th Century, or within a year or two of it.

The Gospel Union (or Gospel Army, as it has been styled in some places), of which the Rev. M. Baxter is President, has now about twelve mission stations in the United States and Canada, besides more than seventy mission stations in Britain. Evangelistic Gospel meetings are held at these stations generally every week evening and Sundays in halls rented permanently by evangelists, and many sinners are being converted by this Gospel work. Contributions, which are urgently needed for carrying on and extending the movement, should be sent to Rev. M. Baxter, 63 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

* The seven seals, seven trumpets, seven vials and many other prophetic visions in the Book of Revelation have a double fulfilment. First, within nearly 1,900 years, and secondly, within nearly 1,900 days, just at the close of the first fulfilment. The first is called the year-day historical fulfilment, and the second is called the literal-day futurist fulfilment. Thus the sixth trumpet in Rev. 9 has a figurative accomplishment during 396 years, and afterwards a more literal one during [illegible]

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate has Confirmed the Nomination of Captain A. W. Greely to be General Hazen's successor. It also gave a reluctant confirmation before it adjourned to the President's nomination of a colored man for Recorder of Deeds in the District of Columbia. It twice rejected the nomination of Mr. Matthews, who was the President's first choice for the office. He then nominated Mr. James Monroe Trotter, of Hyde Park, Mass., who on Friday was confirmed by the United States Senate. The rage and disgust with which this information has been received by the office-seekers of the District can perhaps be imagined, but it can hardly be described. The Democratic President and the Republican Senate are both the subjects of hearty denunciation. The consistency of the Senate is not very clear. Possibly Mr. Trotter having a good war record in some measure weighed with the Senators, but the objection that Matthews was non-resident was the one assigned for his rejection, and that applied with equal force to Trotter. Prior to the Presidential campaign of 1884 Mr. Trotter was a Republican; he then acted with the Mugwumps, or Independent Republicans, and it was consequently believed that he would be more offensive to the Senate than a Democrat. Nevertheless, he was confirmed, and the speakers of both parties when addressing colored audiences can each make capital out of the appointment.

The Forty-ninth Congress Passed out of Existence on Friday last, after making a frantic effort during the last forty-eight hours of its life to redeem its character by a hurried despatch of business. The record of its achievements, while falling far short of public expectation, is not so barren as many of its predecessors. The measures by which it will chiefly be remembered are: The Inter-State Commerce bill, the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians, the vigorous anti-polygamy laws, the extension of the free delivery system to smaller post-offices, the bill regulating the succession to the Presidency in the event of the death of both President and Vice-President, the law prescribing the method of counting the electoral votes, the redemption of trade dollars, the repeal of the Tenure of Office act, and the restoration to the national domain of about fifty million acres of land which had been granted to corporations, but not earned. These and many minor measures will stand to the credit of the Forty-ninth Congress on the Statute Book. The list would have been longer but for Presidential interposition. Never in the whole course of our history has a Congress witnessed the destruction of so much of its work by the veto power. Mr. Cleveland has used it freely, and in the majority of cases decisively; for very rarely has a veto failed to be sustained in the House. It is but fair to the President to add that when these differences of opinion have occurred, public approval has generally been with him, and not with Congress. The most remarkable fault of its career is its failure to pass measures which are urgently needed. The removal of some of the glaring anomalies of the tariff and the enactment of a national bankruptcy bill should have been among its first duties, but in neither case did it succeed. It is a fault which the Fiftieth Congress should rectify at its first session. There is, however, little ground for hope of that. The Democratic Party is divided on both questions, and is besides not cordially at one with the President, whom its press charges with ingratitude to the party.

The Retaliation Bill on the Canadian Fishery question was passed last week by the House, conceding to the Senate the point in dispute. The President's powers of suspending business relations with Canada are therefore limited to fish brought by water. It was thought that if he had power to forbid commercial intercourse by rail that the business difficulty would become too serious to be left open, and some agreement would be reached. The New England fishermen do not wish that. They prefer that the dispute go on, as the new bill promises to give them a practical monopoly of the home fish market. Rumors were current last week that Canada would retaliate by excluding American products and manufactures. The rumor was denied in official quarters, but such a project would evidently find strong supporters in Canada. The United States could not consistently object to Canada adopting retaliation, but the Christian people of both countries would prefer to see the mutual relations based on the Golden Rule instead of on a reversal of it. Nor is the policy of retaliation better than its principle. Eventually, after both countries have suffered loss, an agreement will be reached.

The River and Harbor Bill Failed to Become a law. It was not vetoed, but the President refused to sign it. It is reported that he declared the appropriation unnecessary, as there is a sum of more than $16,000,000 in unexpended balances remaining in the hands of the Secretary of War. There were several items of questionable value in the bill, and some that were unquestionably bad. No great interest was believed to be threatened by the failure of the measure. It was not discussed in the House, and, so far as that body was concerned, it was the product of three conferrees. He therefore disapproved of the appropriation of $10,300,000 more. It may be that a bill carrying $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 for certain carefully selected projects would have been signed, but the pending bill was allowed to die.

An Earthquake Shock was Experienced on Long Island on Wednesday of last week. It occurred at a quarter past four in the afternoon, and occasioned some alarm at various points on the south coast. The Marine Observatory on Fire Island was severely shaken. Mr. Keegan, the marine observer, who was seated in his lofty tower, hearing the low, rumbling sound, and thinking it was a signal being fired from a vessel in distress, sprang from his seat at the window, and placing the large telescope in position, scanned the ocean in search of the disabled vessel, but could find nothing. The shock lasted about four seconds, and seemed to come from the ocean, and pass in a north-westerly direction. Inquiries along the coast elicited the fact that it extended as far as Babylon, and the rumbling and quiver of the earth were clearly perceived by farmers and others. The shock was followed by another, but did no damage. The increased frequency of earthquakes during the past year or two is a sign of momentous significance, which is recognized by students of prophecy as confirmatory of their calculations from prophetic data. The earthquake period will culminate in the three great earthquakes foretold in Revelation. The first in chronological order will occur just previous to the First Trumpet in Rev. 8 : 5 (probably about 1896), the second earthquake will be at the close of the Sixth Trumpet in Rev. 11 : 13, and seven thousand men of names, titles, and dignities will be slain in it (about 1900). The third will be at the close of the Seventh Trumpet, as stated in Rev. 11 : 19 (probably about 1901).

Lord Salisbury's Cabinet has Suffered Another loss. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, the Secretary for Ireland, and formerly the Conservative leader of the House of Commons, has resigned. It is officially announced that he is in danger of total blindness. A cataract has formed on each of his eyes, and a period of absolute rest and retirement has been enjoined by his physicians. At its close he will go to Berlin to undergo an operation by the most famous of European oculists. Irish Members of Parliament profess to be sceptical about the necessity for his retirement from office at this date. They say that whereas his colleagues are mentally blind to the consequences of the Irish policy of the Government, Sir Michael's mental vision is very clear, and he has resigned prematurely to escape the responsibility for the disasters which are inevitable. Sir Michael's successor is Mr. Arthur J. Balfour, who is a Scotchman disliked by the Irish, and a nephew of the Premier.

The New Reichstag was Opened with Great enthusiasm on Thursday last. The Emperor was unable to be present. In his speech, which was read from the throne, he expressed his gratification at the benevolent disposition the Pope has shown toward the Empire. He said that the foreign policy of the Empire is continually directed to the maintenance of peace with all powers, and especially with Germany's neighbors. The foreign relations of the Government were the same as when the last Reichstag was opened. If the present Reichstag, without hesitation or division, gave unanimous expression to the resolve that the nation will put forth its full strength in full panoply now and at all times against any attack upon the frontiers, such resolution, even before carried out, would materially strengthen the guarantees of peace and remove the doubts which the late Parliamentary debates may have inspired. The Emperor felt assured that the Reichstag by its resolutions would give the Federal Government a national policy on a safe basis, and derived from this conviction the confident hope that God would bless his efforts to preserve the peace and security of Germany.

A Military Rising in Bulgaria, Evidently the work of Russian agents, took place last week. On February 28th a portion of the troops garrisoned at Silistria revolted and pronounced against the Regency. Troops were promptly dispatched to Silistria from Rustchuk, Varna, and Shumla, by the Government to quell the mutiny. The leaders of the disturbance were men who were prominent in the insurrection to depose Prince Alexander. No sooner had the troops been sent to Silistria from Rustchuk than a revolt broke out in the latter place. That was promptly suppressed by the militia. There was severe fighting at Silistria before the arrival of the re-enforcements, but the Loyalists entered Silistria without opposition. They found there the corpse of Colonel Kristoff, commander of the garrison, who had been killed by his men. The other officers escaped into Roumania. The prisoners have been tried by court martial, and nine officers have been sentenced to death. It is expected that Russia will find in this revolt a pretext for the occupation of Bulgaria. It will probably be some such spark as this that will start the coming European conflagration.

The Thanks of the Publishers of this Journal are cordially tendered to the friends who have so heartily responded to their appeal of last fall by securing new subscribers. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S increased circulation this year is largely due to their efforts. The success of many of these workers has been remarkable. Mr. G. A. Rose, 22 Sussex Avenue, Newark, N. J., has sent us 227 new names; Rev. J. H. Shirey, 515 Laurel Street, Reading Pa., 106 new names; Mrs. S. W. Wenhohn, Pullman, Ill., 78; Mr. George Hopkins, Blackminton, Mass., 56; Mr. Alexander Whyte, 297 East Tenth Street, New York, 40; Mrs. E. Phelps, Eureka, Cal., 33; Mr. Charles Stewart, 40 Houston Street, New York, 29; Rev. H. B. Buley, Shandakin, Pa., 25; and other friends in various States have worked zealously and successfully to extend the circulation in their respective neighborhoods.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher was Seized with apoplexy on Friday last. He was in his usual health on Thursday, and occupied himself with his work on the "Life of Christ," which he commenced some years ago, but was unable to complete. At night he complained of a headache, and as he appeared unlike himself, Mrs. Beecher became alarmed and sent for the family physician. The next day he grew worse, and symptoms of a flow of blood on the brain were detected. Two other physicians were summoned, but could do nothing for his relief. Mr. Beecher gradually sank into unconsciousness, and his left side became paralyzed. On Sunday night the physicians pronounced the case hopeless, and said that Mr. Beecher would never regain consciousness. Prayers for the stricken minister and his sorrowing family were offered in most of the Brooklyn churches, and Mr. Beecher's house was surrounded all day by crowds of friends, anxiously awaiting news of his condition. At the close of his sermon on Sunday morning, Dr. Talmage said: "The pastor of a neighboring and sister congregation is dying—it may be he is dead. His loss I feel to be a personal bereavement. He was the friend of the slave, of the workingman, of the capitalist—of all. It would hardly be merciful to pray for his detention, for his physicians say that the intellect is gone, and Henry Ward Beecher without his wit, his humor, his eloquence, would be a stranger among us. We would not know him. I have but two wishes—one that his departure may be peaceful, and the other that all needed comfort and consolation be given the family, the friends, and the congregation."

A Ship Saved by Being Sunk is now in the possession of her owners, and is being prepared for another voyage. Early on the morning of February 15th a vessel that was loading at her pier in the East River, New York, was seen to be on fire. It had started in the forecastle, and rapidly communicated with a large number of bales of hay on deck. There was nothing in the hold except ballast. The fire-boats and the fire-engines quickly filled the hold with water, and the vessel heeled over toward the dock and sank. She was not badly injured, and the work of raising her was at once begun. Ordinarily the sinking of a vessel is a disaster, and means loss to the owners and insurers; but in this case it meant preservation. The incident is typical. The soul that would have eternal life must die to the world. It has nothing but worthless ballast on board, and the fires of lust and passion are devouring it. After submersion it rises to new and endless life (Luke 17 : 33).

Prescriptions by Cable Saved a Lady's Life recently. Among the passengers on a steamship which arrived in New York from England a few days ago were two ladies, one of whom is the wife of a well-known city merchant of considerable wealth. While making a tour in Great Britain, she was suddenly taken ill. The party with which she was travelling thought her sickness a very slight one, and went on, expecting her to rejoin them. As she did not overtake them, her sister went to her, and found her in a raging fever. Several English physicians were in attendance, but after a day or two the sister dismissed them, and cabled to a New York physician a succinct account of the patient's condition. The cable brought back a prescription and directions for treatment. Every day for two weeks this was repeated morning and evening. There was great gravity in the case—so great, indeed, that the New York doctor felt impelled to call a consultation of other leading physicians of the city, and these doctors met daily to receive the reports that were cabled here, and to send back explicit directions as to the treatment of their patient three thousand miles away. The two ladies had perfect confidence in this mode of managing the case, and no English physician was allowed to interfere. The result justified their faith; the sick lady has been raised from the verge of the grave, and has returned in perfect health to her home. The example of the two ladies may be of use to persons anxious about the salvation of their souls. Those are saved who not relying on a priest or the friends that surround them, exercise implicit, unwavering faith in Christ (II Tim. 1 : 12).

The Horse-Car Platform as a Health Resort for consumptives is recommended by a citizen of Chicago. The Herald of that city states that a young man of robust appearance owes his life and health to riding on the front platform of the cars. Speaking of the remarkable fact to a reporter, recently, he said, "I come of a consumptive family. My mother, a sister, and two brothers died of consumption, and a year ago I expected to go in the same way. As soon as I saw that I was going down, I made up my mind to take some desperate means of salvation. I wasn't financially able to go to California, or to travel anywhere except to and from my work. So I did the next best thing. Every morning in riding into town I stood out on the platform, and, drawing long breaths, filled my lungs full of the fresh air from the lake. At first I couldn't inhale much, but by and by my lungs gathered strength, respiratory cells that had long been unused began to open and admit life-giving oxygen, and in a few months I was surprised at my own strength and good health, as were my friends. Now I can draw a longer inhalation than any man I know, and a long inhalation means filling with air all of the cells of the lungs, bringing the whole system into service, and I have no more fear of consumption." The principle of the cure seems to have been that as the weak organs were exercised they gained power, became better able to perform their functions and throw off disease. The same principle may be commended to weak and desponding believers. Self-inspection will not help them, but the use of their spiritual gifts in God's service may not only benefit others, but bring increased power to themselves (Prov. 11 : 25).

A Marriage Fifty Years after Betrothal is reported by the San Francisco Chronicle. It states that a wedding has just been celebrated in that city between a bride of sixty-eight and a bridegroom of seventy years of age. A romantic interest attaches to the union. Fifty years ago, when both were young, they resided in a small village in New York State. They had been fond of each other from childhood, and ultimately became engaged to be married. The young man, however, was anxious to improve his position before undertaking to support a wife, and went to Ohio, where a good situation was offered him. He prospered, but did not keep his promise to his betrothed. He married a wealthy Ohio lady, and the discarded girl, after a period of sorrowful reflection, accepted an offer of marriage from a Californian gentleman, and removed to that State. Neither heard of the other for many years, but about two months ago the faithless Ohio immigrant wrote to a friend to inquire what had become of his old love. He also mentioned that he had been a widower for some years, so it was not difficult to guess the purpose of his inquiries. By a singular coincidence the same person received, a few days later, a letter from the lady in California, asking for news of her old lover. She said that her husband was dead. The common friend put both parties in communication, and the recent marriage is the result. Doubtless the bridegroom's happiness is enhanced by the reflection that his wife has forgiven him for deserting her fifty years ago. He would naturally have some doubt about her doing so. No backslider from God need have any such doubt. If he desires to return, forgiveness is assured to him (Isa. 55 : 7).

The Absence of Guests from a Dinner Party in Baltimore, Md., caused the host some chagrin recently. The Baltimore Sun reports that a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity ordered an entertainment a few nights ago for the members of his lodge, and mailed invitations to those he wished to attend. The night came, the canvas backs, terrapin, oysters, and other delicacies, the waiters and the host, were all there, but only a few friends who knew of the affair through other channels than the finely engraved cards of invitation. Being there, the good things had to be eaten. The next day the host went to the Post Office to see if his mailed invitations had gone astray. A search revealed the whole lot carefully stowed away in a corner, having been held for additional postage. He was, of course, deeply mortified, but must have been glad to find that his friends were innocent of a wilful discourtesy. At the gospel feast the absent cannot be thus vindicated. Every man who has read the Bible or listened to a gospel sermon has received his invitation, and not more than one ought to be necessary (Luke 14 : 16–24).

BRIEF NOTES.

DR. L. W. MUNHALL is now holding united services in Dr. A. J. Gordon's church in Boston, Mass. Five or six churches are co-operating in the work, and there are already signs of a rich harvest of souls.

The new steamer which has been sent to Bishop Taylor in Africa has at his desire been named the "Annie Taylor," after his beloved wife. The donors of the vessel proposed to give it the bishop's name.

The boycotting of the Cincinnati daily Times-Star by the saloon-keepers, because of its vigorous opposition to their business, ought to increase its circulation among the Godly people of Cincinnati, especially as it recently discontinued its Sunday edition.

Sir Andrew Clark, M.D., an eminent English authority, is reported as saying in a recent address: "I am speaking solemnly and carefully in the presence of truth; and I tell you I am considerably within the mark when I say to you that, going the round of my hospital wards to-day, seven out of every ten there owed their illness to alcohol."

Another party of a hundred boys and girls have been sent from New York by Mrs. J. J. Astor to Western homes. This makes 1413 city waifs whom she has placed in good homes, at a cost of $20,656. A truly Christian work, good for the children, who are removed from evil surroundings, and good for the city, which would probably have to support them in prison, if they remained here to grow up uncared for.

The Gospel Mission, formerly located at No. 224 Wooster Street, New York, has removed to more commodious premises at 143 Bleecker Street, corner of South Fifth Avenue. This change was rendered necessary by the rapid growth of the Sunday-school. The field of usefulness in this densely populated neighborhood is now greater, and the leaders of the mission invite the co-operation of all Christians.

The students of the Wisconsin colleges and universities have held an interesting Christian convention in Beaver Dam. Over thirty of the young people of the city who were in attendance expressed their decision to become Christians, and thirty-five college students volunteered to go out as foreign missionaries, making over 1000 students from the colleges of the United States who have this winter declared their purpose to leave their homes and country and go out to teach and preach in heathen lands.

A convention to consider the moral and spiritual condition of the national capital, and the best means to adopt for the promotion of religious life and evangelical effort there was held on February 22d at the Mission Hall, at the call of the Advisory Board of the Central Union Mission. We have frequently referred to the good work which has been accomplished in Washington through the instrumentality of this mission, and we trust that the appalling facts communicated to the convention may lead to many Christian workers going to its assistance in its effort to stem the tide of iniquity which is flooding the city.

THE HEDGE OF THORNS AND THE PLAIN WAY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The way of the slothful man is as an hedge of thorns: but the way of the righteous is made plain." —Proverbs 15: 19.

Propinquity of the Practical and Spiritual—Superfine Spirituality to be Suspected—I. Temporal Lessons—Slothfulness Opposed to Righteousness—The Character of the Sluggard—His Way Undesirable—Difficult—Blocked Up Altogether—The Way of the Righteous—Brought Out of Trouble—God's Business—II. Spiritual Lessons—The Sluggard in Religion—His Good Resolutions—His Danger—The Way of the Righteous a Way of Faith—How to Obtain Light in a Difficulty.

You must have noticed how frequently godly people almost wear out their Bibles in certain places. The Psalms, the Gospel of John, and parts of the Epistles, are favorite portions, and are thumbed in many an old believer's Bible till the fact is very noticeable. There are certain sheep-tracks up the slopes of Scripture which are much more trodden than the rest of the holy fields. I suppose it has always been so, and I will not quarrel with the instincts of the saints.

I do, however, regret that any portion of Holy Writ should be neglected. There are Bible-readers who keep clear of the historical parts of Scripture, and also greatly avoid the Book of Proverbs; indeed, they almost wonder how Proverbs and Ecclesiastes come to be a part of the Word of God. Very singular it must seem to them that this Book of Proverbs should be placed so very near to Solomon's Song Doubtless there is a meaning in that arrangement. The Lord would not have spirituality Divorced from Common-Sense.

God has made us body and soul, and He would have us serve Him with both. There is a part of us that is material, and there is a part that is spiritual; and both need guidance such as the Holy Spirit affords us in the inspired Book. The Lord Jesus Christ has redeemed us, not as to our soul alone, nor our spirit alone, but as to our body also; and He would have us recognize this fact.

Grace is intended to sanctify all the relations of life. There is no necessity that a man who is wise unto salvation should in other respects be a fool; but the reverse should be constantly seen; sanctity should beget sagacity, and purity should be the mother of prudence.

I pray my friends not to be so spiritual that they cannot do a good day's work, or give full measure, or sell honest wares. To my disgust I have known persons professing to have reached perfect purity who have done very dirty things. I have been since I knew one who took no interest in the affairs of this world, and yet speculated till he lost thousands of other people's money. Do not get to be so heavenly-minded that you cannot put up with the little vexations of the family; for we have heard of people of whom it was said that the sooner they went to heaven the better, for they were too disagreeable to live with below.

As the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ is meant for this world as well as for worlds to come, so the volume of Holy Scripture is fitly made to contain Proverbs as well as Psalms. Neglect neither the one nor the other. I preach at this time from the word of Solomon which is now before us, and I shall not withhold from you its every-day meaning; but I shall also exhibit its higher lights, for I believe that there is not a moral truth in the Book of Proverbs which does not also wear a spiritual aspect. I shall try to show you that our text, while it has its temporal bearings, which we will not conceal, has beyond these its higher and spiritual teachings, with which we will conclude.

I. First, then, take the text in its temporal bearings. It runs thus—"The way of the slothful man is as an hedge of thorns: but the way of the righteous is made plain." Note, then, first of all, that a slothful man is the opposite of a righteous man. In the text they are set in opposition. "The way of the slothful man" is placed in contrast, not with the way of the diligent man, but with "the way of the righteous;" as if to show that the slothful man is the opposite of a righteous man. A sluggard is and he cannot be; he misses a main part of rightness. It is very seldom that a sluggard is honest; he owes at least more labor to the world than he pays. A slothful man is a soldier who would let others fight the battle of life while he lies under the baggage-wagon asleep, until rations are served out. He is a husbandman who only husbands his own strength, and would eat the grapes while others trim the vines. He would, if possible, be carried on his bed into the kingdom of heaven; he is much too great a lover of ease to go on pilgrimage over rough and weary ways. If the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence from others, it will never suffer violence from Him. He is too idle to be importunate, too slothful to be earnest.

Our second observation is this: if we avoid sloth we have not done enough, we must also be righteous. If it had been sufficient to shake off idleness, and become industrious, the text would have run thus:

"The Way of the Slothful is as an hedge of thorns: but the way of the diligent is made plain." Ah, dear friends, a man may be very industrious and energetic and earnest, but if it is in a wrong cause, he might have been less mischievous had he been slothful! There is a diligence which is produced by greed, or ambition; and this is no better than the selfishness which is the cause of it. Many wear themselves to skin and bone to gather that which is not bread, to hoard up that which can never satisfy them. We are to become the servants of righteousness when we escape from the servitude of sloth. "Not slothful in business" is very well; but to complete the change we must be gracious in our diligence, being "fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

The text leads us to make a third observation, which repeats its very words: namely, that a slothful man's way is like a hedge of thorns. Here we enlarge. The idler's way is Not a Desirable Way.

Unthinking persons suppose that the sluggard lives a happy life, and travels an easy road. It is not so. Many believe in "the sweet doing of nothing," but it is a sheer fiction. Surface appearances are not the truth; though it may seem that idleness is rest, it is not so; though sloth promises ease, it cheats its votaries. Of all unrest there is none more wearisome than that of having nothing whatever to do. The severest toil is far more endurable than utter sloth. I have heard of retired business men going back to the counter from absolute weariness of idleness. It is far more desirable to be righteous than it is to be at ease. Labor of a holy sort has ten thousand times more joy in it than purposeless leisure.

The way of the sluggard is also difficult. The idle man walks a hard road in his own apprehension; he has to break through thorns. He cannot plough by reason of the cold. To the slothful man, his way, when he gets so far as having a way at all, always appears to be as hard to pursue as a hedge of thorns; and, mark you, if he continues slothful, it will actually become a hedge of thorns! Difficulties imagined are apt to arrive. Duty neglected to-day will have to be done some time or other; and the arrears of neglected service are grim debts. Dear friends, do not put off till to-morrow that which can be done to-day. Keep the road clear of arrears.

Do the Day's Work in the Day.

I am persuaded that, in your ordinary business work, some of you Christian people need to be warned against shiftless delay. Believe me, there is a piety in keeping your work well in hand, in having the house right, the business in order, the daily task well done. No slut can be a saint: no sluggard can glorify God. Life grows hard and unenviable to men who try to make it easy. A man who neglects his duty, whether he be a carpenter, a bricklayer, a clerk, a minister, or an archbishop, will find his way increase in difficulty until it becomes impassable.

A Painful Way.

Before long, the sluggard's course becomes a very painful way, for a way of thorns tears a man's garments, and wounds his flesh; and you cannot be neglectful of the ordinary duties of life without by and by suffering for it. Loss of character, loss of position, and actual want—all come from idleness.

Continue in that course, and you will find your way become a hedge of thorns in a further sense, for it will be blocked up altogether. You will be unable to go on at all. You took it easy once, but what will you do now? You neglected duty, you forbore to do the service of the day, and at last your sins have found you out; nobody will have you, and you are a burden to yourself. Now have you found a hedge of thorns in your way. This is clear enough, and it has been seen by most of us in actual life in several cases.

The other truth of the text is equally clear—becomes plain: "The way of the righteous is made plain." When a man, by the Holy Spirit's gracious influence upon him, is made thoroughly truthful, thoroughly honest, so that he walks in his integrity, it is most pleasant to note how soon, by some means or other, his way opens up before him. We have seen good men in great straits and adversities; their own conscientiousness may appear to narrow their course, and, of course, the depressions of business fall upon righteous men as much as upon the unrighteous; but in the long run you will see that, if a man keeps straight, and walks in strict integrity and faith, the Lord will make darkness light before him, and crooked things straight. We know that integrity and uprightness are the best preservatives. If we will not put forth our hand unto iniquity even during the worst pinch, we shall come forth as the light. But if in trouble you try to get out of it by indirect means, you will involve yourself in tenfold difficulty. It is far better to be poor than dishonest; ay, it is better to die than to dishonor our profession. It is God's business to provide for us, and He will do it. "The way of the righteous is made plain." Only wait and watch, and you shall see the salvation of God.

Thus I have set before you the moral or temporal meaning of the text, commending it earnestly to the consideration of all, especially of men of business, begging them to see to it that there be no neglect about any part of their calling, for a Christian's business ought to be the best done of any man's in the world.

II. Now I come to the spiritual teaching of the text; and may the Lord anoint our eyes by His Holy Spirit, that we may see! Take the first side of the text,

The Spiritual Sluggard;

what is said of him? His way is "as an hedge of thorns." I gather from the opposition of the text that the spiritual sluggard's way is the way of unbelief, because the opposite of his way is the way of the righteous. Now, the way of the righteous is the way of faith—"We walk by faith." Therefore the spiritual sluggard's way is the way of unbelief.

I will describe him. He has a way, for he is not altogether dead to religious matters. He hears sermons, and attends the house of God. He sometimes reads his Bible, and he often has a correct notion of what the Gospel is. But he fails in faith; he has not faith enough in the truth of the things which he professes to believe ever to be affected by them in his daily life, or in his truest feelings. If he did really believe these things to be true, his life would not be slothful. When a man believes that there is a hell, he labors to escape from it. When a man verily believes that there is a heaven, unless he is demented, he has an ambition to partake in its glories.

The spiritual sluggard does not believe after that practical fashion. He says, "It is true;" but he acts as if it were false. He is too much a sluggard to become an infidel; he is too lethargic to argue against the truth which condemns him; he nods assent—the nod of sleep. He is of some good and great thing; but it ends in smoke. He has resolved in real earnest to look to his eternal state, and seek the Lord with all his might, but his resolves are frail as bubbles. If you were to tell him that in seven years' time he would be just as dull, stupid, and sinful as he now is, he would angrily deny it; but such will be the case. He intends only to delay a very little longer, and then he is going to entertain the great question in the most serious manner. If I recollect rightly, he was in the same mind twenty years ago, and I fear he will continue in the same mind when death comes upon the scene, and ends all his dreaming.

Now, that way is full of thorns. It is a very hard way. I will show you in a minute that it is so. People who are in this state cannot quite give up religion, and yet they have never really taken to it. Do you notice how hard everything is to them? To begin, ministers preach such Dreadfully Long Sermons.

The sermon is not long to you who feed upon the Word; but to those who sleep at the table it is intolerably tedious. The whole service is dreary to them, though to believers it is bright and happy. Ask them whether they read the Bible at home. They might do so if they were flogged to it, but the Bible does not interest them, and it requires so much thought; they cannot muster mind enough for it. To us it is a Book which sparkles with the divinest truth; it is the Book of God; the Lord of books; there is no volume like it. But to these people Bible-reading is hard labor, and worse. Prayer, also, is slavery; repentance is impossible. The revival plan of "Believe, and live," without any repentance—they rather take to for a time, till they begin to understand more of what the evangelist means.

They go into the inquiry-room, and get

and have done with godliness for the rest of their lives. Possibly some time after they hear of a sanctification to be had in the same manner; they believe themselves to be perfect, and feel that there is no more need for watchfulness or striving; for sin is dead, and they are perfect. When they are told what repentance and faith really are, and that these are for daily, life-long use, and that we must every day watch and strive against temptation, without and within, they disappear from among our hearers, for they do not wish to trouble themselves with so great an enterprise.

Moreover, it is full of perplexities. Do you ever meet with these sluggards? I do. They sometimes come to see me, and when they come, this is their style of talk. They say, "Well, sir, I have heard about believing in the Lord Jesus Christ. Can you tell me what it means?" I explain that it is a simple acceptance of God's testimony, and trust in the Lord Jesus. Do you understand that? They say, "Yes." Then they raise a difficulty, which I explain. Do you quite comprehend that? "Yes, sir, I see that, but"—and then follows a further doubt. This also is cleared up in time to make room for another. Again and again it is—"Yes, but then—" Thus I continue grinding wind by the hour together. Their minds are bottomless buckets, and their memories are bags full of holes; it is to endeavor to fill them. These sluggish people will not take the trouble to sift evidence; they have no wish to be driven to turn from their sins, and seek a Saviour, and be reconciled to God; this would be too much exertion, and involve too many self-denials and heart-searchings. They prefer a way full of pains to the new and living way; they choose the thorn-hedge rather than the highway of holiness.

Nor is this all. In addition to perplexities, their way becomes Full of Miseries.

The sermon which pleases the believer, and cheers his heart, saddens the sluggard. Painful is this predicament. You are sadly placed, for you enjoy neither good nor evil. If you were to go straight out into the world, and plunge into the pleasures of it, you would, at least, know one side of life; but you dare not do that, you have too much conscience, too much training in religious ways, to run with the worldling in his wantonness; so that you neither know the pleasures of the world, nor the pleasures of grace. You feel restraints from both sides, but you know not the liberties of either side. Betwixt two stools you come to the ground. Neither heaven nor hell is on your side; both saints and sinners are shy of you; and so your way is as a thorn-hedge. It is dreadful for a man to have enough conscience to know that he is lost, but not enough grace to find salvation; to have enough religion to make him uncomfortable in sin, but not enough to make him happy in Christ. O mighty grace, wake these sluggards, or else they will sleep themselves into eternal misery!

"The way of the slothful man is as an hedge of thorns." One of these days he will come to the end of his way, and he will see that hedge of thorns

Blocking Him Out of Heaven

—blocking him out from God. God grant that we may not be among the sluggards at the end of the way!

We will now consider the other side of the text very briefly, and notice that the righteous man's way shall be made plain. This is a cheering promise, especially to any of you who are walking in the dark at this time. "The way of the righteous is made plain." The Lord will see to this. Child-like confidence in God shall march on as upon a raised causeway, and always find for itself a road. Faith travels by an unseen track to honor and glory, neither shall anything turn her aside. Her way may not be plain at this moment, but it shall be made so. God is with those who trust in Him; and what or whom shall we fear when God is with us? In due time the hand of the Lord shall be seen.

Sometimes the way of the righteous is mysterious and perplexing. I have known the best of men say, "I long to do the right, and by God's grace I will not stoop to anything which is evil; but which out of the two ways now before me is the right way? Each of them seems to be both hopeful and doubtful; which way shall I turn?" This is a condition which causes great anxiety to one who is deeply earnest to be right.

Oh, for an Oracle which could plainly indicate the path! Superstition and fanaticism shall not be gratified by either voice or dream, but yet the way of the righteous shall be made plain. Brother, when you do not know your way, ask your guide. Stand still and pray. If you cannot find the way upon the chart, commit yourself to the divine guidance by prayer. Down on your knees, and cry to the Lord! Few go wrong when they pray over their movements, and use the judgment which God has given them. The last is not to be omitted, for I have known persons pray about a matter which was perfectly clear to any one with half a grain of sense. In order to escape from an evident but unpleasant duty, they have talked about praying over it. Where a plain command is given, an unmistakable finger points the way, and hesitation is rebellion. Sluggards make prayer an excuse for doing nothing; on the other hand, wilful people make up their mind, and then pray; and this is sheer hypocrisy.

He that is on the King's highway, will come to a good end, for the King has completed that way so that it does not fall short, but leads to a city of habitations, whose Builder and Maker is God. Oh, to be right with God; yea, to be right with Him in our daily life and private walk! Let that be the case, and our way shall be judged of by the Lord as His own royal highway, and upon it the light of His love shall shine, so that it shall become brighter and brighter unto the perfect day.

O God of great mercy, keep us in Thy fear, and through Thy grace lead us, in imitation of Thy dear Son, to abide in holiness! And to Thy name be praise forever and ever! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A MEDICAL STUDENT'S PLAN.*

There was a young medical student who went out to prosecute his studies in Paris. He caught the moral infection of its licentiousness and infidelity. There was an inward struggle between the conscience and the flesh, "Shall I forsake Egypt?" was the question. The flesh prevailed, and he said, "No." Here are his very words: "I know that I can enjoy life in my own way about so many years. I shall parcel out my money to last so long a time and no longer. When my time is up my revolver shall end all." His prediction was but too true; and when within but a few years his pale and breathless form was one day found lying in his own blood, one could almost have believed that a voice was whispering, "The way of transgressors is hard." The great thing which a young man needs in a crisis of temptation is instant decision for the right. If you tamper and hesitate the game is half lost. Leave no time for temptation to accumulate. Forsake Egypt. You must surely have noticed that in relation to all sins of this character—sins of the flesh—St. Paul's counsel is "Flee." Take to your heels. It may seem like cowardice, but it is true heroism. "Flee youthful lusts." Like Joseph hasten instantly out of the way of the tempter; saying as Moses did to Pharaoh, "Thou shalt see my face no more."

AN INFIDEL DRIFTING.

I remember hearing of an infidel who, when laid upon his last bed of sickness, was urged by his godless companions not to show the white feather, but to hold on. What do you think was the answer of the dying man? With a face full of hopeless dismay, he looked at them, and said, "How can I hold on, when I have nothing to hold by?" Ah! he felt then the need of a spiritual grapnel, something "sure and steadfast" to which he could cling. But it is not only in the hour of death we require it; we need it all through life.

A DYING SOLDIER'S QUESTION.

D. L. Moody after the Battle of Pittsburg was visiting the hospital. In the middle of the night he ws roused up, and told that a man in one of the wards wanted to see him. As he entered, the man called to him, and said he wished him to help him to die. "My dear friend," said Moody, "I would take you right up in my arms and carry you into the kingdom of God if I could, but I can't do it; no man can do that. I cannot help you to die." "Then who can?" exclaimed the dying soldier. "Jesus Christ can. He came for that purpose."

And all through the long night the earnest evangelist kept pleading with and for that poor man, and setting before him the two great truths which our Lord preached to Nicodemus, truths which should always go together; the two "musts" of John 3, "Ye must be born again;" "The Son of Man must be lifted up." He showed him that the life of heaven must be begun within the soul now, and that it is begotten by gazing on the uplifted Redeemer crucified on Calvary for us; and ere the first streaks of the morning reddened the eastern sky, the soldier said, "It is enough; I see it; Christ is mine," and went up in one of God's own chariots to the land where the sound of battle is heard no more.

MENTONE.

(See Illustration.)

THE pretty little French town of which a picture appears on this page, is a favorite resort of invalids from all lands. It often happens that the visitors equal in number the resident population. Miss Constance Fenimore Woolson says that during a recent visit to the place, she was informed that the climate there was "beneficial to all whose lungs are delicate; to the aged; to those who need general renovating; to the rheumatic, and to those afflicted with gout." If this claim continue to find believers, Mentone will always have an abundance of guests. The blue waters of the Mediterranean wash its shores, and the sun shines all day on an average two hundred and fifty-nine days of the year. A delightful spot, to the beauty of which Mr. C. H. Spurgeon often refers in his sermons. It is the place to which he regularly goes every year, when the fog and damp of England render life unbearable to a man of his constitution.

The earthquake of February 23d caused much consternation at Mentone, though less damage was done there than in other towns in the Riviera. Many houses, however, were thrown down, and the post-office was reduced to a heap of ruins. Fifty persons were injured more or less severely, and one was killed. After the shock the people camped out in the open gardens, and visitors in large numbers quitted the town.

CELESTIALS AT CHURCH.

AT the Metropolitan Methodist Church, Washington, D. C., of which Rev. J. P. Newman, D.D., is pastor, there was considerable surprise on Sunday, February 13th, when the congregation saw the Chinese Minister and several members of his suite making their way down the crowded aisle to the President Grant pew, which was empty, and evidently held in reserve for them. They were richly attired in the full dress of their nation. A huge diamond glittered on the cap worn by the minister, who led the way to the pew. This attendance was a matter of considerable surprise, as it had been understood heretofore that the minister did not approve of churchgoing here. Dr. Newman made especial reference in his opening prayer to the Emperor of China, whose country has now opened its doors to religious teachers. In beginning his discourse, he remarked that "we have with us today His Excellency the Chinese Minister," and proceeded to devote a large share of his sermon to a history of the various attempts to introduce the Christian religion in China. He was listened to attentively by the Minister and his party, several of whom understand the language thoroughly. "China," he said, "by this recent recognition of the Christian religion, although a nation of limitless resources and population, appeals for peace and fraternal relations. It is as though that great soldier had risen from his grave on the banks of the Hudson, and again said, 'Let us have peace.' It is as though the great Master had again spoken, and said, 'My peace I leave with you.' The oldest nation and the youngest here clasp hands, and here in this Republic the descendants of Shem and Ham and Japhet meet upon a plane of equity and fraternity." The sermon was attentively listened to, and on one or more occasions was interrupted by applause.

THE SEPTENNATE.

BISMARCK'S Septennate has been the absorbing and anxious subject of thought and consideration throughout Christendom during the past month. But fraught as it was with momentous issues to the welfare of Europe, it is not for a moment to be compared in importance with NAPOLEON'S SEPTENNATE, which will create far more profound and widespread excitement and agitation throughout the world, as described in the last verse of the ninth chapter of Daniel. "He"—that is, the future Napoleonic King of Syria [probably about 1893]—"shall confirm a covenant with many for one week even to the consummation." That future Napoleonic-Judaic-Covenant-Septennate, when it is made, will fix the commencing date of the final seven years reaching to the consummation or end of this dispensation. The commotion aroused by Bismarck's Teutonic Septennate, therefore, forcibly reminds prophetic students of the far more tremendous sensation that will be universally produced by the coming Bonapartean-Hebraic-septennial-league in a few years' time after the formation of the ten-kingdomed confederacy (Daniel 7 : 24).

It is most suggestive that the course of political events is familiarizing the minds of the people with the idea of seven years as an appropriate term of any agreement, covenant or lease of power. The French Republican President's term of office is seven years. This likewise is the limit fixed by the English constitution for the existence of a Parliament. As a matter of fact, the Parliaments there are dissolved before that time, owing to disagreement between the members and the Cabinet; but as a protection to the people, whose interests might be imperilled if a Parliament became corrupt or obsequious to the court, it is settled that at the end of seven years from the date of election the Parliament ceases to exist, and a new one must be elected.

MR. AND MRS. COURTHOPE TODD.

THE two zealous and indefatigable evangelists whose portraits appear on page 157 have become famous through the success which has attended their work among the employés of the theatres of London. Their Theatrical Mission has already done much good, and promises to do much more. Its peculiarity is that it seeks to help a class almost entirely neglected by usual evangelistic agencies.

Mr. Todd's interest in the theatre is not a new or transient one with him. It appears that when but a child of six years he delighted to spell out the notices in the theatrical columns of the newspapers, and to acquaint himself with plays and players, contrary to the wishes of his parents. His knowledge of the drama of the day soon became full and accurate. This precocity, and the tastes it revealed, might have led to a life of wordliness and folly, had not God in His saving grace turned the youth's energies into a new channel, and ultimately made his special information a means of blessing to thousands of theatrical employés.

He was early converted to Christ, and decided to give himself to the ministry. He entered St. John's College, London, and passed with credit through three years of the prescribed curriculum. At this time in his studies, he felt called to devote himself to the salvation of the young women connected with the theatre. The noose of righteousness has [illegible] persons in London associated with the theatrical profession, and these included all ages, from infants in arms to gray-headed men and women. He resolved, with God's help, to reach at least a part of that vast army of his fellow-immortals.

The object of the Mission was to gain an influence of a general character over all theatrical employés, in the hope of leading them to a saving knowledge of Christ. It encouraged with Christian counsel and sympathy those who strove to walk uprightly. It supplied the sick with needed comforts, and found employment for those who could not conscientiously remain on the stage. There was ample room for such an addition to the philanthropic agencies of the city; and it prospered.

Mr. and Mrs. Courthope Todd.

The foundation stones of the Theatrical Institute, known as Macready House, Covent Garden, were laid on May 16th, 1885, by the Countess of Aberdeen and the Lady Mayoress; six months later it was formally opened. It furnishes a home, a social club, and a play-room for children, with restaurants on each floor, where wholesome food can be obtained. Education, rest, and religious instruction are provided within its walls. It has a set of rooms for the use of those who, having given up the theatre, are fitting themselves for other careers; some go to the slums of the city as nurses, and some become Bible-readers. It has pretty dormitories for the reception of country girls, drawn to London by the attractive advertisements of theatrical agents. It has a large room, furnished with tables, easy-chairs, books, and magazines, in which young ladies enjoy rest and healthful conversation. Mrs. Courthope Todd knows, and has a friendly greeting for, each visitor. Her sisterly kindness makes them all feel at home.

The Institute has also a lads' hall in the basement, fitted up with a gymnasium, where the youthful actors and choristers have a merry time with swings and rope-ladders. The hours they spend there are never dull; whatever their tastes may be, they are filled with bright and wholesome occupation; and outside of these walls they do not know many such hours. The tiny maidens of the theatre have a corner of the House to themselves. It is appropriately called "The Nest."

In addition to the home comforts and influences supplied by the Institute, Mr. and Mrs. Todd arrange that each protégé of the Mission has a lady correspondent, who writes her a monthly letter of loving counsel. A visitor is employed in going to the lodgings of the members, to hold personal conversation with them; and religious services are regularly conducted in the Institute.

The Theatrical Mission has carried salvation, as well as comfort, to many on the stage. Letters come from all parts of the country, testifying of blessing received through its agency, and telling of a noble fight for the truth as it is in Jesus. Take this one as a sample. A girl actress writes: "I find it very hard since I have been away on this tour, to think of my Saviour as I ought, but I go to Him and ask Him to teach me to love Him, though I can never give Him any return for all His goodness and loving kindness. I will try all I possibly can to please my dear Saviour, by doing what I know to be right, and obeying Him in all things." Pleasant words these to read from one surrounded by temptation and engaged in an occupation in which so few are animated by a like spirit.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

A SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

In the Hands of Brigands.

THE assurance which had been given to Simon Holmes that the gentle sufferer in the baronet's mansion would recover, and which Ethel, herself, as we have seen, fully shared, was fulfilled. By the goodness of God the means suggested so mysteriously to Sir Jarvis Mainwaring, the great London physician, had been blessed to her gradual restoration. Doctor Feltham Greaves, the electrician, had been unremitting in his attention, and Ethel grew stronger day by day. One morning in January—it seemed as though bleak winter had mildened to give special greeting—she walked out of her long imprisonment, leaning on the arm of her father, free to come and go at her own sweet will. As they walked along the sunny and sheltered side of the Hall, Ethel heaved a sigh so deep-drawn as to elicit from her father an anxious inquiry as to its cause.

"What are you thinking of, my dear," said the baronet, "to produce such a sigh as that?"

"I was thinking of my brother Harold, father. Do you know, I think God has raised me that I may go and fetch him home!"

The baronet shook his head. He was unable to reach her clear, full height of faith; neither could he think with complacency of her departure from him now that she had just been brought back to him from the shadowed chamber in which she had lain so long. And yet he could not hide from himself that the hand of God was directly visible in her wondrous restoration. His measure of light was but a feeble glimmer, but the question would force itself upon him—was it for some special purpose? She had come back at a bound from the very gates of the grave. Had she come again to the kingdom of life "for such a time as this?"

On this subject there was in Ethel's mind no doubt, no question. She believed in her commission as really and as firmly as if it had been written with the finger of God on a table of stone, and she had confidence in her success.

"I can't see that, my darling," said Sir Godwin after a lengthy pause. "Now that I seem to have received you back after a long and painful journey, after sinking deeper and deeper into the shadow, I feel as though I cannot bear that you should go from me any more. I need you, dear, in more ways than one, and I am looking forward to a closer confidence, soul to soul, between you and me than there ever was before."

This was doubly sweet to Ethel. She knew intuitively at what her father was hinting, and her heart beat fast as she thought that he, too, was being drawn toward rest and righteousness by the magnet of the cross.

"Besides," he continued, "you know how self-willed your brother is; how passionate and proud. He would be sure to resist any such attempt to curb him as the sending of his sister after him. The very idea would be enough to constrain him to increase the distance between himself and home. I dearly wish he would return, for I greatly need his aid in the management of the estate. We can but hope that he will weary of his foolishness by and by, and come back of his own accord."

"But you don't seem to remember, father, dear, that if it is God's will that I should be the means of bringing him to a better mind, God can put him so that he cannot get away from me, and can put into his mind, when he sees me, a wish to come home with me. If it is right for me to go, it will be made right for him to come. I cannot doubt that, you know. I can never get rid of this feeling; I hear it like a voice all the time, 'Go and fetch your brother!' Think what a happy day for us all that will be when we three are altogether at dear old Aspen Chase."

The baronet could not argue. He would only doubt and wonder; and wonder until his doubts were staggered. A little while they walked in silence. Then Ethel said, "Father, dear, you said just now, 'We can but hope.' Is there not one other thing that we can do? Both of us, I mean. If it is right to hope for anything, it must be right to pray for it. I never go to sleep at night, I never wake from sleep at morn but I say, 'Lord, bring brother Harold home again!' And do you know that always greatly helps my hope. And when I pray like that, then the voice distinctly comes to me again and again, 'Go and fetch your brother home.' Dear father! It will be right for me to go. But don't trouble. When the time comes, and the way is open, I think you will be willing, too."

Then the two withdrew into the house again, the maiden to pray and hope and wait; the silent baronet to pray, too, though no one knows it but himself and his God; and more and more to ponder these things in his heart. God aid and guard thee, gentle Ethel. Of thee it may well be said as of thy truthful sister on Zidon shores, "O woman, great is thy faith!" Thy errand will carry thee far away; up rugged hills and down dark valleys, through brake and brier, and the way, at times, will be hard walking for thy tender feet. Yet, "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" Looking on thy vacant couch and with that wondrous "Talitha cumi" of the divine Saviour echoing in our ears, we cannot, dare not, do other than say, "Go in this thy might!"

The subject thus broached between father and daughter became after this conversation the one supreme thought in Ethel's mind. All her duties and labors were arranged with a view to a long journey. In her unoccupied moments her mind dwelt constantly on the details of her enterprise which were so new to her. They were more novel and romantic than she then knew. Harold, she was aware, was then in Spain, but she imagined him living a life of ease and luxury and worldly pleasure in some gay resort, whereas he was in circumstances of hardship and danger. How he came to be so situated should now be revealed to the reader.

After that exciting struggle with Policeman Tugwell, when Alfred Atheling was so near arrest, Harold, fearing that trouble might fall upon him for his share in the rescue of his friend, determined to seek a refuge in Spain, with which country the British Government had no extradition treaty. On the way he stayed for a few days in Paris to enjoy the pleasures of the gay capital. In one of the theatres there he met an old acquaintance, with whom he had two years before spent some weeks of dissipation and riotous pleasure.

Don Antonio de Diaz was a Spaniard, in whose veins ran, at least he said so, the bluest of blue blood. He was possessed of handsome features, an aristocratic air, eminent social qualities, a long purse, and a special acquaintance with the more piquant features of Parisian life. All these, in the estimation of Harold Spofforth, were high-class certificates.

Now, as Spain was the bourne to which the young Englishman was journeying, he felt that he could not do better than attach himself still more closely to the Spanish Don. His friendship was well worth cultivating, and, as the warm-hearted son of the South had similar views and feelings, they looked forward to spending many pleasant days together in the Spanish capital. Under Don Antonio's stimulating influence, Harold's ready cash disappeared with even unwonted rapidity. That favorite motto with this class of individuals, "A short life and a merry one," comes very expensive in more ways than one, and is generally followed by bankruptcy of more kinds than one, bankruptcies that cannot be whitewashed in any courts of law. It is a sort of galloping consumption, which includes money, health, and morals in the fatal race to ruin.

Under the genial and fascinating Spaniard's guidance Harold drew upon his father for fresh supplies. No sooner were these new funds in hand, than he and the friend, who was to be his guide into the inner courts of the Spanish Temple of Pleasure, took their departure. Don Antonio de Diaz seemed to wax more brilliant and delightful as a fellow traveller and comrade the farther they left the gay French capital behind them.

"There is no need," said he, "why we should travel post haste, as if we were couriers pioneering the way for royalty. As for the steam-engine and the train, they simply reduce you to a parcel, and you are transmitted through the air so fast that you can make no more observation of the country through which you pass, and reap no more pleasure from your journey, than a parcel can. Our glorious Spain, my dear Señor Spofforth, deserves far different treatment. Its marvellous beauties must be taken in piecemeal. Let us travel more pleasantly. Let us get out of the beaten track, and study nature's charms at our ease. I can show you a few out-of-the-way places, altogether unknown to the mere tourist and sightseer, that are gems of the first water, as you will be delighted to acknowledge."

Harold listened, and was disposed to yield. A journey on horseback, or in a carriage, through a charming country, promised more enjoyment than a rush through it on an express train. All hesitation was removed when his companion, reading his nature aright, offered another inducement.

"You ought to see how our best people live," he said. "There are long-standing invitations which I have too long neglected and I shall be glad to spend a few months in discharging such debts. You will be welcomed everywhere. I will introduce you to the best of our people, and we can make our home in baronial castles and country quarters of long-tried friends of my own. There we shall find cooks of the first order, cellars of rarest old wine, and laughing damosels and donnas of the cherriest lips and starriest eyes."

There was no resisting such a picture as this, certainly such resisting power did not dwell in Harold Spofforth's moral constitution. The infatuated votary of pleasure congratulated himself that he had met with such a guide, philosopher, and friend. He saw in himself a happier Alexander, who, like the Grecian monarch, had already conquered a world of pleasure, and unlike him, had now new worlds of bliss to conquer. He expressed his thanks to his obliging companion without stint or limit, and announced his entire willingness to follow loyally and gladly wheresoever he might lead. Whereupon the Don's eyes flashed with a merry light, and his gleaming white teeth flashed also as he smiled. A careful observer might have read something else than merriment in that gleam. Harold Spofforth, however, made no pretentions to that character.

By and by, according to mutual agreement, the ordinary beaten tracks were forsaken; the usual and more rapid methods of locomotion were discarded. By strange and unknown paths they proceeded to explore fresh fields and pastures new. They entered eventually into a mountainous country in which the sparsely scattered inns and auberges were of the smallest, and the devious tracks were of the narrowest, and the journey had to be taken with much care along the edge of steep slopes, and on the saddles of sure-footed mules.

During no portion of their pleasant and exciting journey had Don Antonio de Diaz showed himself so thoroughly pleasant a companion as now. He twirled his dainty mustache with his fingers, fingers that sparkled with jeweled rings; he showed his white teeth, and showered his smiles and scattered his jokes and witticisms all around; and piquant songs floated from his lips as musical as the sparkling mountain brooks that babbled as they passed.

Harold Spofforth was delighted to find that the farther they proceeded into the heart of the country, the more profoundly his aristocratic friend and comrade was held in honor—the lower and more reverent were the obeisances of innkeeper and muleteer, and also of the few peasants whom they met. Our young Englishman could not help expressing his pleasure at this. It argued, he said, well for the manners and customs of the Spanish peasantry, and still better for his friend the Don, that he could command such universal respect.

"You see, Señor Spofforth," the Spaniard responded, with a pleasant twinkle in his eye, "I am no stranger among these good people, and my race has been held in high honor in these regions from the very earliest days of Spain's existence. The noble house of Diaz," he continued, proudly, "has many a noble pile to dwell in, but its true home is in the affection and devotion of the people's hearts."

"That is a noble sentiment," said the delighted Harold, "and to hear you utter it is proof enough that you deserve to come of the lineage of De Diaz, and that you are a worthy bearer of the name."

The Don smiled loftily and waved his hand as one who would put away from him all flattering remarks, and said, "We shall presently reach the outlying portions of Don Miguel de Herrara's charming mountain home. I predict that once fairly under the spell of his hospitality, your visit to Madrid will be willingly postponed awhile."

By and by, as they were slowly rounding the base of a tall mountain whose slopes were thickly covered by dark umbrageous pines, and at whose foot a brawling stream chafed and bickered on its course to the sea, our travellers were suddenly attacked by a dozen well-armed bandits. These very plainly informed them they were to consider themselves captives, and that resistance was certain to be followed by a short shrift, and, not a long rope exactly, but a swift bullet or a sharp knife.

Don Antonio's grief and vexation knew no bounds. "He would not have cared for himself," he said, "but to have led his friend and comrade into such grief and trouble was gall and wormwood to his soul." Harold was slow to realize the awkward fact that he and his estimable comrade were really taken prisoners; and that they were at the mercy of a band of desperadoes who were as rough and unceremonious in their manners as they were fierce and sinister in their looks. They did not fail, however, to convince him that he was really held in durance; and when the natural pluck in him began to assert itself somewhat strongly, prompting him to rebel against such a high-handed proceeding, he was coolly and sternly told that there were three courses open to him, any one of which he was free to choose.

The first alternative was quiet submission, in which case all would be well and he could proceed in comfort. The second course was to be bound hand and foot and strapped firmly to the mule on which he was riding; in which case an occasional blow from the staff of the muleteer or a prick with the point of a dagger, an article which appeared to be present in sufficient plenty, would doubtless keep him from chafing in his bonds. The third course was to be the target for the rifles of the party. It was anything but a pleasant predicament, and "the proverbial three courses" did not offer him any great variety of choice.

On the whole, our hero—well, no, not our hero, exactly, he is not made of the right kind of stuff; let us say, their rich prize—chose quiet submission. His noble fellow-captive warmly counselled this line of policy, and certainly he himself bore this stroke of ill-fortune with wonderful coolness and self-control.

"They are a set of smugglers, I suppose," said he, "who vary their ordinary calling by doing a little business in highway robbery. No doubt we shall be able to come to terms with them. Meanwhile, let neither of us forget that patience is a great virtue."

Passing through a long, narrow ravine, very dark and gloomy owing to the mass of foliage which from either side overspread the rough road on which they travelled, they came, at length, into a dense forest. Here the path became tortuous, and to Harold it appeared that they repeatedly turned upon the unbeaten way they had already traversed. A guide, however, was at the head of the odd procession, who seemed to know his business, and never paused or faltered as if in doubt.

At length, when the natural gloom of the forest was still further darkened by the shades of night, our pair of adventurers found themselves in an open glade in which was quite a large encampment. On the further side of the glen, a tall imposing rock reared high its craggy head. Its rough, broad breast was covered with brambles, brushwood, scraggy shrubs and trees; and at the base of the rock were several large caverns. These were evidently used for human dwellings, or rather as a sort of barracks, with all the addenda of stores and magazines thereto belonging. Harold Spofforth was here separated from his comrade in misfortune. He was conducted into one of these spacious caves, which was dimly lighted with one or two rude oil lamps. He was pointed to a couch of dry leaves which lay in the farther corner, and was told that as he was doubtless weary with his long ride, he had better rest his limbs a while, and that supper would follow in due course. He received these hospitalities with a sullen, though silent, scowl, and not by any means with a spirit of submission.

The tawny bandit who seemed to have him in charge, and whose most noteworthy distinctions of features were two keen and blazing eyes, and an immense breadth of jet-black beard and whisker, cut closely so as not to be inconvenient, did not seem to relish the sullen way in which his advice was taken. Blackbeard, observing Harold's frowning brow, gave him a quiet but weighty hint as to the advisability of submissive behavior, by touching lightly and gracefully a formidable knife which was sheathed in the scarf bound round his waist.

JACOB'S POWER WITH GOD.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for March 20, Gen. 32 : 9-28. Golden Text, ver. 26.

The Change in Jacob's Life—God Henceforth Identified with It—A Life of Discipline and Education—The Deceiver Imposed Upon—The Crafty Schemer After Riches—His Clandestine Departure—In Fear of Esau—The Promises Forgotten—Human Precautions Taken—The Night of Wrestling—Jacob Disabled—The Place of Power—The New Name.

JACOB was a new man when he entered the country of his destination ; he was still imperfect, still designing and full of self-seeking, yet he knew that he held a definite relation to God ; he knew that God was on his side, and had pledged Himself to bless him. He knew that purposes of God had to be carried out through him, and he could no longer dissociate God from any part of his life. In every real conversion there is this change,

God Has Appeared Upon the Scene, and henceforth His child cannot wholly ignore Him. But the course of Jacob's life was anything but a smooth one. Conversion is but the beginning of a life in which God educates His child for eternal companionship with Himself, and every day of our life is replete with tests of faith, of patience, and of love, all of which are designed to teach precious lessons which, if we saw them from God's side, we should never wish to be spared.

Jacob found his way to his Uncle Laban, who received him kindly, but soon began to think of his monetary value in the agricultural line of business in which he was engaged. Jacob might have resisted becoming Laban's servant, but his heart had been drawn out toward Rachel, Laban's younger daughter, and for love of her the self-interested Jacob became an almost slave to her father, asking no other recompense than the hand of Rachel in marriage. For seven years he toiled, and then found that others besides himself knew how to practise deception, and, under cover of the darkness, Leah was given to him instead of Rachel, with the bitter taunt, "It must not be so done in our country, to give the younger before the firstborn." Surely his own deceit at home must have risen up before him! He obtained Rachel, however, after all, but Laban exacted of him another seven years' service for her. Children were born to him, but Laban, not he, was growing rich by his labor. Therefore Jacob at last demanded to be sent away that he might provide for his own house. To this Laban demurred ; he knew full well by experience that the Lord had blessed him for Jacob's sake, and he dreaded the financial loss his departure would occasion, and therefore he sought to make terms with Jacob upon which he would consent to remain with him. Jacob's strategic ability came into play here. He was a first-rate cattle-dealer, and made use of all the knowledge which he had acquired by natural observation and long experience to increase his possessions. By a shrewd device he succeeded in obtaining as his share of the profits the most productive breeders in the flock, and he did this whatever mark was fixed upon by Laban as the mark which should assign a new-born animal to Jacob's ownership. There was the promise of God insured his being blest with riches ; but Jacob could not trust God without making sure by doing all he could for himself as well ; one might almost think he was author of the proverb, "God helps those that help themselves." Abraham was no inactive man, but he worked under God, at His command, instead of attempting to work alongside of God, as Jacob seems to have done, in his constant planning and plotting to secure his own interests. Consequently, Abraham's life was a life of dignified, calm, restful faith, which saw God always ; while Jacob's was a restless, intermittent, anxious life, a life of little dignity and little power, his ends attained by hard work and heavy thought which, after all, hindered more than helped. On the anxious, wrinkled brows of how many converted men of business, mothers of families, and heads of institutions do we read the history of Jacob repeated!

No Need for All this Management,

At last God called Jacob to leave Laban, and Return Home.

But even then he could not be content to give Laban his authority for his action, and to depart as a man who did the will of God. He must follow his usual underhand course—must steal away unawares. Yet, in the main, he was doing the will of God, and "the angels of God met him." His communion with God in Padan-aram had been only occasional, and not very noticeable ; it always began on God's side, and was only on special occasions. Is it not so with many a child of God? But Jacob was at this time under a sense of danger. He had left home with the knowledge of Esau's threat to slay him as soon as his father should die. He had had no tidings of his father, and every step he took brought him nearer to that revengeful elder brother. Messengers had been sent on by him, and they returned with the tidings that Esau was on his way to meet him with four hundred men. To Jacob's ears this sounded like a death-knell to him and to his family. But

What About the Promises of God?

Could they fail? Was Esau stronger than God? Jacob did think of God, but not until he had taken every possible precaution himself. He divided his people into two bands, in order that if Esau slew the one, the other might escape. Most prudent, no doubt! But had not God said, "I . . . will keep thee in all places whither thou goest?" Was this to count for nothing? Having made his arrangements, he has a little prayer in which he acknowledges God's goodness, speaks very humbly of himself, and then asks God, he having done his best, to deliver him from Esau. But even then, not from brotherly generosity toward Esau, but lest, after all, God should betray him, he arranges sheep and cattle into so many droves, as a present whereby to appease his brother! No man could have done more ; Jacob would have been nearer God if he had done less.

His arrangements having been carried out to his satisfaction, "Jacob was left alone." Being, as he believed, the object of his brother's wrath, he took the place of greatest security, and waited to see the effect upon Esau of all which he had sent on before him. He was occupied with how Esau would deal with him. God was occupied with how Jacob was dealing with Him. While appealing to God, his real trust was in himself, and God would teach him that it was so. He was left alone ; neither the dreaded Esau, nor yet the loved ones who had gone on before, were with him, but in the darkness of the night, an unseen Stranger wrestled with him "till the breaking of the day." That long wrestling match went on through the darkness of the night, and neither the Stranger nor Jacob prevailed ; the odds were equal. At last, when the first streak of dawn appeared, and the Stranger saw that he did not prevail, He touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh, and thus disabled him. It was not a blow, but a touch that did it. Like the touch when He cleansed the leper, like the look when He looked on Peter, was that touch.

The Lord did Wonders by It.

With the "strained" sinew (R. V.), Jacob's own strength failed ; he had no longer power to wrestle, or to hinder the Stranger from overcoming him. The point of victory with each one of us is when we learn so much of our own nothingness and weakness that we cease to struggle against God ; then faith takes the place of effort, and rest in God, even in the most constant service, succeeds to planning, plotting, and anxiety. So long as we take the lead in work, and look upon God as a helper only, just so long are the odds terribly against us. So long as we superintend our own praying, and plan those things in which we are going to bring God over on to our side by our perseverance and fervency, just so long do we bear all the burden, and are doubtful as to the result. But when, as with Jacob, we are touched by God, when our own strength withers to nothing, and we can see nothing at all in ourselves that can prevail with God,

Then are We in the Place of Power, for then, looking away from ourselves to Him, we can see how impossible it is for God to fail us, and so we learn to count on Him.

The day was breaking, and the Stranger said, "Let me go, for the day breaketh." Now, and only now, when utterly disabled from fighting, can Jacob make his own terms, and he is not slow to do so. "I will not let Thee go, except Thou bless me." When self has shrunk like the sinew, and we see, not ourselves, but God, then we come with our title-deeds, God's written Word in our hands, and we come, authorized by Him as those that have a right to claim what His Word entitles us to. We cease to know whether we are fervent, but we do know that God is faithful. It is when God overcomes us, not when we overcome Him, that we prevail. The Stranger said to Jacob, "What is thy name? He owned his past name Jacob, supplanter, which recalled the wrong he had done in his father's house, and the undignified way in which he had dealt with Laban." And He said, "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel ; for thou hast had power with God, and thou shalt prevail against men" (R. V. margin).

Surely This was the Blessing.

Hebrew names are all significant of character ; he who had been a supplanter was now to be a prince with God. Jacob is now fully at his ease ; he says to the Stranger, "Tell me, I pray Thee, Thy name." And He said, "Wherefore is it that thou dost ask after My name? And He blessed him there." Abraham called God by the name borne out by each new revelation of Him ; so must Jacob ; God is to each of us individually what we find Him out to be according to His Word. Jacob "named the place Peniel ; for he said, 'I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved.'" Never before had he come to such close quarters with God. "The sun rose upon him," upon soul and body, upon past and future, as he passed over Penuel. Dear reader, have you had your Peniel—a point where your relations to God have been set right, where you have come to recognize that you are nothing, where God has conquered you, and put you in a position in which you can claim and take blessings from Him?"

THIS WILL OF MINE.

Laid on Thine altar, oh my Lord divine,
Accept my gift this day, for Jesus' sake:
I have no jewels to adorn Thy shrine,
Nor any world-famed sacrifice to make,—
But here I bring within my trembling hand
This will of mine,—a thing that seemeth small,
And only Thou, dear Lord, canst understand How, when I yield Thee this, I yield more all Hidden therein. Thy searching eye can see Struggles of passion, visions of delight,
The fair I love, or am, or fain would be,
Deep loves, fond hopes, and longings infinite.
It hath been wet with tears and dimmed with sighs,
Clenched in my grasp, till beauty it hath none.
Now from Thy footstool, where it vanquished lies,
The prayer ascendeth, "May Thy will be done."
Take it, oh Father, ere my courage fail;
And merge it so in Thine own will, that e'en
If some desperate hour my cries prevail,
And Thou give back my gift, it may have been
So changed, so purified, so fair have grown,
So one with Thee, so filled with peace divine,
I may not know or feel it as mine own,
But, gaining back my will, may find it Thine.

EMIN PASHA.

The Expedition for his Rescue—How he Came into Peril—His Noble Character and Beneficent Rule—Dr. Junker's Telegram—An Austrian Physician—General Gordon's Regard for Him—General Stone's Testimony—Latest News of Him.

On the first page are portraits of the brave commander Emin Pasha, now in imminent peril in Equatorial Africa, and of Dr. Junker, the Russian explorer, who has brought to the civilized world intelligence of his situation. There are many reasons for the general interest taken on both sides the Atlantic in the expedition for the relief of Emin, which the publication of Dr. Junker's news has called forth. The chief reason is that there is a strong sympathy with the work undertaken by Emin which has now involved him in peril. He was sent by General Gordon to his present position to intercept the slave-dealers, and to hold an advanced post of civilization in the interior of Africa. Right nobly has he done his work, winning the confidence and affection of the people, and maintaining his position by sheer force of character until the hostility of the slave-dealers, the fanaticism of the followers of the Mahdi, and the inhuman ferocity of King Mwanga, and the native savages have combined to raise against him an irresistible force. His outposts have been driven in and he has been forced back until surrounded by relentless foes. That this was his situation the world did not know until three months ago. It was suspected that he must be in straits, because the fall of General Gordon would naturally lead to an attack on Emin, but his success in dealing with savage potentates, and the respect with which he has inspired the natives under his immediate control, with the gratitude that they feel toward a man who has ruled them with a just and beneficent hand might, it was hoped, disarm hostility or bring him such support as would insure his safety. Some, however, believed that he must be dead as nothing had been heard of him for a long time. No one knew positively, and the public, while hoping for the best, feared the worst. On December 21st, 1886, came the intelligence which put an end to doubts. Dr. Junker, who had just reached Zanzibar on the eastern coast of Africa, cabled to the Paris office of the New York Herald this brief but stirring despatch: "An expedition to rescue Emin most urgent. The routes are now practicable if a strong, thoroughly well-organized expedition is sent. Best thing would be a strong expedition under command of Stanley. There will be fighting. I shall reach Cairo January 8th." The expedition under Mr. Henry M. Stanley, described in this journal on February 24th, was speedily organized and is now on its way to rescue him.

Emin Pasha's Record

is as noble as it is fascinating. He is an Austrian physician of profound learning and marked individuality. His real name is Dr. Schnitzler, and he was born in Austrian Silesia in 1846. He is therefore now forty-one years of age. Having studied medicine in Paris, Berlin, and Vienna, he obtained an appointment as surgeon in the Turkish army, and became the medical attendant of Midhat Pasha. In 1875, Dr. Emin Effendi, or Colonel Emin, as the Turks called him, was sent from Cairo to join Gordon Pasha, then Governor of the Egyptian Equatorial Provinces, where, for four years, he held the position of Surgeon-General of the province. Medicine alone, however, did not engross his attention, for Gordon, taking advantage of his remarkable powers in dealing with natives, and unusual linguistic acquirements, employed him in three diplomatic missions of considerable importance, viz., two to Uganda and one to Unyoro.

In 1878, Gordon, in his position as Governor-General of the whole Soudan, raised Dr. Emin Effendi to the rank of Bey, and appointed him Governor of the Egyptian Equatorial Provinces, which position he has faithfully maintained up to the present time. "His office was no sinecure, and the difficulty of his position can hardly be understood in this country," says Dr. Robert W. Felkin, who spent some time with him on the Nile in the year 1878. "Gordon's masterhand, which had organized the provinces, crushed the slave-dealers, and introduced had been removed, and one governor after another had allowed affairs to relapse into a state of chaos. The slave-dealers had regained some of their former power, discontent was clearly seen on all sides, and it needed, indeed, a strong man to restore order. Such a man Gordon found in Dr. Emin."

It would seem that Emin Bey took up his task with such enthusiasm that, by the end of 1880 most of the stations had been rebuilt, peace and order were established therein, and all of them, numbering about forty, were connected by a weekly post. Throughout the whole of the immense province crime was almost unknown, and solely through Emin's efforts, slavery was entirely abolished, and the district cleared of the slave-dealers, who had carried on an underhand but extensive traffic up to the time of his appointment. Moreover, the revenue of the provinces was increased, and his government became more than self-supporting; and this remarkable financial improvement was obtained, not by oppressive taxation, but by the practice of rigid economy and the suppression of abuses that had previously existed.

General Stone's Acquaintance with Emin was of a cordial character. While the famous American general, who died a few weeks ago in New York, was holding high office under the Khedive of Egypt in 1876, he was brought into official relations with Emin Pasha. In an interview with a reporter of the New York Herald, General Stone thus testified of his worth and ability: "In every position to which Emin Bey was promoted he fully justified the wisdom of the advancement by proving himself equal to the position, and even distinguished in it.

"He brought to bear for the advantage of the provinces under his command all his intelligence and all his high attainments in science, reconnoitring and mapping the countries he visited, doing all possible to improve the sanitary and material condition of the countries and inhabitants, and, at the same time, making scientific observations and notes, which were sent to Europe to extend knowledge of those distant and interesting lands.

"His garrisons were well cared for and good discipline was maintained in them; the people (native tribes) under his government were more happy and contented than ever before.

"I may here mention one circumstance indicating his solicitude for the troops and tribes under him. I sent to him from Cairo various kinds of American Indian corn to see how it might flourish in those regions—South Carolina, Georgia, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts seed, etc. He made a careful experiment with each and found the specimen best suited to the soil and climate and then sent for large quantities of the 'Pennsylvania early,' which proved to be the best for him, and which he planted extensively.

"With such a commander it is easy to conceive that the provinces of the Equator remained faithful and subject to authority when the rest of the Soudan, in 1881–82, rebelled against the authority of the Khedive and joined the Mahdi."

The Latest News of Emin is contained in a telegram dated Zanzibar, March 14th. It states that news has been received from Emin Bey to the effect that in November last he went to Uganda, and that King Mwanga refused to permit him to go through the country. Then Emin Bey tried to effect a passage out through Karagawa, on the western shore of Lake Victoria Nyanza. In this he also failed. He then returned to Wadelia, leaving a detachment of soldiers at Unyoro under the command of Casati, his sole European companion. Advices from Uganda, dated January 24th, say that Dr. Junker's caravan reached Emin Bey safely, and that a messenger returned with a quantity of ivory. Emin was well. This news is encouraging, and is, we may hope, a happy augury of success for the expedition.

DR. WILLIAM JUNKER.

The famous explorer, whose portrait accompanies that of Emin Pasha on the first page, is a man of remarkable endurance, self-reliance, and originality. With him, too, the late General Stone was brought into official connection during his life in Egypt. General Stone said of him: "Dr. William Junker is a Russian explorer who has made several valuable explorations in Central Africa, especially in the country west of the White Nile and between the Bahrel Gazel and the Equator. This last journey was made in the country of the Niam-Niam, with the more special object of ascertaining the true course of the river Welle, in order to decide whether that river might be an affluent of the Congo, as would seem to be indicated by Stanley's work; or took its course to the north-west, as was indicated by Dr. Schweinfurth. It is to be hoped that he has been able to solve that geographical question. Dr. Junker pursued an unusual course in his explorations, one which gave great value to his reports. It was his custom to enter a country alone and to reside for a long time in one place, thus becoming fully acquainted with the customs, habits and manners of the people, and more or less familiar with their language. Then he would push on to another more advanced position, where he would follow the same course, making thus friends and acquaintances in each region. His advances were more safe and easy, but the time required to cover a given length of route was, of course, much longer than had he pursued the usual course of explorers."

It is reported as an illustration of Dr. Junker's bold and astute character that he during his recent journey, as a means of gaining protection. Before going far from Albert Nyanza he ascertained that there was no hope of his getting through the territory of the Waganda and one or two other hostile tribes without aid. If he was not murdered he would, at least, be detained as a prisoner. In this emergency the novel idea occurred to Dr. Junker to sell himself as a slave to one of the Arab traders. A bargain was struck, and he ostensibly became the property of the trader. The contract stipulated that the Arab, for the sum of fifteen hundred Austrian dollars, was to deliver the traveller alive at Zanzibar where, upon the presentation of the contract the money would be paid to him by a firm doing business there. In his capacity as a slave Dr. Junker passed muster in the court of King Mwanga, and he was permitted to go in peace with his owner.

THE STANLEY EXPEDITION AT CAIRO.

The following is a press correspondent's report of the departure of Mr. Stanley and his expedition from Cairo:

On the morning of his departure from Cairo, I called on Mr. Stanley, who was staying at Shepheard's Hotel, to bid him "God-speed." He was superintending the packing of his baggage by his faithful servant, an American, I believe. "Nothing is certain," he said, "regarding my route until I reach Zanzibar. In fact, there are many contingencies that may cause me to adopt a route other than that I have now determined upon."

Mr. Stanley touched on the advantages of

The River Congo Route.

"Do you think," he said, energetically, "that my backers wish massacre and bloodshed? If we had to fight our way, and were victorious, hundreds of poor natives would be killed; and what have they done, I should like to know, that they should be slaughtered? What is Emin Pasha, after all, that these innocent people should be killed? What is Emin Pasha's value in comparison to the lives of men like Mackay, the Church of England missionary, gallant man that he is, and the other English missionaries? News would come at once to the King, 'Stanley is advancing at the head of 20,000 men,' for natives always exaggerate numbers. 'Ho! ho! Is he indeed?' the King would say, 'Off with the foreigners' heads. I'll teach Stanley to invade my territory.' My mission is entirely pacific. Those by whom I am commissioned wish for peace, not bloodshed." "Do you think," I asked, "that so far Christian missionaries have been successful?" "In a manner, yes. But not so far as spreading Christianity. The time has not arrived. They have to appear simply as men desirous to do good by way of teaching arts and imparting knowledge. Any very direct or too sudden attempt to propagate Christianity might be fatal to themselves and the great cause they serve. They have to approach the people gradually, and do their work with caution to avoid groundless suspicions.

Mr. Stanley's servant now entered to take down his luggage. "Well," said Stanley, with a smile, "it is time to commence my long journey. Remember, my mission is one not having for its object conquest, aggrandizement, or acquisition of territory, but one of peace and good-will. If all goes well I shall be but it may take me another month. The worst part of the journey, as far as health is concerned, is the mouth of the Congo, as it is malarious. I myself may die, or any number of my party. Otherwise I anticipate success, and that I shall accomplish what I go for comparatively without difficulty."

At ten minutes to noon Stanley stepped into his carriage, after shaking hands with those around. I should say that not more than fifty Europeans were present, and these were principally English. A good many official Egyptians, however, came to take a glimpse of the great American. Stanley will find more men, arms, and ammunition at Zanzibar, where he will organize this expedition according to information from Oscar Lenz, the Austrian explorer, who has just arrived at Zanzibar. This man has come from Victoria Nyanza, and has, it is supposed, important information regarding Emin Pasha.

On January 29th, Mr. Stanley wrote to Mr. Mackinnon, the Chairman of the Relief Fund Committee, containing an account of his proceedings at Cairo. He also gives some account of his

the Russian traveller, whom he finds "amiable, frank, and modest," and who answered every question without reserve. Dr. Junker, it appears, left Emin Pasha at Wadelai on January 1st, 1886, journeyed on toward the east coast, with a train of porters and donkeys, meeting several English missionaries, engineers, and German ivory merchants, by way of the Ugogo country, Mpwapwa, and the land of Usagara, to the seaport of Bagamoyo, opposite Zanzibar.

Mr. Stanley says that Dr. Junker is a short man, inclined to embonpoint. He wears a full beard, and the general cast of his face is strongly marked. His long thick hair is "brushed backward, Spurgeon fashion." He is amiable, frank, and modest. Mr. Stanley describes him as a

True and Loyal-hearted

African explorer, of whom Russia may make much. He pictures him "trudging patiently with his long caravan, making music with his accordion to the wondering tribes of the Welle-Makwa Valley, and collecting valuable facts for civilized mankind.

Mr. Stanley, with his sixty-one black soldiers of the Egyptian army, left Cairo on February 3d. He was accompanied by Dr. Junker as far as Suez, where he embarked for Zanzibar, in company with Dr. Parkes, of the Army Medical Department. The contrast between and the surrounding ones is said to be very marked, for, in the latter, the slave-dealers are to this hour carrying out, unchecked, their inhuman trade. Brutal acts of atrocious cruelty are daily perpetrated, villages are sacked, the aged killed, the strong men tortured with fiendish ingenuity, and the women and children carried away as slaves. Should Emin fall, or the Stanley expedition arrive too late, his province will inevitably relapse into the same hopeless condition, only it must be remembered that the people would then feel their position far more keenly, having experienced for some years a beneficent rule. How much this has been appreciated by them may be understood by the desperate way in which they have fought against their foes, who are anxious to enslave them, knowing, as they do, the misery they would suffer were they to be conquered. They have fought as only men fight whose homes and country are at stake.

The Pictures on the First Page illustrate the character of the people through whose country the Relief Expedition may have to press its onward way. The first is a village of the Shuli tribe, situated at the foot of Mount Shua. The people who live here are mild, docile, and industrious. The next shows some smiths of the Bari tribe, whose fame for courageous warriors is great among the Upper Nile regions. The third shows five fighting men or warriors of the Niam-Niam tribe, which has the unhappy reputation of sometimes indulging in orgies of cannibalism; and the fourth is a wizard of the same tribe.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Afraid to Risk a Hand.—A Temperance friend said: "A professor was lecturing to his class on philosophy, and with his ether heated on a small table before him, he said, 'This ether will not burn the hand at such and such a temperature.' The class took his word for it. Naming one of the students, he bade him come before the table, and inquired, 'Now, if you really believe that this ether will not burn, in token of your belief, put your hand in,' said the professor. The young fellow drew back, saying, 'I do believe, but I dare not put my hand in.' Ah, here came the testing-point! He would not risk his hand on his belief. This is what many do with Christ. They will say they do believe that He is able to save; but if you ask them to risk their souls in His hands, or their support on His provision, like the student they draw back, still keeping to their text that they do believe, but will not trust Him."

Breaking One Chain to Forge Another.— Mr. W. A. Campbell narrated a story of a man who had a large and happy family. "He was very happy on this earth, and, it may be, failed to give enough attention to the future, and put his family in the place of God. But the hand of death came, and took away one of the little ones, and another, and another, and still another. At the end of all his trials this is what he said: 'Heaven is now much more real to me than it ever was before. I feel as if I had more awaiting me there than I have to keep me here, and that I am, as it were, but waiting to cross over, that I might join my beloved ones. As my children one by one passed away I felt as if each loss were the breaking of a chain which bound me to this world, and the forging of another binding me to heaven!' The taking away of those near and dear to us is often the way the Lord takes to bring us the nearer to Himself; and this is not because of anger toward us, but because of His love. 'Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth.'"

A Startled Highland Shepherd.—"In the Highlands of Scotland there lived a shepherd who in his youth had been steady and well behaved, but as hardships and misfortunes gathered around him contracted loose habits, and often sought to drown his troubles in drink. The consequence was that his home, which had formerly been bright and happy, became more and more miserable, bare, and neglected. One night, coming home earlier than usual, he was surprised as he staggered up to the door to find it open. He thought he would listen to what they were saying inside, thinking, perhaps, they might be speaking about him; but they were better employed. The mother and her little children were holding family worship. The portion of Scripture which they were reading that night was the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew, and when they came to the passage about the separation of the sheep from the goats, the eldest of the children, a little boy, looked up into his mother's face and said, 'Mother, will father be among the goats then?' The inebriate man, skulking behind the door, heard the question; it sunk into his heart and sobered him at once. Would he be among the goats? Yes, he knew that he would if he died then. He went in and, kneeling down before them all, asked God for mercy and strength."

An Appeal to a Good Swimmer.—Mr. Oddie related recently: "Not long ago, I was speaking to a woman about her soul, and she said she hoped she was saved, but did not think that either I or any other person could state with certainty that he or she was saved, and that they were sure of it. A man, whom both the woman and myself knew, was standing alongside at the time, and I turned to him and said, 'You are a good swimmer; now, if I were to fall into the river, and you jumped in after me, and at the risk of your own life brought me safe to the bank, do you think when I could once more feel the solid earth under my feet, that I should have any doubt about my being safe, or to whom I owed my salvation?' When the Lord Jesus, at the price of His own precious blood, rescued my soul from everlasting death, I know that His sacrifice of Himself was sufficient to atone for my sin. We don't require to go on hoping, but can safely rest on God's promises."

Loving the Double-dealing and Two-faced.— Mr. J. G. Forbes said: "Last week I was speaking of the love of God to us, and His commandment that we should love one another. After the meeting, as I was going home with a friend, and we were talking over the subject, my friend said to me, 'Well, there is just one person in the whole world that I feel it impossible to love.' 'That settles the whole thing,' I rejoined; 'you have just to ask the Lord to help you to love that one person.' 'But,' she replied, 'you don't know that person, how double-dealing and two-faced she is. She will come to you with smiles, and words of love and kindness, will put her arms around you, and seem to be your truest friend; but the moment you and she separate, she will spread the most outrageous falsehoods about you, will assign wrong motives to your actions, and try to injure you in any way she can. No,' she continued, 'I could never love that person.' 'But,' I said, 'there is nothing specially good in loving people who love us. Do not even worldly people do so? The superiority of the Christian is that he loves those who hate him, and is kind to those who spitefully use him.'"

A Cake Raffled for at a Bazaar.—A Devoted Christian worker observed: "A boy asked his mother, a Christian lady, for some money to buy a ticket for a silver watch, which was to be raffled for in a rum-shop. His mother was horrified, and indignantly and vehemently rebuked him. 'But, mother,' he answered, 'did you not make and bake a big cake to be raffled for at the Sunday-school bazaar?' 'Oh,' she replied, 'that was for the church.' 'But if it were wrong,' rejoined the boy, 'would doing it for the church make it right? Would it be right for me to steal money to put in the collections? And if it be right for the church, is it not right for me to get this watch if I can?' The mother was silent. Neither she nor any one else can answer the lad's argument. The practice of raffling is either right or wrong. Why should people raise money for church purposes by such questionable means? Is not the Lord, to whom these churches belong, able to supply the funds required without such proceedings? If we were content to let God do more, do it all, and but put ourselves in His hands, we should then see God work as of old."

CHEER FOR THE DISHEARTENED.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, March 20, 1887, in the Second Presbyterian Church at Kansas City, Mo.

"No man cared for my soul."—Psalm 142 : 4.

Scarcity of Sympathy with Spiritual Woe—Effectual Sermons to an Audience of One—The Yearning for Help—Solitary Anxiety—Opportunities Missed—In Business Disaster—In Bereavement—In a Revival—Universal Concern—A Frenzied Captain of a Burning Ship—No Help for the Silent Man—How Christ Feels About It—A Father Waiting at the Depot for his Son—A Sailor Converted at the Brooklyn Tabernacle—A Tragic Death.

David, the rubicund lad, had become the battle-worn warrior. Three thousand armed men in pursuit of him, he had hidden in the cave of Engedi, near the coast of the Dead Sea. Utterly fagged out with the pursuit, as you have often been worn out with the trials of life, he sat down and cried out, "No man cared for my soul."

If you should fall through a hatchway, or slip from a scaffolding, or drop through a skylight, there would be hundreds of people who would come around and pick up your body and carry it to the home or to the hospital. I saw a great crowd of people in the street, and I asked, "What is the matter?" and I found out that a poor laboring man had fallen under sunstroke and all our eyes were filled with tears at the thought of his distracted wife and his desolated home. We are all sympathetic with physical disaster, but how Little Sympathy for Spiritual Woes!

There are men in this house who have come to mid-life who have never yet been once personally accosted about their eternal welfare. A great sermon dropped into an audience of hundreds of thousands will do its work; but if this world is ever to be brought to God, it will be through little sermons preached by private Christians to an audience of one. The sister's letter postmarked at the village; the word uttered in your hearing, half of smiles and half of tears; the religious postscript to a business letter; the card left at the door when you had some kind of trouble; the anxious look of some one across a church aisle while an earnest sermon was being preached, swung you into the kingdom of God.

But there are hundreds of people in this house who will take the word that David used in the past tense and employ it in the present tense, and cry out, "No man cares for my soul." You feel as you go out day by day in the tug and jostle of life that it is

Every Man for Himself.

You can endure the pressure of commercial affairs, and would consider it almost impertinent for any one to ask you whether you are making or losing money. But there have been times when you would have drawn your cheque for thousands of dollars if some one would only help your soul out of its perplexities. There are questions about your higher destiny that ache, and distract, and agonize you at times. Let no one suppose that because you are busy all day with hardware, or dry-goods, or groceries, or grain, that your thoughts are no longer than your yard-stick, and stop at the brass-headed nails of the store counter. When you speak once about religious things you think a thousand times. They call you a worldling; you are

Not a Worldling.

Of course you are industrious and keep busy, but you have had your eyes opened to the realities of the next world. You are not a fool. You know better than any one can tell you that a few years at most will wind up your earthly engagements, and that you will take residence in a distant sphere where all your business adroitness would be a superfluity. You sometimes think till your head aches about great religious subjects. You go down the street with your eyes fixed on the pavement, oblivious of the passing multitudes, your thoughts gone on eternal expedition. You wonder if the Bible is true; how much of it is literal, and how much is figurative; if Christ be God; if there is anything like retribution; if you are immortal; if a resurrection will ever take place; what the occupation of your departed kindred is; what you will be ten thousand years from now. With a cultured placidity of countenance you are on fire with agitations of soul. Oh, this of your whole lifetime! You have sold goods to or bought them from Christian people for ten years, and they have never whispered one word of spiritual counsel. You have passed up and down the aisles of churches with men who knew that you had no hope of heaven, and talked about the weather, and about your physical health, and about everything but that concerning which you most wanted to hear them speak—namely, your everlasting spirit. Times without number you have felt in your heart, if you have not uttered it with your lips, "No man cares for my soul."

There have been times when you were especially pliable on the great subject of religion. It was so, for instance, after you had lost your property. You had a great many letters blowing you up for being unfortunate. You showed that there had been a concatenation of circumstances, and that your insolvency was no fault of yours. Your creditors talked to you as though they would have a hundred cents on a dollar or your life. Protest after protest tumbled in on your desk. Men who used to take your hand with both of theirs and shake it violently, now pass you on the street with an almost imperceptible nod. After six or eight hours of scalding business anxiety you go home, and you shut the door and throw yourself on the sofa, and you feel in a state of despair. You wish that some one would come in and break up the gloom. Everything seems to be against you. The bank against you. Your creditors against you. Your friends, suddenly become critical, against you. All the past against you. All the future against you. You make reproachful outcry, "No man cares for my soul."

There was another occasion when all the doors of your heart swung Open for Sacred Influences.

A bright light went out in your household. Within three or four days there were compressed sickness, death, obsequies. You were so lonely that a hundred people coming into the house did not break up the solitariness. You were almost killed with the domestic calamity. A few formal, perfunctory words of consolation were uttered on the stairs before you went to the grave; but you wanted some one to come and talk over the whole matter, and recite the alleviations, and decipher the lessons of the dark bereavement. No one came. Many a time you could not sleep until two or three o'clock in the morning, and then your sleep was a troubled dream, in which was re-enacted all the scene of sickness, and parting, and dissolution. Oh, what days and nights they were! No man seemed to care for your soul.

There was another occasion when your heart was very susceptible. There was

A Great Awakening.

There were hundreds of people who pressed into the kingdom of God—some of them acquaintances, some business associates, yes, perhaps some members of your own family were baptized by sprinkling or immersion. Christian people thought of you and they called at your store, but you were out on business. They stopped at your house; you had gone around to spend the evening. They sent a kindly message to you; somehow, by accident, you did not get it. The life-boat of the Gospel swept through the surf, and everybody seemed to get in but you. Everything seemed to escape you. One touch of personal sympathy would have pushed you into the kingdom of God. When on communion-day your friends went in and your sons and daughters went into the church, you buried your face in your handkerchief and sobbed, "Why am I left out? Everybody seems to get saved but me. No man cares for my soul."

Hearken to a revelation I have to make. It is

A Startling Statement.

It will so surprise you that I must prove it as I go on. Instead of this total indifference all about you in regard to your soul, I have to tell you that heaven, earth, and hell are after your immortal spirit. Earth to cheat it. Hell to destroy it. Heaven to redeem it. Although you may be a stranger to the Christians in this house, their faces would glow and their hearts would bound if they saw you make one step heavenward. So intricate and far-reaching is this web of sympathy, that I could by one word rouse a great many prayers in your behalf. No one care for your soul! Why, one signal of distress on your part would thrill this audience with holy excitement.

If a boat in any harbor should get in distress, from the men of war, and from the sloops, and from the steamers, the flying paddles would pull to the rescue. And if now you would lift one signal of distress, all these voyagers of eternity would bear down toward you and bring you relief. But no. You are at sea. They keep the hatches down, and the captain is frenzied, and he gives orders that no one hail the passing ships. He says, "I shall either land this vessel in Hamburg or on the bottom of the ocean, and I don't care which." Yonder is a ship of the White Star Line passing. Yonder one of the National Line. Yonder one of the Cunard Line. Yonder one of the Inman Line. But they know not there is any calamity happening on that one vessel. Oh, if the captain would only put his trumpet to his lip and cry out, "Lower your boats! Bear down this way! We are burning up! Fire! Fire!" No, no. No signal is given. If that vessel perishes, having hailed no one, whose fault will it be? Will it be the fault of the ship that hid its calamity, or will it be the fault of the vessels that, passing on the high seas, would have been glad to furnish relief if it had been only asked? In other words, my brother, if you miss heaven it will be your own fault.

No one care for your soul! Why, in all the ages there have been men whose entire business was soul-saving. In this work Munson went down under the knives of the cannibals whom he had come to save, and Robert McCheyne preached himself to death by thirty years of age, and John Bunyan was thrown into a dungeon in Bedfordshire, and Jehudi Ashman endured all the malarias of the African jungle; and there are hundreds and thousands of Christian men and women now who are praying, toiling, preaching, living, dying to save souls.

No one care for your soul! Have you heard

How Christ Feels About It?

I know it was only five or six miles from Bethlehem to Calvary—the birthplace and the deathplace of Christ—but who can tell how many miles it was from the throne to the manger? How many miles down, how many miles back again? The place of His departure was the focus of all splendor and pomp. All the thrones facing His throne. His name the chorus in every song and the inscription on every banner. His landing-place a cattle-pen, malodorous with unwashed brutes, and dogs growling in and out of the stable. Born of a weary mother who had journey eighty miles in severe unhealth that she might find the right place for the Lord's nativity—born, not as other princes, under the flash of a chandelier, but under a lantern swung by a rope to the roof of the barn. In that place Christ started to save you. Your name, your face, your time, your eternity, in Christ's mind. Sometimes travelling on mule's back to escape King Herod's massacre, sometimes attempting nervous sleep on the chilly hill-side, sometimes earning His breakfast by the carpentry of a plough. In Quarantania the stones of the field, by their shape and color, looking like the loaves of bread, tantalizing His hunger. Yet all the time keeping on after you. With drenched coat treading the surf of Gennesaret. Howled after by a bloodthirsty mob. Denounced as a drunkard. Mourning over a doomed city, while others shouted at the sight of the shimmering towers. All the time coming on and Coming on to Save You.

Indicted as being a traitor against government, perjured witnesses swearing their souls away to insure His butchery. Flogged, spit on, slapped in the face, and then hoisted on rough lumber, in the sight of earth, and heaven, and hell, to purchase your eternal emancipation. From the first infant step to the last step of manhood on the sharp spike of Calvary a journey for you. Oh, how

He Cared for Your Soul!

By dolorous arithmetic add up the stable, the wintry tempest, the midnight dampness, the abstinence of forty days from food, the brutal Sanhedrim, the heights of Golgotha, across which all the hatreds of earth and all the furies of hell charged with their bayonets, and then dare to say again that no one cares for your soul.

A young man might as well go off from home and give his father and mother no intimation as to where he has gone, and, crossing the seas, sitting down in some foreign country, cold, sick, and hungry and lonely, saying, "My father and mother don't care anything about me." Do not care anything about him! Why, that father's hair has turned gray since his son went off. He has written to all the consuls in the foreign ports asking about that son. Does not the mother care anything about him? He has broken her heart. She has never smiled since he went away. All day long, and almost all night, she keeps asking, "Where is he? Where can he be?" He is the first thought in her prayer and the last thought in her prayer—the first thought in the morning and the last at night. She says, "O God, bring back my boy. I must see him again before I die. Where is he? I must see him again before I die." Oh, do not his father and mother care for him? You go away from your heavenly Father, and you think He does not care for you because you will not even read the letters by which He invites you to come back, while all heaven is waiting, and waiting and waiting for you to return.

A young man said to his father, "I am going off; I will write to you and tell you where I am." Many years have passed along since that son went away, and for years the father has been going to the depot in the village on the arrival of every train, and when he hears the whistle in the distance he is thrilled with excitement, and he waits until all the passengers have come out, and then he waits until the train has gone clear out of sight again, and then he goes home, hastening back to the next train; and he will be at every train until that son comes back, unless the son waits until the father be dead. But oh, the greater patience of God! He has been waiting for you not seven years, not nine years, but for some of you twenty years, thirty years, forty years, fifty years—waiting, calling—waiting, calling, until nothing but omnipotent patience could have endured it. Oh, my brother, do not take the sentiment of my text as your sentiment! We do care for your soul.

One Sabbath night years ago in my church in Brooklyn a young man appeared at the end of the platform, and he said to me, "I have just come off the sea." I said, "When did you arrive?" Said he, "I came into port this afternoon. I was in a great 'blow' off Cape Hatteras this last week, and I thought that I as to hell. I thought the ship would sink; but, sir, I never very seriously thought about my soul until to-night." I said to him, "Do you feel that Christ is able and willing to save you?" "Oh, yes," he replied, "I do." "Well," I said, "now are you willing to come and be saved by Him?" "I am," he said. "Well, will you now, in the prayer we are about to offer, give yourself to God for time and eternity?" "I will," he said. Then we knelt in prayer, and after we had got through praying he told me that the great transformation had taken place. I could not doubt it. He is on the sea now. I do not know what other port he may gain, but I think he will gain the harbor of heaven.

"Star of peace, beam o'er the billow,
Bless the soul that sighs for Thee;
Bless the sailor's lonely pillow,
Far, far at sea."

It was sudden conversion with him that night. Oh, that it might be sudden conversion with you to-day! God can save you in one moment as well as He can in a century. There are sudden deaths, sudden calamities; why not Sudden Deliverances?

God's Spirit is infinite in speed. He comes here with omnipotent power, and He is ready here and now, instantaneously and forever, to save your soul. I believe that a multitude of you will to-day come to God. I feel you are coming, and you will bring along your families and your friends with you. They have heard in heaven already of the step you are about to take. The news has been cried along the golden streets, and has rung out from the towers, "A soul saved! A soul saved!" But there is some one here to-day who will reject this Gospel. He will stay out of the kingdom of God himself. He will keep his family and his friends out. It is a dreadful thing for a man just to plant himself in the way of life, then keep back his children, keep back his companion in life, keep back his business partners—refuse to go into heaven himself, and refuse to let others go in.

Tragic Death of a Rejecter.

A young man, at the close of a religious service, was asked to decide the matter of his soul's salvation. He said, "I will not do it to-night." Well, the Christian man kept talking with him, and he said, "I insist that to-night you either take God or reject Him." "Well," said the young man, "if you put it that way, I will reject Him. There now, the matter's settled." On his way home on horseback, he knew not that a tree had fallen aslant the road, and he was going at full speed, and he struck the obstacle and dropped lifeless. That night his Christian mother heard the riderless horse plunging about the barn, and suspecting that something terrible was the matter, she went out and came to the place where her son lay, and she cried out, "O Henry! dead and not a Christian. Oh, my son! my son! dead and not a Christian. O Henry! Henry! dead and not a Christian." God keep us from such a catastrophe.

AN ATHEIST'S CHANGED LIFE.

The physical and moral change produced by conversion in an atheist is described in the Watchword by Dr. J. B. Walker, who knows the man. He says: "The first time that I met him was at the house of his son-in-law. His appearance was that of a decrepit, disconsolate old man. In the course of conversation he unhesitatingly expressed his unbelief of the existence of a God, and his suspicion of the motives of most of those who professed religion. I learned from others that he had ceased in some measure to have intercourse with men—had become misanthropic in his feelings, regarding mankind in the light of a family of sharks, preying upon each other; and his own duty in such a state of things, he supposed to be, to make all honest endeavors to wrest from the grasp of others as much as he could. He used profane language, opposed the temperance reformation, and looked with the deepest hatred upon the ministers of religion. His social affections seemed to be withered, and his body, sympathizing, was distorted and diseased by rheumatic pains.

"One of the first things which he did after his conversion was to love, in a practical manner, his worst enemy. There was one man in the village who had, as he supposed, dealt treacherously with him in some money transactions which had occurred between them. On this account, personal enmity had long existed between the two individuals. When converted, he sought his old enemy and asked his forgiveness.

"Many have been led to repent and believe in Christ through his instrumentality. Some of these were individuals whose former habits rendered a change of character very improbable in the eyes of most individuals. One of them, who had fallen into the habit of intemperance, is now a respectable and happy father of a respectable Christian family. He has been known to go to several families on the same day, pray with them, and invite them to attend religious worship on the Sabbath. And when some difficulty was stated as a hindrance to their attendance, he has assisted them to buy shoes, and granted other little aids of the kind, in order that they might attend divine service.

"When converted, one of his first acts, although he had heard nothing of any such act in others, was to make out a list of all his old associates then living within reach of his influence. For the conversion of these he determined to labor as he had opportunity, and pray daily. On his list were one hundred and sixteen names, among whom were sceptics, drunkards, and other individuals as little likely to be reached by Christian influence as any other men in the region. Within two years one hundred of these had made a profession of religion.

"As soon as his moral nature had undergone a change, his body, by sympathy, felt the benign influence. His countenance assumed a milder and more intelligent aspect. He became more tidy in his apparel, and his 'thousand pains,' in a good measure left him, and his body, like his soul, has undergone complete renovation."

A BARONESS AT A MISSION.

In the McAll Record, Mr. R. Saillens, one of the most efficient of the colleagues of the Rev. R. W. McAll in his French mission work, reports the following incident:

Our meetings of the Rue Royale are attended by a lady, the Baroness ——, who has never missed a Sunday afternoon for several years, except through illness. She had, though herself a Protestant by birth, been living all her life among Roman Catholics, and has still many friends even among the clergy. We thought her case was not an interesting one, for, although very kind, amiable and polite to the evangelists, she seemed to have difficulty in understanding the Gospel of faith and grace. Last Sunday, however, the address was on the "Gift of God," and she said to the speaker, with tears in her eyes, "I have received the gift." She gave, a few days before, about five hundred dollars to the mission in cash and jewels.

A MISSIONARY ON A BED OF ADDERS.

Mrs. Ellen Cushing, who, with her husband, has been engaged in missionary work in Burmah for many years, in addressing the Foreign Missionary Union at the recent anniversary meeting in Philadelphia, told the following incident of life in that wild country: "We had been travelling through the country away from any settlement for several days," she said, "and one afternoon, when it was unadvisable to proceed farther that day, feeling very tired I threw a blanket upon a pile of dead leaves and lay down to have a quiet nap. I had hardly closed my eyes when, feeling something crawling on me, I looked, to find with horror that it was a deadly brown adder. The reptile was nearly five feet long, and he was sliding slowly across me. To move or cry out would have been instant death, so I determined to lie perfectly still and pretend to be without life. Closing my eyes and holding my breath I waited until the adder crawled slowly along and over my face. His cold, slimy body in touching my face produced such a sensation that it was nearly more than I could do to remain passive, but I managed to do so until the reptile had gotten away some distance, and then I jumped up and screamed just like a woman. The coolies and my husband ran to my assistance, and when they stirred up the leaves on which I had made my bed adders came squirming out in all directions. It seems that I had laid on a nest of them."

THE FALL OF A TRAPEZE PERFORMER.

THE Woman with the Iron Jaw, whose performances have been widely advertised in the newspapers, was seriously injured recently at Baltimore by a fall. She is an acrobat, whose fame in her profession has been won by a perilous feat. It consists in hanging suspended from a grooved wheel by a piece of leather which she holds between her teeth. The wheel is fixed on a tight wire, one end of which is attached to a point near the roof of a theatre and the other end to the back of the stage. The wheel is run up to the highest point, and when the woman has seized the leather in her teeth it is let go and runs rapidly down the wire to the stage, the woman being carried with it, as she hangs by her teeth to the leather attachment. Recently she fell when she had travelled ten feet from the starting-point, and when she was twenty feet above the floor. She screamed as she fell, but became unconscious when she struck the seats and rolled to the floor. She was injured internally, and now lies in a critical condition. It is supposed that the leather must have slipped from between her teeth, or that her jaws temporarily lost their power. She, and those who encouraged her by going to witness the performance, incurred a heavy responsibility, as some such catastrophe sooner or later was inevitable. Her fall came through over-estimating her own power. Many a spiritual fall proceeds from the same cause. Those alone are safe who, warned by the example of Peter (Mark 14 : 31), distrust themselves, and rely on Him who is able to keep them from falling (Jude 24).

A THUMB OUT OF JOINT.

DR. ELDER CUMMING, speaking at a recent conference, said : "A wealthy lady had in some way injured her thumb. A doctor assured her that the only thing possible to do was to cut it off. This caused great distress in the home of that lady, and before submitting to be thus maimed for life, she determined to go to London and see a professor of surgery, famed for his successful treatment of such cases. This gentleman, when he had examined her hand, and heard her story about it, smiled and said, 'You may rest quite content, it will never require to be taken off. It is only out of joint.' Then the doctor, taking her hand, touched her thumb in what seemed to her rather a rough way ; then there was a kind of crack, and the doctor said, 'There, now, it is all right ; just wait a few days, and it will be as good as ever ;' and time proved the truth of what he said. Similarly the soul of a man before his conversion is, in a manner, a soul out of joint ; and it has to be adjusted by rest in, prayer to, and faith upon Christ. Many people think if they remove or cut off this evil thing or that other wickedness, that all will be right, not knowing that they are wholly out of joint and require to be readjusted by Christ Jesus, the Divine Healer."

A MOTHER THREATENED BY HER SON.

IN North China, about eighty miles from Paoting-fu, is a village to which Dr. Porter recently paid a visit. From his interesting account of it, published in the Missionary Herald, we take the following : "As the Sabbath drew toward its close, twelve women, two girls, and a young man, together with four children, were baptized into the Blessed Name. There were the aged mother and two sisters and an aunt and several of their neighbors and acquaintances. It was pathetic to hear the aunt and sisters tell how they had waited, amid opposition and contempt, for this to them happy hour of confessing Christ. One large, loud-voiced woman who had devoted her life to an 'incense-burning sect' laughed at her own previous folly. She had bitterly opposed her son, who said, 'Well, if you waste money in incense, I'll spend it on drink. We'll see who will go the farthest.' Then they both turned toward Christianity, the son first and then the mother. She had reviled him for his obstinacy in listening to the Gospel, when, lo ! a surprise to herself, she had an irresistible desire to accept the new truth. This was only last spring. Several of these women, owing to the Christian conversation in the family, had a noticeable comprehension of the truth and of Christian life. They are all closely bound together and have found others wishing to join with them in the Sunday services "

A CONGO BOY PLEADING FOR ADOPTION.

DR. SIMS, who is laboring on the Congo and whose portrait was recently published in this journal, narrates the following incident which is published in Dr. Dowkontt's Medical Missionary Record :

We have over twenty boys attending our school now, and twelve or fifteen of them live with us at the station and very rarely go to their own villages. Some of these boys are slaves who live with us through the consent of their owners ; most of them are free boys. All of them live with us by choice. We are now able to have prayers with them in their own language. When we have services crowds of people gather and look on in much astonishment.

One poor little slave boy about six years old came many times and begged me to go to his owner and get his permission for the boy to come and live with us. I was very much attracted by this dear little boy and asked him, "Who is your owner ?" "Ranangesi." "Where are your friends ?" "I have no friends." "Where are your brothers ?" "I have no brothers." "Where are your father and mother ?" "I have no father or mother ; I wish you to be my father." "Where is your home ?" "I came from far away ; I should like your house to be my home." Poor little homeless, friendless Loleka, I could not resist his entreaties, and went to his chief and got his consent for the boy to come and live here.

SEVENTY-EIGHT SAILORS SAVED THROUGH A CARD.

A FEW months ago a sailor, on the first day of his voyage to New York, was cleaning out his berth when he found a card about the size of the palm of his hand, which had been tossed aside by some former occupant. A group of prettily painted flowers upon it attracted his attention, and he looked at it more closely. Turning it over he saw on the reverse the words, "Are you saved or are you lost ?" He read them and he began to think. There was no doubt in his mind about the answer to that question in his own case. The remedy, too, was pointed out, "The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost." One other matter the card contained and that was an invitation : "Come to the Berachah Mission, 405 West Twenty-ninth Street." The man's aroused conscience and the circumstances of the voyage, led him to register a vow, that if God spared him to reach New York he would go to the Berachah Mission.

God did spare him, and the sailor kept his word. He went to the mission, told his story, listened to the Gospel message, joined in the prayers offered for his salvation, and went away rejoicing in Christ. "Now," said he, "I am going to work for the Lord." He had a large circle of seafaring acquaintances and he lost no time in testifying to them. In a short time that man had brought over two hundred sailors from the ships at the water front of New York to the mission. Many were impressed, many requested prayers, and a large number, after visiting the mission several times, gave their hearts to the Lord.

One of these converts was a sailor on the Lepanto of the Wilson Line. His name was John Lawson, and he hailed from North Shields, England. As he left the mission on the night of his conversion he bade good-by to the man who had brought him there, for the Lepanto was to sail next morning. Grasping his friend's hand, the peace and joy of Christ filling his heart, he recognized that this parting was different from all partings that had gone before it, because he now had an assurance that the changes of life could not touch. "Now," said Lawson, to the sailor to whom under God he owed this blessing. "Now, if I never meet you on earth again I shall meet you in heaven," and with those words, telling of faith and assurance on his lips, John Lawson wended his way through the darkness down to the dock where his ship lay. The next morning while all hands were busy getting the Lepanto out of the dock John Lawson was sent aloft on duty. While working on the yard-arm, seventy feet above the iron deck, in the nipping air of a wintry morning his foot slipped from the rope, and he fell headlong to the deck. His crushed and mangled corpse was taken up and sent ashore. A great crowd of sailors went with it to the Berachah Mission, and there in the place where, only the night before, John Lawson had passed from death into life, his funeral services were held. The sailors subscribed a small sum to have a statement of the facts engrossed and framed, and it now hangs in the mission.

Such an event could not but produce a deep impression on the minds of all who knew of it. During the next two weeks the sailors who came to the mission were counted at each service, and they formed a total of four hundred and forty-seven. The results will be known only in eternity. What we do know is that a large number have given evidence of their conversion. One fact speaks volumes : On March 1st, thirteen ships sailed away from New York, and on each one was a little company of men who, at the Berachah Mission, had pledged themselves to Christ. In all there were seventy-eight men, out of those thirteen crews, who had all been led to the mission by the one sailor, who had himself come there first in response to the invitation on the card.

Mr. and Mrs. Naylor, who support the mission, and labor personally in it, are extending this branch of the work encouraged by God's blessing upon it. A little company of workers goes regularly down to the docks, meets incoming ships, scatters invitations among the sailors, and occasionally holds a service on shipboard. They have now secured more commodious quarters for the mission near at hand which will shortly be opened.

SAVED THROUGH A VISION.

THE following remarkable experience is contained in a thrilling description of his conversion, which is handed to us for publication by Mr. John Boyd : "My conversion to God began with a revelation of my lost condition, accompanied by conviction of sin, and self-despair. The lake of fire, and the adversary of God and man seemed to the eye of my soul as distinctly visible as any object in the material universe. The experience of the Day of Judgment passed through my conscience. It was not any particular sin or sins, so much as my state of hopeless alienation from the life of God, which worked in me the despair that seemed unavailing. I might justly have been called a religious, rather than an ungodly, sinner ; but my case, I conceive, was worse on that account, for I believe that it is more difficult for the Holy Spirit to awaken and quicken a religious moralist than a consciously active transgressor. At the right moment, when the Great Awakener, with the ploughshare of the law, had effectually accomplished His work in the soil of my conscience, a friend told me the glad news of God's redeeming love. My awakened soul drank in the message with avidity. I hastened to my room, fell on my knees, and prayed earnestly. After doing so, and as I remained in the kneeling posture, I seemed to see a vision of surpassing splendor. The eye of faith perceived the risen Redeemer, with countenance lit up with celestial radiance, and a smile of ineffable love, welcoming me to His arms and heart. He was robed in spotless white, and turning toward me, with extended hand, was the pierced side, the crimson 'precious blood,' oozing therefrom. In rapture I gazed upon the vision of the Holy One, and adored the matchless splendor of His person, and the divine significance of His sacrificial work. I could have gazed for hours, but almost in an instant my mind's eye lost the sight. I arose from my knees, and, in the strength of a new-born faith, begotten just then in my heart, I cried in an ecstasy, 'Glory to God! I'm saved! I see it all! Sin, begone! Satan, begone! Unbelief, begone! I'll doubt no more.'

"I slept soundly that night, and in the morning the blessed Spirit filled my heart with rushing, burning, melting, witnessing power. The glory and the love, which no language formed by human thought can describe, swept through my being in heavenly waves. I had the distinct consciousness in my heart that all my sins were forgiven, and I felt that the Holy Spirit witnessed to the fact.

THE END OF THIS AGE ABOUT A.D. 1,900,

Or within a Year or so of it, as Shown by the 6,000 Years and the Year-day Fulfilment of the Prophetic Dates of 2,520, 2,300, 1,335, 1,290, 1,260, 396, and 360 Years.

By the Rev. M. Baxter.

A Secondary Commencement of the 1,260 years of the Papal Antichrist's temporal power has been held by many expositors to be at the Emperor Phocas's decree in 606–8, granting increased supremacy to the Pope, and constituting him universal Bishop over all the dioceses, even that of Constantinople, for in 588 the Patriarch of Constantinople had resisted and denied the authority of the Bishop of Rome. Boniface IV. was at that time Pope, from 607 to 614, and this may be regarded as a fuller establishment of the Pope's temporal power. Bower, in his "Standard History of the Popes," strenuously maintains that Phocas's decree in 607 is thus regarded by historians, and by Roman Catholic authorities themselves. The dedication of the Pantheon, previously a noted heathen temple, in Rome to Popish worship took place in 608. It is remarkable that in September, 1870, at a distance of about 1,260 years from Phocas's decree, the Pope completely lost his temporal power and sovereignty over Rome, by the Italian army capturing it and making it the capital of Italy *

In 1655, Nathaniel Stephens in his book, "Calculation of the Name and Number of the Beast," said, "I find a great consent in the commentaries, controversies, and histories of the Church; and indeed many authors, if you put them upon it to state the origin of the wild Beast's kingdom, do generally in a manner pitch upon the year 606 when Pope Boniface received from the Emperor Phocas the title of Universal Bishop, or Head of the Churches. Crakanthorp in his treatise against Spalato calleth it the cornerstone of the building."

The era of 608 to 637 was also the date of the manifestation of the Mohammedan Antichrist in the Eastern Roman Empire, as well as of the Papal Antichrist in the Western Roman Empire. Mohammed's earliest public preaching of the doctrine of Mohammedanism and publication of the Koran was during the years 608–22, and the Mohammedans date their Calendar and reckon the commencement of their religion from A.D. 622; but they did not capture Mecca till 630, nor Jerusalem till 636–7.

In Revelation 11 : 2, the 1,260 years are given as the duration of the principal persecuting power of the Mohammedan Antichrist in relation to Jerusalem; and here the 1,260 years is called 42 months, thus pointing to the lunar reckoning of time by the Mohammedans. "The holy city (Jerusalem) shall the Gentile invaders tread under foot 42 months." The Mohammedans first invaded and conquered Syria in A.D. 635–6, and after four months' siege of Jerusalem captured it in 636–7 and erected, on the site of Solomon's temple, which has now stood there for nearly 1,260 years. Sir Isaac Newton, Whiston, Dr. Keith and others consider this year 636 to be the beginning of the Mohammedan Woe under the fifth year-day trumpet. Dating these predicted 1,260 years of the treading down of the Holy City from 636–7 they will end in 1896–7; and then may follow the three and a half years of the slaying of Protestant witnesses throughout Christendom, as foretold by many writers, such as Revs. T. Scott, the commentator, Dr. Gill, Dr. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Berg, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, etc., to occur at the close of this Christian Dispensation in the year-day fulfilment of Revelation 11 : 7–12.

The Mohammedan Mosque of Omar,

The 1,335 days mentioned in Daniel's 12th chapter are only an extension of the solar 1,260 years (1,260 days and 3½ times—Daniel 12 : 7–12), and not of the lunar 1,260 years (the 42 months—Rev. 11 : 2).

The Rev. Thomas Scott said, in his six-volumed Commentary on the Bible on Daniel 11 and 12: "It is remarkable that the doctrine of Mahomet was first forged at Mecca, and the supremacy of the Pope was established by a grant from the Emperor Phocas in the very same year of Christ 606, so that the Eastern and Western Antichrists began their reign together and will probably terminate them at no great distance of time from each other. The 'time times and an half' signify literally three and a half years, that is, 1,260 prophetical days or years which are to be calculated from the period when the antichristian usurpers began to scatter the power of the holy people by false doctrines, persecutions and religious wars until the approaching and not very far distant period when these Powers shall be subverted. The imposture of Mahomet and the Papal usurpation began about the same time and both included, as a twofold attack upon the Christian Church, during these 1,260 years. The 1,290 prophetical days or years must be calculated from the same point of time as the 1,260 years and reach thirty years beyond them. The subversion of the kingdom of the Papal Power and of the Mohammedan delusion will probably be at the end of the 1,260 years, and thirty years more may be taken up in wholly extirpating the Antichristian Powers." Scott says on Revelation 15, "As regards the computations that have been made as to the period when the 1,260 years will end, none, as it appears to me, suppose that they will terminate sooner than A.D. 1866. Mr. Faber interprets the scorching of the Sun under the fourth vial to denote the present tyranny of Napoleon Bonaparte over France and the other kingdoms of Europe prefigured by the wild beast. I am not disposed to controvert this interpretation. But in my view, our posterity at the end of this nineteenth century will be more competent judges of this subject than we can be. It is clear beyond doubt from the description of the sixth and seventh vials in Revelation 16 that convulsions, revolutions, and the wreck of nations to a degree and extent never hitherto witnessed or recorded, are yet to be expected before the mystery of God is finished."

VIII.—The Number 666

is mainly the mark of the wild beast or total number of the letters of his name in the Greek dative inscriptive form Napoleonti, because N 50, a 1, p 80, o 70, l 30, e 5, o 70, n 50, t 300, i 10=666. But the Lutheran expositors used also to understand it as a date. If dated from A.D. 565–6 as a period of rise, 666 years bring us to the 1,231–2, when Popery was at its height, the Inquisition was established, and Crusades were instituted. As a period of fall 666 from 1,231–2 brings us to 1896–7 as the probable beginning of the three and a half years' persecution (Rev. 13 : 18).

IX.—The 360 Years

(Rev. 10 : 6). It is generally admitted by year-day expositors that the tenth chapter of Revelation describes the Reformation commenced by Luther in 1517, and fully developed about 1545 Christ, the Angel of the Covenant and "the Word of God" (Rev. 19 : 13), is there pictured as descending from heaven with His face shining as the sun, which had hitherto been obscured by Popish darkness, but which now shone forth through Gospel preaching. He holds in His hand a little book open, which denotes the opening to the Church of the Bible, which had hitherto been kept shut up by the Church of Rome in the dead languages; but Luther published a complete translation of the Scriptures into the vernacular tongue in 1534. Tyndal published his translation of the New Testament in English in 1526. The English Parliament abrogated the Papal Supremacy in England in 1536, but Dr. Hales says the English Reformation was not completed till 1547. The German Diet of Augsburg promulgated its Protestant Confession in 1530.

If from 1545 we date the Angel's statement that "there shall be a (Gr.) time no longer before the mystery is finished," this means that 360 years (a time) will not elapse from 1545 before the End of this Dispensation, which must therefore occur not later than about A.D. 1900. Bickersteth, Birks, and others have interpreted this 360 years as dating from the era of Luther's Reformation. The Rev. J. Fletcher, in his letter to Wesley, wrote in about the year 1750:

"As to the various prophetic numbers in the Bible, let me only beg of you to observe the following—'And the Angel swore by Him that liveth forever and ever, that there will not be a time more' (kronos ouk estai), Rev. 10 : 6—which word 'time' in St. John and Daniel signifies a year and a prophetic year—namely, 360 years. If it be true that the Reformation of the seven Protestant countries is here signified, it will follow that from the Reformation there will not be a whole time, or 360 years, till 'the mystery of God should be finished' (Rev. 10 : 7), which he told for our comfort to His servants the prophets."

In addition to the evidence from these dates, interpreted by numerous expositors, we have, as the wide-spread preaching of the Gospel, the return of the Jews to Judea which has already begun, the many running to and fro, the decay of the Pope's temporal power and of the Turkish Empire, extensive revivals of religion, etc.

General Signs of the Times,

It is a most serious error to suppose that we can neglect to discern the signs of the times, and yet be prepared to meet Christ at His advent. The remark is often heard by ignorant persons who "despise prophesyings," that "death is the end of the world to us, and if we are ready for death, we are equally ready for Christ's Second Advent." Such persons require to be reminded that readiness for death is not necessarily readiness for Christ's Advent. Those who are once truly converted are sure to be saved, and are always prepared for death, but not necessarily prepared for the Second Advent, unless they are really expecting it to happen at the very time when it actually will occur, and not to happen at any other time, and openly confessing their belief in its nearness. There will only be 144,000 watchful Christians or wise virgins (Rev. 14) caught up to meet Christ in the First Translation or Ascension at His coming in the air—although there are probably above five million truly converted persons now upon the earth, nearly all of whom, however, will be foolish virgins, left behind to be chastised in the three and a half years' Great Tribulation, and (if still living) then caught up to heaven at its close at the Second Translation.

The Gospel Union (or Gospel Army, as it has been styled in some places), of which the Rev. M. Baxter is President, has now about twelve mission stations in the United States and Canada, besides more than seventy mission stations in Britain. Evangelistic Gospel meetings are held at these stations generally every week evening and Sundays in halls rented permanently by evangelists, and many sinners are being converted by this Gospel work. Contributions, which are urgently needed for carrying on and extending the movement, should be sent to Rev. M. Baxter, 63 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

* Nevertheless, the Pope will by a future pro-Papal Crusade of France be again seated in temporal sovereignty on the seven hills of Rome, shortly before the final three and a half years, as predicted in Revelation 17 : 9, and gain world-wide dominion, so as to become triumphantly seated upon the ten Roman nations represented by the ten-horned wild beast, as well as upon "peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues," just before her final destruction, as prefigured in Rev. 17 : 3, 15.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Extension of the Inter-State Commerce law which was recently passed by Congress, appears to be needed to insure the observance of the spirit of its most valuable clause. The bill strikes a blow at the pernicious free-pass system on railroads, but Congress had no power to effectually kill the system. All it could do was to prevent free passes being issued to cover Inter-State traffic. It is still possible for State legislators, judges, and other public officials to get passes for free rides within the boundaries of the States in which they live. What is now required is for each State Legislature to finish the good work commenced by Congress, and prohibit the issue of free passes altogether. Railroad corporations will always be able to obtain concessions at the expense of the public while legislators and judges have those free passes in their pockets. It is not generally realized that the system involves a tax on the travelling public. A prominent railroad manager said recently that if every man who rode paid his fare, the railroads could afford to reduce rates by a tenth.

High License in the Large Cities of New York State seems now to be a probability. Last week the Assembly ordered the bill to a third reading by a vote of 65 to 51. An analysis of the Senate leads to the belief that the bill will pass there also. Much is hoped for the law by its advocates, and if it does succeed in closing the vile dens in which liquor is now sold in the most lawless precincts, that will be a good thing. But the friends of the bill are, we fear, doomed to disappointment. It will never, if it becomes a law, effect all the good predicted, and it will have the result, which always attends half measures, of delaying the enactment of a really thorough and effective reform. The intentions of the good men who are exerting themselves to secure the passage of the bill are worthy of all praise; if they succeed, and then find the law inadequate to fulfil those intentions their logical course will be to join the Prohibitionists.

The Work of Constructing a Navy is not, it appears, to be delayed by the failure of the Deficiency bill which contained an appropriation for the purpose. Mr. Whitney proposes to apply the unexpended balances of two departments to the work of completing the cruisers left unfinished by Mr. Roach. These are the Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta, which, when completed, will raise the navy out of its present position of ridiculous inefficiency, though it will still be far inferior to those of second rate European Powers. A much greater advance will be made when the new vessels are constructed. This is seen by a comparison between the Atlanta, the best of the Roach cruisers, with the Charleston just commenced in San Francisco. The builder of the Atlanta guaranteed that 3500 horse-power would be produced with 664 tons of machinery, while the Charleston, must, before acceptance, develop for 710 tons of machinery 7000 horse-power, that is, an energy for weight double what was expected of the Atlanta. We are no advocates for war preparation, but in the present seething condition of Europe, and with the certainty of great wars there, which, as prophecy shows, are near at hand, the safety of our coasts ought not to depend on the complacency of Powers jealous of our wealth and freedom.

Great Cities in Other States Will do Well to watch the progress of the investigation now in progress in Brooklyn, N. Y. Honest, well-meaning citizens concerned for the public welfare, and anxious that our free institutions should have fair play, and not be thwarted by bribery have frequently been perplexed by the result of elections. An issue evidently desired by the people is often defeated at the polls, and that, as there is good reason to believe, through a lavish expenditure of money. The question is often asked where the money comes from. A clue is furnished by the Brooklyn inquiry. The Assembly Committee finds that three city officials "have received and are now receiving enormous sums of money—not less than a hundred and ten thousand dollars a year—from the public for services hardly more than nominal in their character." It hints also that part of this money is "diffused" for political purposes, but this is a matter of suspicion or belief, since "the accounts of the moneys paid by the public are kept secret," and the officers who receive them would give no information as to their disposition. When officials are paid by fees it is always well for the public to know what those fees usually produce.

Two Important Lessons are Inculcated by the terrible fire at Buffalo, N. Y, last Friday. The first is the necessity of legislative enactment to prevent the erection of large hotels on bad principles, and the second the compulsion of telegraph, telephone, and electric-light companies to bury the wires. Although the fire in the Richmond Hotel had made but little progress when discovered, the building was so constructed as to render any hope of extinguishing a fire futile. It was a nearly square building, six stories high, with a large court or open well-hole in the middle. At the bottom of this court was the office. The upper floors opened on the court by wooden balconies supported by iron pillars. The fire first shot up through the elevator-shaft, and then broke out into the central court, running along the balconies and sucking upward as through a vast funnel. When the fire department brought all its force to bear upon it the efforts of the firemen were embarrassed by the network of wires around the hotel which caused delay in raising the ladders. The building was evident doomed, and all energies were given to saving lives and preventing the fire spreading to adjoining property. Twenty-five persons were rescued, but five and possibly more were burned, and others were fatally injured by jumping from windows. A large theatre adjoining the hotel was gutted by the flames.

Another Attempt to Assassinate the Czar of Russia has been made. As it was known that the Czar would attend a service on Sunday, March 13th, to commemorate the death of his father, which took place on March 13th, 1881, a plot was organized to kill him by the same means as those employed against the late Czar. A student carrying a large book in which was concealed a dynamite bomb, was observed loitering on the route by which the Czar would travel. A man who was standing behind the student noticed that the latter's book seemed very heavy and that he repeatedly shifted it from arm to arm. This made him suspicious, and he drew the attention of a bystander to the young man. Hardly had he done so when he saw the young man stoop, deposit his book on the pavement and fumble at the string hanging from it. The student was nervous and the string slipped from his hand. The man who had been observing him, caught him by the collar and shoved him back violently into the crowd. It was then seen that another youth, who had been standing beside the one with the book, was making rough efforts to force his way through the surging mass of people who had been attracted by the arrest of the first man. This second youth had a travelling bag slung about him. He was seized, too, and his bag was afterward found to contain a bomb. Four other persons carrying bombs were arrested who were placed at different points on the route. It is clear that a most carefully prepared plot to kill the autocrat was frustrated. The Czar is reported to have been much distressed when he heard of the plot which so narrowly missed execution, but he is still determined not to grant a constitution.

An Important Speech by Mr. Gladstone, Delivered on Thursday last at a public dinner in Yorkshire, shows that the ex-Premier is still hopeful of carrying home rule for Ireland. He said that it was clear that public opinion in England was rapidly changing in favor of his plan. He nevertheless expressed his readiness to assist the Conservatives in any intelligent effort to solve the problem. "It is our duty," he said, "to leave open a way for the Conservatives to pursue the right policy in this matter. I had hoped they would deal liberally with Ireland, but they missed a chance when they had it. I know that they receive our suggestions of assistance as insults, but the lessons of all great reforms teach them that they ought to receive our well-meant offers to assist them against the refractory members of their party with patience and tolerance. Turning to the Unionists, I accept Sir George Trevelyan's desire for reunion as proof of the loyalty of his heart toward us, but I so far differ with him that if the Tories are able to settle the question satisfactorily, I wish them with all my heart to do so." The speech is taken as an indication that Mr. Gladstone is so confident of success that he will make no concessions to regain the support of Lord Hartington and his friends.

Ireland has been Thrown into a State of Violent agitation by the arrest and imprisonment of a priest. It appears that Father Keller, of Youghal, was summoned as a witness, and required to testify as to his knowledge of the plan of campaign. As he refused to obey the summons he was arrested and taken to Dublin. There he received a popular ovation, in which the archbishop participated and publicly indorsed his contumacy. The Lord Mayor sent his carriage to the railroad station to meet the prisoner, and in the midst of intense excitement he was driven in it to the court. There he refused to testify as to his custody of tenants' money as trustee under the "plan of campaign," on the ground that he would be breaking confidence reposed in him as a priest. The judge said there was no legal justification for his refusal, and said the question had no reference to the witness' spiritual capacity. Father Keller was then committed for contempt, and was taken out of court and placed in a cab in the custody of officers. The people immediately made a rush for the vehicle, removed the horses, and dragged it through the streets to Kilmainham Jail, where the priest was locked up. Archbishop Walsh, Mr William O'Brien, Lord Mayor Sullivan, and Mr. Timothy Harrington, M. P., followed the priest to the jail in carriages. The populace marched to Kilmainham Jail singing "God Save Ireland." Father Keller entered the prison leaning upon Archbishop Walsh's arm. Mr. Balfour, the new Irish Secretary, who is regarded as responsible for the arrest, could not have taken a more effectual means for embittering the Irish people against the English Government.

The Rev. M. Baxter Delivered Three Discourses on Coming Great Events, in the Mammoth Hall, Baltimore, Md. There were good audiences at each service.

Clergymen and Evangelists who will Allow Copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be placed in the seats of churches, or will have them distributed at the doors, will be supplied with assorted parcels of back numbers if they will write to the Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Prohibition Fight in Michigan is Evidently arousing the apprehensions of the liquor-sellers. They are said to be resorting to tactics which show that they are desperate. On March 13th Mr. E. N. Monroe, the chairman of the Prohibition County Committee, had his hardware store at Howell blown up and set on fire. This appears to be a fulfilment of a threatening letter addressed to him a short time ago when he assumed prominence in the movement. The letter, which purported to be signed by "many saloon-keepers," ran: "SIR: I wish to inform you that you must stop your work in the Prohibition cause or we will burn you out, root and branch. You may prepare for the worst, as we are on your track." Evidently the liquor-sellers have not read history, or they would know that nothing helps a cause like persecution.

An Eloquent Appeal to Liquor Makers and venders in Chicago has been issued by the National Woman's Temperance Union. The address, after reminding them of the rapid growth of Prohibition, proceeds: "We have never until now come with the united voices of the white-ribbon women to that small fraction of men who make and sell the poisonous drinks against which we are fighting; the drinks that nerve with dangerous strength arms already so much stronger than our own, and at the same time so steal away the brain that ought to guide those manly arms that they are no longer woman's shelter and protection, but her worst enemy. We bring our plea, then, straight to the source of woman's direst calamity and sorrow, and lay it at your feet. By the testimony of courts and juries, the liquor traffic is the cause of eighty per cent of all the crime and ninety per cent of all the pauperism in this country." The address finally says: "We have here addressed the manufacturer and wholesale dealer as well as the dispenser of strong drinks, because we think an undue share of denunciation has fallen on the saloon-keeper, who is but the cat's-paw to rake out of the fire the chestnuts of the rich man back of him."

A Tribute from Canada to Maritime Life savers was received in New York last week. It appears that the American steamer Rio Grande during a storm last November went to the rescue of the Canadian barque Hans County, which was in distress. It was impossible to save the ship, but the captain and crew of the Rio Grande at imminent peril to themselves saved the lives of all on board the Hans County. These facts were set forth in a letter to the Collector of the Port of New York, which came to hand on Thursday last. It was written from the British Legation at Washington, and the writer, on behalf of the Canadian Government, sent a binocular glass to Captain James Lewis, of the Rio Grande; a gold watch to the first officer, and fifteen dollars each to the four sailors who took part in the rescue. This tribute of gratitude comes opportunely. It is in agreeable contrast with the embittered feeling prevailing between Canadians and American shipping. The American captain has a double gratification—he has the pleasure of knowing that he saved lives, and he enjoys the recognition of the Queen's Government. A similar double reward of a higher order awaits those who are successfully laboring for the salvation of souls. "He that converteth a sinner from the error of his way saves a soul from death and hides a multitude of sins" (James 5 : 20).

A Daughter Lost for Twenty-two Years was recovered last week. One morning, in the year 1865, a child twelve years old left her parents' home, as usual, on Twenty-eighth Street, New York, to go to school. By some means she missed her way. Singing as she went, and swinging her school books in her hand, she walked on until she realized that she was lost. Then she began to cry and vainly to seek some familiar street. A policeman found her in this plight and took her to the station. She could not tell where she lived and finally was sent to Randall's Island. After being there about five months she was adopted by a benevolent couple. They went West in 1873, but the girl remained behind, and took service with a family on Clinton Avenue, Brooklyn, afterward going with them to Virginia, where she remained five years. She returned to Brooklyn and commenced a search for her parents. They had given her up as lost after spending three thousand dollars, the savings of a lifetime, in seeking her. Aided by friends she at last succeeded in finding them and received a hearty welcome. It is a similar experience that prodigals undergo who at length return to their heavenly Father. He is always seeking them, but it is when they, too, are moved to seek Him that union takes place (II Chron. 15 : 4).

A Luxurious Subterranean Cavern has been constructed at Eatonton, Ga., by a wealthy citizen as a refuge for his family in cyclone or earthquake. It is situated near the back door of his residence, and is large enough to accommodate his entire family. The walls are of brick laid in cement, the floor is carpeted, has a fireplace and a chimney, and the room is handsomely furnished. The family could spend the night there with as much comfort as in the dwelling. In preparing it the owner had an eye to its permanence, and spared no expense in making it pleasant and comfortable. This unique underground dwelling is thoroughly protected against water rising from below or running in from above. The cost was over five hundred dollars. It is well spent if it gives the owner peace of mind. He evidently does not belong to the class who postpone making provision for the evil day until it arrives. It may be hoped that so prudent a man has not omitted to secure for himself that better Refuge which will avail when cyclone-pits and all other human devices fail (Prov. 18 : 10).

Lady Students in a Laundry were Found by a correspondent of a Canadian journal some time ago cheerfully and busily engaged with the ordinary work of the establishment. Inquiry elicited the fact that the young lady students of the Presbyterian College in Ottawa, Canada, having learned that a poor washerwoman, whose labor was the only support of herself and her children, had been taken ill, and was unable to work, went to her house the next morning, installed themselves in her kitchen, and did with their own hands all her customers' washing and ironing. The narrator says that the scene in the laundry was more delightful to him than anything he had seen in connection with ladies' colleges. He adds: "We have been at a good many interesting college exhibitions, and have regarded with pleasure and respect the white-gloved and daintily-attired young ladies, whose careful essays and spirited declamations have won applause from crowds of listeners, but a class leader rubbing her knuckles sore, and up to the elbows in soap-suds, or a budding mathematician engaged in ironing clothes, from a sympathy for the unfortunate, was a spectacle as novel as it was suggestive." The principle which prompted the act was not novel. The world would be far happier if it was more frequently applied (Matt. 25 : 36–40).

A Duplicate Marriage Service was Performed in Connecticut recently. The New London Telegraph of March 17th states that a couple presented themselves at the house of a certain clergyman and requested him to marry them. He consented, the marriage ceremony was duly performed, and the words pronounced which made the twain one. The clergyman had been somewhat hurried, and the whole affair had occupied but a short time; but when they were gone the clergyman, looking at the marriage license, discovered, to his consternation, that he ought not to have performed the ceremony, as the license had been issued in a town several miles away, and did not apply to the town in which he lived. He was greatly distressed, and lost no time in going to the town in which the license was issued. He discovered the couple, and persuaded them to go through the ceremony a second time. Precisely what benefit he expected from the second ceremony does not appear. The first marriage was valid, though in officiating he had broken the law, and was liable to punishment. The second ceremony could not undo the offence of the first. It is curious that he should have fallen into the mistake, as he must have had frequent occasion in the course of his ministry to tell awakened sinners that reformation of life cannot atone for past transgressions (Prov. 20 : 9).

An Automatic Speech Register has Been Invented by an ingenious man, who describes it in a scientific journal. It consists of a combination of delicate levers and blades which, placed upon the tongue and lips, and under the nostrils of the speaker, are vibrated by the movements of the former and the breath flowing from the latter. Attached to the levers are pencils, which register in signs the sounds uttered by the tongue and lips upon a strip of paper moved by a mechanical arrangement. Each syllable uttered leaves its record in a sign which is recognizable, and which the inventor declares he can read with precision, thus being able to repeat words spoken when he was not present. If such a machine were in frequent use in society what a record of vapid and trifling conversation would be registered! We can imagine that even the most frivolous people would be ashamed to read the words they had spoken. Such a record is kept, though the fact is forgotten now, and it will be produced hereafter (Matt. 12 : 36).

BRIEF NOTES.

THE officers of the China Inland Mission hope to send out a hundred new missionaries to China this year. Farewell meetings have been held in London for the first fifteen ready to go.

The Rev. Justin Fulton, D.D., has resigned the pastorate of his Brooklyn church to commence a national crusade against Roman Catholicism, to which he purposes to devote his life.

In Sioux City, where the Rev. Mr. Haddock was slain for his zeal in the warfare with rum-sellers, there are now eight saloon-keepers in jail because they are unable to pay their fines and every saloon in the city is closed.

The Rev. C. W. Ray, of Philadelphia, is conducting revival services in Grace Baptist Church, Baltimore, Md., with much success. On the first day of the meeting more than thirty expressed a desire to be saved, and during the first week between forty and fifty converts were reported.

The Rev. Dr. George F. Pentecost has begun his revival work in Cleveland with many indications of success. In speaking of his sermon on Sunday, March 13th, the Plaindealer of that city said that he seemed to be a theological lawyer retained in the interest of Christianity.

The Rev. R. Van De Water, rector of St. Luke's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., has been appointed Missioner for the Protestant Episcopal Church for a year. This movement is an outgrowth of the Mission conducted in 1885 by the Rev. W. M. Hay Aitken.

At the meeting of the Committee of the Evangelization Society of Philadelphia, the reports from the churches participating in the special movement of canvassing the city were so encouraging that it was decided to continue the union prayer-meetings.

The Rev. J. E. Wolfe, who is called the second Sam Jones, and Mr. R. W. Swayne, a singer of remarkable power, have just closed a series of meetings at Cisco, Tex., during which one hundred and twenty persons were converted. They are now conducting services at Albany, whence they will go to Indiana and Eastward, continuing their evangelical work. In several towns in Texas where these gentlemen have held meetings the saloons have all been closed.

Evangelist H. W. Brown, of Chicago, is now laboring at Richmond, Va. The Dispatch of that city describes the meetings as the most wonderful ever held there. On Sunday, March 13th, the Clay Street Methodist Church was thronged all day, four services being held there. At night there was a marvellous scene. In the auditorium was a densely packed mass of people, while in the lecture-room a large assembly of Christians of all denominations were gathered with the pastor of the church to unite in earnest prayer for the conversion of sinners.

Canvassers Wanted to Sell, from House to House, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. EARTHQUAKE, BUT NOT HEARTQUAKE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof."—Psalm 46 : 1-3.

Associations of the Psalm—Luther's Favorite—I. The Ground of Confidence—The Weak Relying on Omnipotence—Justified and Fostered by Experience—II. Courage Grows Out of It—The Logical Attitude—How Equanimity Helps a Man—A Christian Youth Saving a Child in a Thunderstorm—III. The Courage Will be Tested—The Coming Wars—The Anarchy that is Worse than War—The Earthquake Predicted in the Apocalypse.

This Psalm is a song for all Israel; for all who are truly the chosen of God, called to be His own people, should exhibit a fearless courage. The peace of God which passeth all understanding should keep the hearts and minds of all who rest in God. If, indeed, the Lord be our refuge and strength, we are entitled to seek after a spirit which shall bear us above the dreads of common men. It is not every man that can sing this Psalm; he must belong to the believing company, he must have God to be his God, and he must, like Israel, have learned the art of prevailing prayer, or else he cannot sing the song of peace amid commotion and calamity. No man can truly sing this psalm but those who are redeemed from the earth

It was because Luther's heart was chaste toward God, and His whole mind virgin toward divine truth, that he delighted to sing this psalm. In the days of the most furious opposition he was wont to say to Melanchthon, "Come, let us sing the forty-sixth Psalm, and

"Let the Devil Do his Worst."

So, too, when Luther was dead, Melanchthon heard a girl singing this psalm, and he said to her, "Sing on, dear daughter mine, thou knowest not what comfort thou bringest to my heart." We read of the armies of Gustavus Adolphus singing this psalm before their victory at Leipzig. So, you see, the young, the simple, the guileless may sing that which nerves warriors for the battle.

This morning, as I shall be enabled, I shall say a little, first, upon the confidence of the saints: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble." Then I will speak upon the courage which grows out of it: "Therefore will not we fear." We shall close with a brief survey of the conflicts to which that courage will be sure to be exposed: "Though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof."

I. First, then, let us consider the confidence of the saints. God's people have a sure confidence. Other men build as best they may, but true of ages. Their confidence is altogether beyond themselves. In this song there is nothing about their own virtue, valor, or wisdom. The heathen moralist boasted that if the globe itself should break, his integrity would make him stand fearless amid the wreck. But the believer has a humbler though a truer reliance. Though the earth be removed he is undismayed; and this does not arise from his own personal self-sufficiency, but from God, who is his refuge and strength. We may be as timid by nature as the conies, but God is our refuge; we are as weak by nature as bruised reeds, but God is our strength. We never know what strength is till our own weakness drives us to trust omnipotence; never understand how safe our refuge is till all other refuges fail us. When the earth is removed, and the waters of the sea roar and are troubled; being driven both from land and sea, we hide ourselves in God.

This confidence will be greatly sustained by a clear knowledge of God. "Acquaint thyself with God, and be at peace: thereby good shall come unto thee." If we were greater students of God, how much happier we should be! Pope said, "The proper study of mankind is man." It is a deplorably barren subject. Say, rather, "The proper study of mankind is God." When men of God make God their study, then they discover in Him those things which make Him a refuge for their hours of danger, a strength for days of labor, and a help for emergencies of every kind. Wherefore I exhort all true believers to dwell much in the presence of God.

This Psalm is best sung by men and women who know what they are singing, because they have felt the preserving and delivering grace of God. I shall put it to you this morning, you that know the Lord, can you not say by experience, "God is our refuge?" You have fled to Him; have you not found a shelter in Him? There have been times of trial so severe that you could not endure its force, but were compelled to flee from it. When you have entered into your chamber, and shut to your door, and hidden yourself with God, have you not been at perfect peace?

My Happiest Hours

have not been in the days of my mirth, but in the nights of my sorrow. When all waters are bitter, the cup of divine consolation is all the sweeter. For brightness, give me not the sunlight, but that superior glory with which the Lord lights up the darkness of affliction. It is not necessary to happiness that a man should be prosperous in business, or applauded by mankind; it is only needful that the Lord should smile on him.

We can also say that God has been our strength. When we have not been afflicted, but have had arduous labor to perform for God, we have been made to feel and mourn our weakness, and then the Lord has made us to glory in infirmity, because His power has rested on us. What multiform shapes that strength has taken! Many of you have had of business life, others for domestic life. Under fierce temptations you remain unconquered, under stern duties you remain unwearied, you have had strength for exhausting service or crushing suffering. Had you been left to your own wit and wisdom, they alone could never have sufficed you; strength of mind has been given from above. See the widow, left penniless, who has brought up a family of children! Can she tell how she did it? See the girl placed amid coarse and brutal men of licentious character; she remains pure; but can she tell you how? God is our strength in ways unknown to ourselves. Our trials are all different. No two of us have proved the Lord in exactly the same way, but yet our testimony is uniform; the Lord has been all-sufficient;

His Strength is Perfect.

We have also proved another thing, namely, that God is "a very present help in trouble." We have had helpers after the flesh who have not been present when we wanted them—perhaps they have studiously kept out of the way; at any rate, just at the pinch when we have said, "Oh, that so-and-so were here," our friend has been at the end of the earth. But it has never been so with God. Has He not said, "Before they call I will answer them, and while they are yet speaking I will hear?" Just there where the burden pressed, God has been immediately present to lighten the load. Now, this is matter of experience; and because we have experienced it, therefore will we not fear though the earth be removed. Having already tried and tested God, we are not going to doubt Him now. We feel something of the mind of Sir Francis Drake, who, after he had sailed round the world, was buffeted with a storm in the Thames. "What!" said he, "have we sailed round the world safely, and shall we be drowned in a ditch?" So do we say at this day. Helped so long, and helped so often! God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble, why should we fear? How dare we fear?

II. I come, secondly, to notice that Courage Grows Out of It.

This courage is very full and complete. "Therefore will not we fear." It does not say, "Therefore will not we run away," but, "Therefore will not we fear." It doth not even say, "Therefore will not we faint and swoon in dread," but, "Therefore will not we fear." The presence of God does so stay the soul and quiet the heart, that fear, which hath torment, is driven away. Nature feareth, it could not be otherwise; but through grace the heaven-born spirit triumphs over nature and its fear God does not take away from us those natural fears which lead us to seek the preservation of life; but He masters them by a serene security of heart produced by His presence. We are perplexed, but not in despair. We see the position to be full of danger, and yet we know that we are in no danger, the Lord being near. "Therefore will not we fear."

Then, further, this courage is logically justifiable. It is not the courage of nature, which may be a mere brute virtue, such as dogs and bulls possess. Neither does it grow out of want of feeling. The courage of the Christian is not the hardness of the Stoic. The Stoic boasts that he does not feel; the Christian does feel, feels as keenly as anybody, and much more than most; and yet, for all that, the conscious love of God lifts him above fear. The believer's fearlessness is founded upon argument, and so the Psalmist words it, "Therefore will not we fear." Because God is present as the refuge of His people, it is unreasonable for them to fear.

Suppose that the most awful things were to occur, would they not occur according to God's decree? We believe in a God who has arranged all things according to the counsel of His will. Furthermore, we know that nothing that can happen, however tremendous it may be, can shake the kingdom of God.

Our Chief Possession

lies in that kingdom, and if that is secure, all is safe. The gates of hell shall not prevail against that kingdom; therefore, whatever is imperilled, our highest, best, and most vital interests are safe beyond the shadow of harm. Suppose an accident should take away our lives; I smile as I think that the worst thing that could happen would be the best thing that could happen. If we should die, we should but the sooner be "forever with the Lord." If in the quiver of God's providence there should lie an arrow which shall to-day bring us death, it would also bring us glory. So, if the very worst that can befall us is the best that can come, why should we fear? I think this is good reasoning.

Now, this fearlessness is exceedingly profitable. If a man is able to contain himself, and possess his soul in patience through the presence of God, he will not do that which is foolish. Men when they are frightened are in hot haste, and hurry themselves into folly. As if they were turned to children, men in their alarm will act without reason; in fact, terror is a kind of madness. Many absurd actions have been performed under

The Influence of Panic.

In times of danger the man who is calm is the most ready to use the proper means of escape. Presence of mind in invaluable, and the best way to secure presence of mind is to believe in the presence of God. In cases of sickness, the patient who does not fret is the most likely to be cured. We have had among us, just now, instances of dear friends in this church, who have been called to undergo most serious operations, and it has been a wonderful help to them that they have known no dread, but have been passive in the Lord's hands. Our Lord Jesus was ever sweetly serene, and this was one element of the wisdom of his behavior.

In the struggle of life a cheerful fearlessness is a grand assistance. Here is a man on the Exchange, and things are going heavily against him; prices are falling, and all that he can do appears to make bad worse. If that man gives way to fear he may plunge into utter ruin; but if he can step aside a minute or two, and breathe a prayer to God, he will pull himself together, and when he comes back he will coolly survey the situation, and act with discretion. Lose your head and you lose the battle. Lose your heart, and you have lost all. To him who knows no fear there is no fear, provided that his forgetfulness arises out of his memory of God.

A Child in a Thunderstorm.

One thing more I desire to say aout this fearlessness, namely, that it brings great glory to God. If you are enabled to rise above fear in times of alarm, then will those who see you say, "This is a man of God, and this is God's work upon his soul." I knew a youth, near forty years ago, who was staying with relations when a thunderstorm of unusual violence came on at nightfall. A stack was struck by lightning and set on fire, within sight of the door. The grown-up people in the house, both men and women, were utterly overcome with fright. The strong men seemed even more afraid than the women. All the inmates of the house sat huddled together. Only this youth was quietly happy. There was a little child upstairs in bed, and the mother was anxious about it; but even her love could not give her courage enough to pass the staircase windows, to bring that child down. The babe cried, and this youth, whom I knew right well, who was then but newly converted, went upstairs alone, took the child, and, without hurry or alarm, brought it down to its mother. He needed no candle, for the lightning was so continuous that he could see his way right well. He felt that the Lord was wonderfully near that night, and so no fear was possible to his heart. He sat down and read a psalm aloud to his trembling relatives, who looked on the lad with loving wonder. That night he was master of the situation, and those in the house believed that there was something in the religion which he had so lately professed.

III. Time has fled, and I must ask your patience while I now dwell for a little while upon the third point, the conflicts to which this fearlessness will be exposed. If you become fearless through the presence of God, that courage will be tried in ways novel and unusual. "Though the earth be removed." This is

A Terrible Novelty.

Those who have been in earthquakes tell me that the feeling is most singular. It does not seem like a common shake, but as if everything had given way at once. You do not know what to do; the very foundations of everything have slipped from under you. Suppose that the Lord is about to try us in new and unheard-of ways; yet, having the Lord to be our refuge, strength, and help, we will not fear. New trials will bring new grace, and prove the value of old promises.

Some trials also seem to be utterly ungovernable—"Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled." You cannot do anything with the sea when it rages. The water is here, there, everywhere, when the deep once begins to break loose; and certain troubles seem to be of like nature; they rush upon you on a sudden, they multiply like swelling waves, they drive furiously, they carry all before them; and yet even then we need not fear. If God be with us, He is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea.

There may come to you and to me trouble great and unexpected, and it will then be well to rise out of the reach of fear. War may soon burst upon us.

The Atmosphere is Charged with War, and we may be surrounded by it before the year grows old. We have enjoyed, as a nation, so much of rest within our own island that we have grown somewhat secure; but even if war were at our gates, those who have made the Most High their refuge need not fear.

Something worse than war is threatening. Anarchy seeks to make havoc in the streets. There are plenty of signs and tokens that a break-up of social order is desired by not a few. Fierce spirits are eager to repeat among us the horrors of the French Revolution. To break down, divide, destroy, disintegrate, is the policy of many. The earthquake of society is more to be dreaded than the quaking of the globe, and we are within measurable distance of such a catastrophe. Shall we lie down and die? Nay, verily, we will not fear, though the earth be removed. If God is our confidence we need not be afraid, though the heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing. The unloosing of the bond of society is a thing to be dreaded more than an incursion of wild beasts; but the Lord reigneth, and therefore right will prevail.

Perhaps some of you felt this sad weighing upon your spirits. "I do not know what is coming of it," says one; "I do not think I shall long be able to provide for my family." Yes, but if God is your refuge and strength, I beseech you, do not lose heart. "Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." This depression is to you what the earthquake has been to the Riviera; but yet you must not be buried in despair. Hope on, hope ever.

Depression of Trade

As for myself, I am often sadly tossed about because of the heresies and false doctrines of this present age. It grieves me to the heart to see the want of spirituality among ministers, and of holiness among professing Christians. It cuts me to the quick to see the utter rubbish and poison which is preached instead of Christianity. At times it looks as if all things were going wrong; the men to whom one looked as pillars, forsake the faith, and the stanchest give way for the sake of peace. We are apt to cry, "What will become of us?" But if God is our refuge and strength, we need not be afraid, even amid general apostasy. While God lives, truth is in the ascendant. As long as the Lord liveth our hope lives also. Gospel truth will yet prevail; we shall live to see the old faith to the front again.

Now, my beloved friend, think about yourself a minute, and all the trials which may yet beset you. If you are to be afflicted with incurable sickness, and gradually to pine away amid multiplied pains, yet you need not fear. If you are to be an invalid from this time forth to the end of your days, yet, be not greatly depressed in spirit, for the Lord's presence will sustain you. If heart and flesh both fail, God will be the strength of your heart, and your portion forever. By and by you and I will have to die, unless the Lord should suddenly come. What then? Then will the earth be removed, so far as we are concerned; and then, as far as our experience goes, our mountain will be carried into the midst of the sea; but since God is our refuge and strength we ought not to dread the day. Look into the Book of Revelation and you will see that Tremendous Events are Foretold.

All things shall be shaken; all the glories of earth shall melt away. Confusion, like the first chaos, shall cover all things; the earth shall rock and reel, and the stars shall fall from heaven. But even then will not we fear, since God will be our very present help. There shall be a day of days, for which all other days were made, with its great white throne, and pomp of angels, and judgment of quick and dead; but, beloved, though that day shall burn as an oven, we will not fear, because we are secure in Christ Jesus. Wherefore let us stand at the window and look out at the storm, and see the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds without fear.

I thought as I read my text what an awful case the ungodly must be in; for the very things which men most dread, namely, the falling of mountains and the gaping open of the earth, will become the desire of terrified sinners at the last. How great must be that horror which will altogether eclipse the horror which sends myriads flying in panic from their homes! When sinners shall see the face of Christ in His glory, they will entreat the mountains to fall upon them, and the rocks to cover them, to hide them from the dreadful vision. The face of love is terrible to those who have rejected it. Oh sinners, what will be your anguish when you shall seek for death, and shall not find it! What will be your dismay when even a tottering mountain, reeling with earthquake, shall be regarded as a friend! Oh, that you would escape from the wrath to come! Oh, that you would take Jesus to be your refuge and your strength!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

STRANGE HABITS OF THE INNUITS OF ALASKA.*

THE Innuits are representatives of the most populous savage family indigenous to Alaska, and are as nomadic as Bedouins. They are Eskimo, strictly speaking, and the natives of Kadiak are related to them. In portraying the physique, physiognomy, and disposition of these people, we find in an average Innuit a man who stands about five feet six or seven inches in his heelless boots; his skin is fair, slightly Mongolian in its complexion and facial expression; a broad face, prominent cheek-bones; a large mouth with full lips, small black eyes, but prominently set in their sockets—not under a lowering brow, as in the case of true Indian faces. The nose is very insignificant and much depressed, having between the eyes scarcely any bridge at all. He has abundance of coarse black hair, never any of a reddish hue, as frequently noted among the Aleutes when first discovered and described by the Russians. Up to the age of thirty years an Innuit usually keeps his hair cut pretty close to his scalp; some of them shave the occiput, so that it shines like a billiard-ball. After this period in life he lets it grow as it will, wearing it in ragged, unkempt locks. He sometimes will sport a well-developed mustache and chin-whisker, of which he is as proud as though a Caucasian. He has shapely hands and feet, and his limbs are well made.

An Innuit woman is usually proportionately smaller than the man, and, when young, sometimes she is not unpleasant to look at. The skin of her cheeks then will be faintly suffused with blushes of natural color, her lips pouting and red, with small, tapering hands and high instepping feet. She rarely pierces her lips or disfigures her nose; she lavishes upon her child or children a wealth of affectionate attention—endows them with all her ornaments. She allows her hair to grow to its full length, gathers it up behind into thick braids, or else it is bound up in ropes lashed by copper wire or sinews. She seldom tatooes her skin in any place; a faint drawing of transverse blue lines upon the chin and cheeks is usually made by her best friend when she is married.

These people are savages, and not at all affected by the earnest and persistent attempts to Christianize them. They are even less influenced by the teaching of missionaries than the Siwashes of the Sitkan archipelago, and that is saying a great deal for their hardness of heart.

These savages respect the dead but they fear the sick. When death invades an Innuit family, taking the husband, or the wife, or a child, the survivors eat nothing, after the decease of the relative, but sour or last year's food, and refrain from going out and from work of any sort for a period of twenty days. They seat themselves in one corner of the hut, or "kahsime," with their backs toward the door. Every five days they wash themselves, otherwise death would promptly come to them again. The body of the dead native is composed in a sitting position, with its knees drawn up to the stomach and its arms clasped around them. It is placed in one corner with its head against the wall. The inhabitants of that village, where the dead man has lived, voluntarily bring to the hut dresses of reindeer-skin, in one of which the corpse is shrouded. A coffin, or box, is prepared at some selected spot outside of the village, set up a few feet from the ground, on four stoutly driven posts, and in it the body is deposited. Near by is planted a square board or smoothly hewn plank, upon which rude figures are painted of the animals that the deceased was most fond of hunting, such as a beaver, a deer, a fish, or seal. A few of his most cherished belongings are laid in the coffin with him, but the balance of his property is divided among his family.

A SON DELIVERED FROM DEMONIACAL POSSESSION.

In the current number of Thy Healer is a remarkable narrative of the deliverance of a youth from the power of Satan. The following is extracted from the testimony of his father, Mr. Ellery:

"I desire to thank the Lord for His wonderful goodness to me in restoring my son. When I went down to Fulham last Friday week, to my surprise and sorrow, I saw that my eldest son was going out of his mind. He had been lately managing some work, and had been a great deal exercised about it, and all at once his brain gave way. Seeing him in such a state I asked the Lord what to do with him in these circumstances, and I found I had to do the same as with everything else—to give him over to the Lord, and trust Him to do the work. Well, I returned home with him. In the middle of the night he was awake and restless, and he sent his brother to ask me to go to him. I did so, and he then told me that he would go mad unless I sent for a doctor. I then remembered the words of our Lord, 'In My name shall they cast out devils.' I prayed to the Lord to give him sleep. The Lord heard me, and he fell off into a deep sleep. In the morning my son said, 'You must take me down to Devonshire or I will soon go mad.' I took him to Devonshire last Monday week. We got there late in the evening, and then had five miles to walk. On the way, my son said to me, 'The devil is cast out of me. I have been possessed by him for the last fifteen years.' I can remember the time. It was about fifteen years since he seemed to have lost confidence in God. I left him in Devonshire and when I came back last Monday he was perfectly restored in mind. I praise the Lord for it, and I now trust Him to finish His work. Before I left him, my son said, 'All the hatred and malice that were in my heart are now gone.'"

THE RAILROAD DISASTER NEAR BOSTON LAST WEEK.

(See Illustrations on this page.)

The distressing calamity which was added last week to the long list of disasters with which this year has opened, occurred on the Boston & Providence Road, which has heretofore enjoyed an excellent reputation as a well-managed line. The train which was wrecked was, unhappily, the train by which a large number of persons travelled from their homes in the country to their occupations in the city. It runs a distance of only nine and a half miles from Dedham to Boston, leaving the former place at seven in the morning. On the fatal morning of Monday, March 14th, it was made up with an engine, baggage-car and nine passenger cars, including a smoker, the latter being the rear car. There were about three hundred passengers on board. After covering about half the distance, the train swung down through a richly-wooded section toward Forest Hill, and when it reached the Bussy Woods Bridge, or the Old Tin Bridge, or the Pussy Willow Bridge, as it was variously called, which crosses the roadway at a height of thirty-five feet, it was making about twenty miles an hour.

A Bad Record.

The bridge has long had a bad name, and the attention of the superintendent has been called to it more than once. About a year ago it was strengthened. Before that it consisted of two trusses, one of which was wood, and the other iron. The wooden one was taken out, and an iron one substituted. Still, the lateral vibration, which engineers know to be an ominous sign of weakness, was observed when heavy trains crossed it. Since the disaster it has been condemned by civil-engineers and specialists, who attribute the calamity to the bad construction and bad material of the bridge. The railroad management has attempted to show that the disaster was caused by a broken journal, but public opinion seems to be unanimous that the bridge itself was the sole cause.

The engineer of the train noticed nothing unusual in crossing the bridge, but when he reached the Boston side the forward part of the engine rose and a heavy wrench from the rear told him that something wrong had occurred. Looking back, he saw that the bridge had fallen into the roadway, carrying with it the last five cars of the train. He promptly cut the engine loose from the cars that had crossed safely, and, opening the throttle, ran at the fastest speed to Forest Hills, the junction with the main line, his whistle screeching the whole distance. He knew that the wreck would soon be on fire from the overturned stoves, and that the prompt services of a fire-engine might prevent a horrible holocaust. Two fire-engines, one of them a chemical, responded to the call, and the fire, which had begun to blaze, was quickly extinguished.

A Scene of Horror.

But it was a terrible spectacle that was witnessed by those who hurried to the scene of the disaster. The five cars were piled one on the other, the lower ones being crushed like a closed accordion. The shrieks of the injured passengers rent the air, while in the car at the foot of the ghastly heap there was a silence still more appalling. There were sights, too, that made strong men feel faint. The body of a woman was partially visible, and an effort was made to extricate it. When the wreck that held it down was raised, it was found to be headless, and the right arm had been torn off. Several bodies were afterward found similarly mutilated. There was some relief in the majority of cases in the thought that death must have been instantaneous. Of those who were killed outright nearly all had their heads crushed.

The Dead.

Among the passengers on the train a large proportion were women and girls going to business in Boston. Two of these were found locked in each other's arms. Six girls, but little more than children, were found all together, their dead hands still holding the baskets containing their lunch. In the smoking-car a game at cards had been going on when the crash came. One of the players lay dead, with the cards in his hand. Only one of the players escaped with a shaking, the others were badly hurt. In all there were twenty-four bodies found in the wreck, thirteen females and eleven males. The wounded, who were sent to the hospitals in ambulances as they were extricated, numbered one hundred and fourteen, and of many of those there was but little hope of recovery.

What that crash must have been to some of the passengers it is dreadful to think of. Young people probably looking forward to many years of life and happiness, some of them possibly imagining that there was plenty of time yet to accept Christ, and prepare for eternity, little knowing that their feet already stood on the brink of it. How many persons now living may be in the same position, who can tell! During the past few weeks death by earthquake, death by railroad disaster, and death by fire have uttered a warning to young and old against counting on future opportunity. Christ stands waiting, offering to all not only a blissful eternity beyond the grave, but happiness, peace, and joy in this life, be it brief or prolonged.

THE GOAL OF STANLEY'S EXPEDITION.

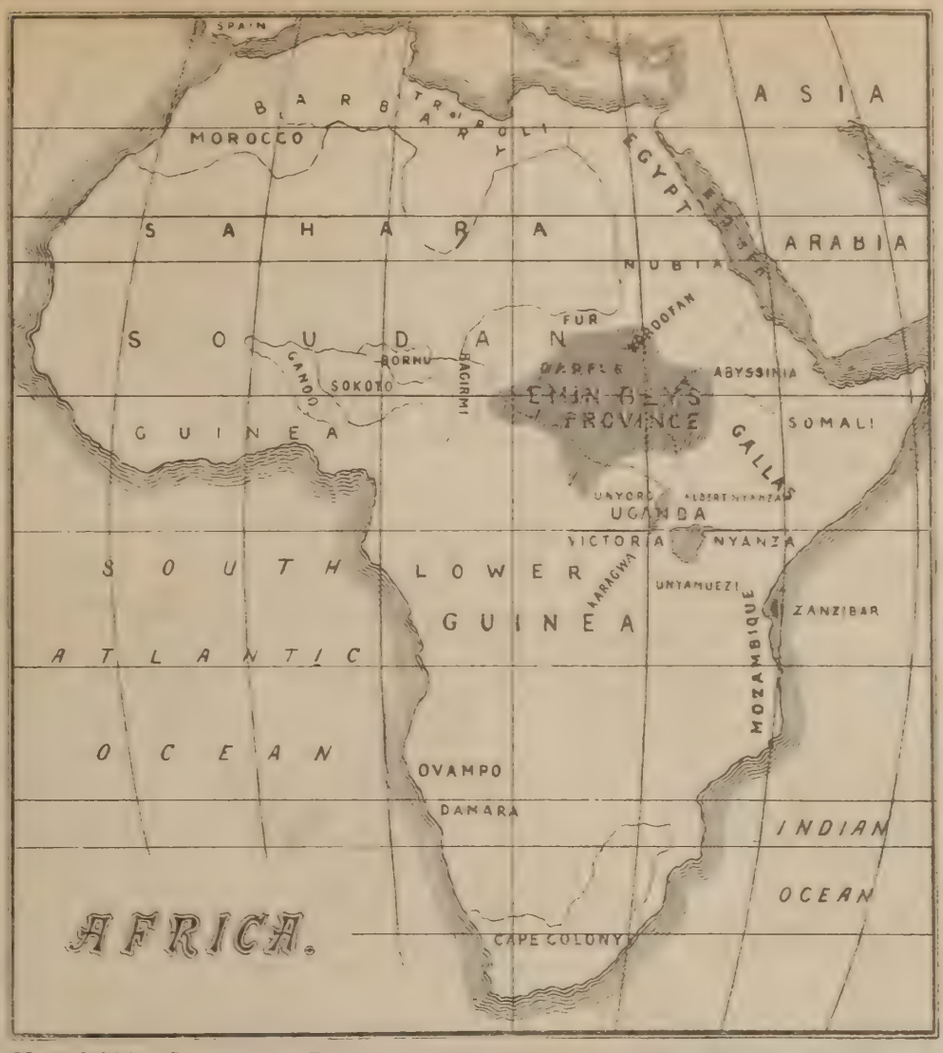
FROM the map of Africa here given, it will be seen how stupendous is the task undertaken by Mr. Stanley in going to rescue Emin Pasha, whose portrait with that of Dr. Junker appears on the first page. The province which Emin has governed since his appointment by the late General Gordon in 1878, is at its southern extremity only about eighty miles north of the equator, and is in the very heart of the Continent. From whatever point Stanley starts to reach it, he will have to traverse three hundred miles of unexplored country, the road through Uganda, which Stanley knows, being closed by the hostile attitude of the ferocious savage, King Mwanga, the murderer of Bishop Hannington. By that route it is thirteen hundred and fifty miles from Zanzibar, on the coast, to Wadelai, the capital of Emin's province; but, skirting Uganda by a circuitous route to the west, it is sixteen hundred miles from Zanzibar. The Congo route, which Mr. Stanley prefers, is still longer. It involves a journey up that river of fifteen hundred miles from its mouth on the west coast to a point opposite to Emin's province, and thence by land nine hundred miles due east from the banks of the Congo.



Map of Africa Showing the Province where Emin Bey is Waiting for Rescue by Stanley.

It is probable that whatever be the route taken by Stanley to reach Emin, the return journey, if he is successful in rescuing him, will be by the Congo. There are many women and children with Emin who must not be deserted, and who would suffer terribly by the land journey, and would also be exposed to great peril. Therefore, although the Congo route is eight hundred miles longer than the other route, it will be less trying, because the only land journey that way is the nine-hundred miles from Wadelai to the banks of the Congo. Thence the remaining fifteen hundred miles will be by water.

Mr. Stanley deserves our sympathies and our prayers in his undertaking. The expedition is not for the acquisition of territory, nor to gratify scientific curiosity, but purely and simply to deliver a brave man and his companions from a horde of fanatical savages whose hatred he has incurred by his earnest efforts to prevent them carrying on the cruel and abominable traffic in slaves. It was a similar position that General Gordon occupied, and he was hated for the same cause. Lord Wolseley, with the might of England at his back, failed to save him; we have now to see whether the plain, untitled American citizen, whilom a reporter on the New York Herald, can succeed where the English noble and his army failed. All honor to Stanley for undertaking so formidable a task! The whole civilized world wishes him success.

THE FRIENDS AT ASPENDALE.

By Rev. J. Jackson Wray.

A Daring Project.

ETHEL thought she was alone when, kneeling by her mother's grave in the church she poured out her soul before God in supplication for guidance and help in the new extremity. Harold's appeal could not be left unheeded. If no money were sent it was horrible to think of what he might suffer at the hands of the desperadoes who held him captive. Her sorely stricken father could neither advise nor aid her; Harold's life depended on her alone, and the poor bewildered girl went to God in despair, taking the wisest and best of all courses. It was with a start that she rose when to her surprise Simon's words of assurance fell on her ear.

"Oh, Simon!" said the wondering Ethel, "whatever led you to come here?"

"Nay, Miss Ethel, that I can scarcely tell," said the old carpenter. "'He leadeth us by a way that we knoa not.' Jake Martin, the postman, said that he had a foreign-looking letter for you. I seemed to feel all at once that there was trubble lapped up in it. So I said to 'Becca, 'Becca, I'm foorced to go up to the Hall, ha' you ony message for Nance?' I wondered to see t' chotch door oppen as I passed, so I stepped inside. When I saw you on your knees, I knew in a minute that you were i' better company than mahne, so I just knelt doon, an' said, 'Amen!'"

"Thanks, Simon," said Ethel, "you are always thoughtful and kind. My heart was very sad and sore and somehow I felt drawn to my mother's grave. I'm better now."

"No doot you are, miss, an' equally no doot you were drawn with a purpose. Them words on my lady's moniment hev a sarmon in 'em o' theirselves."

Ethel turned as Simon pointed, and read, "Her trust was in the Lord her God." Then casting her eye above the line, she read, "The beloved wife of Sir Godwin Spofforth, and the daughter of Sydney Railton, Esq., of Enderby." In a moment it flashed upon her mind that by the will of her maternal grandfather, the sum of fifty thousand dollars was left for her own use and benefit, and that as she was now of age it was at her own disposal. Hitherto she had never needed it, never thought of it. Now it represented Harold's ransom! She felt stunned, half dazed, turned pale, and might have fallen but for the ready hand of Simon Holmes. As they walked toward the Towers, Ethel remembered that she had left the letter in its place on the recumbent statue of her mother, and asked Simon Holmes to fetch it for her. As the old man handed her the pregnant missive, he said, "Whativer there is in it, miss, you were right to tak' it to the Lord. He's fond o' bein' trusted with all your seacrets, an' all the wo'ld can't show a Coonseller so good an' wise as Him. That's what King Hezekiah did when Sennacherib sent him a letter full o' blasphemy; an' threatenin' to mak' the streets o' Jerusalem to run wi' blood. Hezekiah just went as you did, an' he 'spread it befoor the Lord.' An' that varry neet, while t' enemy's soldiers were sleepin' i' their tents an' t' sentinels were on the watch, God's angel com' an' fowt the battle for him, an' Hezekiah gat the victory without unsheathin' a single soord, or liftin' a single lance, or bendin' a single bow. So it'll be wi' you, for it's true o' you as it was o' my lady, 'She put her trust in the Lord.'"

Simon was pleasantly astonished at the peaceful smile that lit up Ethel's pale features, as she replied, "It's all right, Simon, I did well to come. The hand of the Lord is with me, and my mission will be done." Then she told him of the letter from the bandits' den and of her intention, if needs be, to devote her fortune for her brother's ransom.

"But how shall I tell my father about it, Simon? Another stroke would kill him."

"I reckon the Lord 'll put that right, as well as this," said the old carpenter, devoutly; and having arrived at the Towers, Simon made his way to have an interview with Nance in the housekeeper's room.

Ethel's difficulty was solved for her, as Simon had said. She was met at the door by Thompson, the butler. "Oh, miss," said he, "Sir Godwin is in a terrible way! Just when we had got him brought down and placed comfortably in the library chair, the postman brought another letter that had been forgotten at Chilworth post-office. It was just like that that came for you this morning. Sir Godwin knew the man had come; he saw him pass the window, and I was forced to let him have it. You know, miss, you told us that it would be dangerous to cross him. Ever since, he has been groaning and weeping and wringing his hands. I'm afraid he'll have another fit!"

"Wherever have you been, Ethel?" said her father, as she entered the library. He was almost scarlet with excitement, and kept vainly trying to rise and stand upon his poor useless feet. "Read that! Read that! Read that!" he said with feverish rapidity, pointing to a letter on the table. Ethel soon discovered that the former letter must have been delayed in its transmission, for this was of a much later date. It ran thus:

"My dear Sister: The patience of my wolfish captors is exhausted. Latterly I have been made to suffer greatly. Red Pedro has just sent to say that he will give me one chance more. But if the ransom does not come within twenty-eight days, my life will be in danger. I am compelled to write this letter, as my jailor is looking on. If you could send some trusty messenger with a less sum, perhaps they would accept it. I do think I should lead a better life, and it is hard to die without the opportunity to reform. I deserve it, however, and if it is to be, I cannot rebel against it. Pray for me, dear sister, and if you hear from me no more, believe that I died asking forgiveness for myself, and His blessing on those on whose lives my sin and folly has brought so dark a cloud."

Poor Ethel! Her heart sickened, the pallor of death came over her features, and helplessly staggering to a sofa, she sank into a swoon.

"Oh, my darling!" cried the baronet, tugging at the bell-pull with the energy of alarm. "What have I done! She should not have seen that letter. The shock was too sudden. Oh, Harold, Harold, you will kill us all with your wayward life. Telegraph for Sir Jarvis," he said, to the servants who came hurrying in at his summons.

But before a telegram could be sent to the London physician Ethel recovered consciousness and opened her eyes. Her father's haggard face was the first object on which they fell. It was full of anxiety and distress. "Thank God," he said, reverently, as he saw the color return to Ethel's pallid lips and cheeks. "Forgive me, Ethel, for my want of thought; you were not able to bear such a shock. I ought to have known that."

"Forgive me, papa, for so alarming you. I am ashamed of my weakness. Do not be distressed, see, I am quite recovered now." And she rose to her feet. "I think Simon Holmes is here, papa. He came in with me just now. Will you allow him to come in, papa? I should like him to speak to you. He is a good man, you know, and a wise one. We need an adviser now, do we not, papa?"

"Certainly, my dear, if you wish it," said the baronet, and he added to himself, "a strange adviser, but, perhaps, not a bad one. Mother wit is better than all the schools, they say."

"Simon," said Ethel, when the carpenter was brought into the room, "I want you to help me convince papa that I ought to go to Spain at once for Harold's sake. Papa, Simon and I have been talking about the journey and he thinks as I do, that it is my duty."

"You—impossible!" said the baronet, decisively. "This news," pointing to the letter, "puts an end to that project. I know I consented to it once, but that was before I was ill, and when I could go with you, but it is impossible now."

"Not impossible, Sir Godwin," said Simon, "difficult and, mayhap, dangerous, but not impossible. God will see her through; it's my belief He's sending her."

"You are a fanatic, Simon, you are crazy to think of her going. You don't know where Harold is. Why he is held by a gang of cut-throat rascals in the mountains. Ethel's life would not be worth an hour's purchase. It is nonsense. I should have to pay a ransom for her—even if that would save her."

"No, no, Sir Godwin, not so bad as that. You send Jacob Benson with her. He sairved in the Peninsular War, and he knows summat o' the land. He's true as steel, and he'd die for Miss Ethel. Let him take her to the nearest big town and let them wait there till Maister Harold comes to 'em. Jacob's got a pair o' brawny arms, he hez, and I pity any Spanisher as comes afore 'em when his blood's up. Miss Ethel 'll be safe enough."

Ethel saw that the baronet's mind was slowly yielding under Simon's words. It was weak since his stroke, and would probably change many times before her departure, but Simon was making an impression upon it. Feeling satisfied that Simon would succeed, and, perhaps, be more free to speak in her absence, she slipped quietly away to her room to complete the preparations for setting out which had been so long suspended.

Ethel knew full well what she was about when she enlisted the aid of Simon Holmes. She herself had had experience of the "way" that Simon had with sick and sorrowful people, and had long desired that her stricken father might have experience of it too. It was necessary for his very life's sake that her father's excitement should cease, and if it was within the power of man to calm him down, Simon Holmes, thoughtful, gentle, sympathetic Simon, thought she, is certainly the man to do it.

She had long desired that her father might be induced to think more fixedly and seriously on those all-important questions which are so apt to be put aside as matters of little moment; those questions which have to do with the soul and the Saviour; with holiness, death, immortality and God. To Ethel, as we have already seen, all these things were of prime importance, and she longed that her father should be, as her mother had been, "partner in like precious faith." In this sacred and peculiar lore Simon Holmes was a learned man, more learned than many a theological Rabbi, for he had obtained his wisdom from the Fountain-Head; and he could tell the things he knew more effectively than many an eloquent divine, because his strong common-sense was imbued with the influence of his religious faith, and because his inmost heart found natural utterance through the channel of speech.

There was one other peculiarity about Simon as a past-master in the secrets of the sacred science, he always mistrusted his own powers to do justice to his theme, and to give the message aright that he had received from his Master. This led him at almost every sentence, on such occasions, to lift his heart to the God of heaven as Nehemiah did in the presence of his king, and to ask silently for "mouth, matter and wisdom," a trinity of factors in his religious conversation by which his power in that department was sufficiently accounted for.

After Ethel had left the room, Simon sat silent for a moment or two pondering on what it would be best to say to the fuming and excited baronet, in order to bring him to a quiet mind. The baronet prepared the way for him. "Oh, dear, dear, dear!" said he, fretfully, placing a hand on each arm of his chair, as though he would rise to his feet in spite of the iron bands of paralysis that held him down, and, like a child, forgetting all that Simon had said—"Whatever is to be done about that unhappy boy?"

"Why, just what is being done, Sir Godwin," said Simon, with patience. "Miss Ethel's gotten hold o' the right end o' that skein, you may depend on it. The best thing to do with Mr. Harold is to bring him home, both for your sake an' for his. I've always said that there's a warm heart beatin' under Mr. Harold's wescut, if it could only be gotten at. An' it's my opinion that a look at his fayther's gray hairs is just the thing to touch it. Miss Ethel's set her mind on bringin' him back to God, as well as to you; an' that would help her amazin'!"

The baronet listened. He realized that he had heard the plan but could not follow it now, and he remained silent, but was evidently thinking.

"An' then, again," persisted Simon, "there's nowt that would do you more good, scarcely, an' help to set you on your feet again, Sir Godwin, than to hev Mr. Harold sittin' by your side wi' his hand i' yours, an' sayin', 'Here I am, dear fayther; niver to leave yo' ony more.'" That delightful picture the baronet could understand, and it went straight to his heart.

"Oh, Simon Holmes! Simon Holmes!" said he, stirred even to tears, "that would act like a charm on these poor limbs of mine. But oh, dear, dear, how can such a thing be?"

"The mouth of the Lord hath spokken it, Sir Godwin," replied Simon, quietly and firmly. "If you'll be good anuff to listen to me a bit, I'll tell you my reesons for sayin' so."

The baronet nodded a permission, but he heaved a sigh at the same time which did not express much confidence in the result. Simon, inwardly looking to God, proceeded to marshal his arguments.

"There's Miss Ethel. A finer soul, short o' bein' an angel, dizn't exist. That you kno', Sir Godwin. Well, she lies at the very farrest end o' the valley o' the Shadow of Death, so far from this wo'ld that we varry nearly lost sight of her, an' so near the land where her Saviour is, an' so close to the gates o' pearl that she can hear 'em inside a harpin' wi' their harps, an' can catch a glint o' their shinin' wings. Then the Lord brings her back again by a merricle, Sir Jarvis's dream an' what followed it was lahtle short o' that, an' that you knoa. When she cums back to yo' i' health an' strength, an' wi' some o' the fragrance o' Beulah land clingin' aboot her, an' some o' the leet that shone on her through the gates in her bonny blue eyes, she says, 'The Lord's raised me up for a purpose, an' that is to bring my brother Harold home to his father.' I think you'll own 'at all that's true?"

Again Sir Godwin nodded his head, but he continued silent.

"Then time passes," said Simon continuing his story. "Fifty things cums up that seems to hinder her from settin' off; your oan failin' health, Sir Godwin, amang the rest, an' all the tahme poor Harold has fallen amang thieves an' you didn't kno' it. Then comes that letter of his. It's for his sister, but it falls into your hands that it may sooner tak' effect. It gives both you an' her a push, like, as much as to say, 'It's high time for her to be off.' Then something tells her—you hear that, Sir Godwin?—something tells her to go to her mother's grave, bless her, an' she prays to her mother's God for strength an' guidance. While she's standin' there, readin' what's on the monniment, the Lord reminds her that all the money she needs to buy Mr. Harold's liberty is lyin' riddy for her, an' that she's nothing to do but to go to the appointed spot, an' say, 'Here's the money,' pay it doon, put her airm through her brother's an' say, 'Father wants you, Brother Harold; come home wi' me.'

"Will he come? do you say. His letter tells you that, poor lad, plain anuff. Miss Ethel comes straight away back from t' chotch an' she says to you, I heeard her, 'Father, I've received my commission, I'm goin' to fetch Harold home. Get his room ready, for he'll come back wi' me.' All that's the simple fact, Sir Godwin. Isn't it?"

Sir Godwin could not do other than reply, "Yes, Simon, it has all been as you say."

"Very well, then," said the carpenter, "I put it to you, Sir Godwin, whether the Lord's hand isn't in it? I don't think it's half so hard to bring Mr. Harold back, as it was to bring Miss Ethel back. She was a good deal nearer bein' gone altegither than he is.
